REFORMATION is the historical name for the religious movement of the sixteenth century, — the greatest since the introduction of Christianity. It divided the Western Catholic Church into two opposing sections, and gave rise to the various evangelical or Protestant organizations of Christendom. It has three chief branches, — the Lutheran, in Germany; the Zwinglian and Calvinistic, in Switzerland, France, Holland, and Scotland; the Anglican, in England. Each of these branches has again become the root of other Protestant denominations, especially in England and the United States, under the fostering care of civil and religious freedom. The entire Protestant population now numbers over a hundred millions of nominal members. Protestantism has taken hold chiefly of the Germanic or Teutonic races, and is strongest in Germany, Switzerland, Scandinavia, Holland, the British Empire, and North America, and extends its missionary operations to all heathen lands. Although divided, and ever tending to new divisions, it is at the present time the most active and progressive part of Christendom.

I. PREPARATION FOR THE REFORMATION. —

It was not an abrupt revolution, but had its roots in the middle ages. There were many reformers before the Reformation, and almost every doctrine of Luther and Calvin had its advocates long before them. The whole struggling of mediæval Catholicism toward reform and liberty; the long conflict between the German emperors and the popes; the reformatory councils of Pisa, Constance, and Basel; the Waldenses and Albigenses in France and Northern Italy; Wiclif and the Lollards in England; Hus and the Hussites in Bohemia; Arnold of Brescia, and Savonarola, in Italy; the spiritualistic piety and theology of the mystics of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries; the theological writings of Wesel, Goch, and Wessel, in Germany and the Netherlands; the rise of the national languages and letters in connection with the feeling of national independence; the invention of the printing-press; the revival of letters and classical learning under the direction of Agricola, Reuchlin, and Erasmus, — all these, and similar movements, were preparations for the Reformation. The evangelical churches claim a share in the inheritance of all preceding history, and own their indebtedness to the missionaries, schoolmen, fathers, confessors, and martyrs of former ages, but acknowledge no higher authority than Christ and his inspired organs. The Reformation is similarly related to mediæval Catholicism as the apostolic church to the Jewish synagogue, or the gospel dispensation to the dispensation of the law. The discipline of the law looks towards freedom and independence. See the Epistle of Paul to the Galatians (the Magna Charta of evangelical Protestantism).

LIT. — On the preparations for the Reformation, see especially ULLMANN: Die Reformatoren vor der Reformation (Hamb., 1842, 2 vols., Eng. trans. by R. Menzies, Edinb., 1855, 2 vols.), and the monographs on Wiclif, Hus, Wessel, Savonarola, Erasmus, etc., mentioned under these titles.

II. PRINCIPLES OF THE REFORMATION. — It was originally neither a political, nor a philosophical, nor a literary, but a religious and moral movement; although it exerted a powerful influence in all these directions. It started with the practical question, How can the troubled conscience find pardon and peace, and become sure of personal salvation? It retained from the Catholic system all the objective doctrines of Christianity concerning the Holy Trinity and the divine-human character and work of Christ, in fact, all the articles of faith contained in the Apostles' and other oecumenical creeds of the early church. But it joined issue with the prevailing system of religion in soteriology, or in the doctrines relating to subjective experimental Christianity, especially the justification of the sinner before God, the true character of faith, good works, the rights of conscience, and the rule of faith. It asserted the principle of evangelical freedom as laid down in the Epistles of Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles, in opposition to the system of outward legalistic authority which held the individual conscience and private judgment in bondage. It brought the believer into direct relation and union with Christ as the one and all-sufficient source of salvation, in opposition to traditional ecclesiasticism, and priestly and saintly intercession. The Protestant goes directly to the word of God for instruction, and to the throne of grace in his devotions; while the pious Catholic always consults the teaching of his church, and prefers to offer his prayers through the medium of the Virgin Mary and the saints.

From this general principle of evangelical freedom, and direct individual relationship of the believer to Christ, proceed the three fundamental doctrines of Protestantism, — the absolute supremacy of the word of Christ, the absolute supremacy of the grace of Christ, and the general priesthood of believers. The first is called the formal, or, better, the objective principle; the second, the material, or, better, the subjective principle; the third may be called the social, or ecclesiastical principle. German writers emphasize the first two, but often overlook the third, which is of equal importance.

(1) The objective principle proclaims the canonical Scriptures, especially the New Testament, to be the only infallible source and rule of faith and practice, and asserts the right of private interpretation of the same, in distinction from the Roman-Catholic view, which declares the Bible and tradition to be two co-ordinate sources and rules of faith, and makes tradition, especially the decrees of popes and councils, the only legitimate and infallible interpreter of the Bible. In its extreme form Chillingworth expressed this principle of the Reformation in the well-known formula, "The Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible, is the religion of Protestants." Genuine Protestantism, however, by no means despises or rejects church authority as such, but only subordinates it to, and measures its value by, the Bible, and believes in a progressive interpretation of the Bible through the expanding and deepening consciousness of Christendom. Hence, besides having its own symbols or standards of public doctrine, it retained all the articles of the ancient Catholic creeds and a large amount of disciplinary and ritual tradition, and rejected only those doctrines and ceremonies for which it found no clear warrant in the Bible, and which it thought contradicted its letter or spirit. The Calvinistic branches of Protestantism went farther in their antagonism to the received traditions than the Lutheran and the Anglican Reformation; but all united in rejecting the authority of the Pope (Melancthon for a while was willing to concede this, but only jure humano, as a limited disciplinary superintendency of the church), the meritoriousness of good works, the indulgences, the worship of the Holy Virgin, of saints and relics, the seven sacraments (with the exception of baptism and the Eucharist), the dogma of transubstantiation and the sacrifice of the mass, purgatory and prayers for the dead, auricular confession, celibacy of the clergy, the monastic system, and the use of the Latin tongue in public worship, for which the vernacular languages were substituted.

(2) The subjective principle of the Reformation is justification by faith alone, or, rather, by free grace through faith operative in good works. It has reference to the personal appropriation of the Christian salvation, and aims to give all glory to Christ, by declaring that the sinner is justified before God (i.e., is acquitted of guilt, and declared righteous) solely on the ground of the all-sufficient merits of Christ as apprehended by a living faith, in opposition to the theory — then prevalent, and substantially sanctioned by the Council of Trent — which makes faith and good works the two co-ordinate sources of justification, laying the chief stress upon works. Protestantism does not, on that account, by any means reject or depreciate good works: it only denies their value as sources or conditions of justification, but insists on them as the necessary fruits of faith, and evidence of justification.

(3) The social and ecclesiastical principle is the universal priesthood of believers. This implies the right and duty of the Christian laity, not only to read the Bible in the vernacular tongue, but also to take part in the government and all the public affairs of the church. It is opposed to the hierarchical system, which puts the essence and authority of the church into an exclusive priesthood, and makes ordained priests the necessary and only mediators between God and the people.

III. THE REFORMATION IN THE DIFFERENT COUNTRIES. — We confine ourselves here to brief sketches, and refer for details to the respective articles, and omit those countries (Italy, Spain) where the Reformation was totally suppressed by the Inquisition and the counter-reformation of Jesuits. For the general history of the Reformation in all countries, we refer to SCHRÖCKER: Christl. Kirchengesch. seit der Reformation, Leipz., 1804-12, 10 vols.; GIESELER: Church History, American ed., vol. iv., N.Y., 1862 (very important for the literature, and extracts from the sources); HAGENBACH: History of the Reformation (translated by Miss E. Moore), Edinb., 1878, 2 vols.; MERLE D'AUBIGNÉ: Histoire de la Réformation au XVI<sup>e</sup> siècle, Paris, 1835-53, 5 vols., and Histoire de la Réformation au temps de Calvin, 1862-75, 5 vols. M. LINDSAY: The Reformation, Edinb., 1882; CHARLES BEARD: The Reformation of the Sixteenth Century in its Relation to Modern Thought and Knowledge (the Hibbert Lectures for 1883, published in Lond. and N.Y.). The most learned work against the Reformation is by Dr. DÜLLINGER: Die Reformation, ihre innere Entwicklung und ihre Wirkungen, Regensb., 1846-48, 3 vols. But the distinguished author afterwards protested himself against the Pope and the Vatican Council, and was excommunicated in 1871.

(1) The Reformation in Germany. — The movement in Germany was directed by the genius and energy of Luther, and the learning and moderation of Melancthon, assisted by the electors of Saxony and other princes, and sustained by the majority of the people, in spite of the opposition of the bishops and the imperial government. It commenced in the university of Wittenberg with a protest against the traffic in indulgences, Oct. 31, 1517 (ever since celebrated in Protestant Germany as the festival of the Reformation), and soon spread all over Germany, which was in various ways prepared for a breach with the Pope. At first it kept within the bosom of the Roman Church. Luther shrunk in holy horror from the idea of a separation from the traditions of the past, and retained a profound reverence for certain Catholic dogmas and institutions. He only attacked a few abuses, taking it for granted that the Pope himself would condemn them if properly informed. But the irresistible logic of events carried him far beyond his original intentions, and brought him into irreconcilable conflict with the central authority of the church. Pope Leo X., in June, 1520, pronounced the sentence of excommunication against Luther, who, in turn, burned the bull, together with the canon law and several books of his opponents. This was the fiery signal of war. The Diet of Worms in 1521, where he made his memorable defence, added to the excommunication of the Pope the ban of the emperor. The bold stand of the poor monk, in the face of the combined civil and ecclesiastical powers of the age, is one of the sublimest scenes in history, and marks an epoch in the progress of freedom. The dissatisfaction with the various abuses of Rome, and the desire for the free preaching of the gospel, were so extensive, that the Reformation, both in its negative and positive features, spread, in spite of the Pope's bull and the emperor's ban, and gained a foothold before 1530 in the greater part of Northern Germany, especially in Saxony, Brandenburg, Hesse, Pomerania, Mecklenburg, Lüneburg, Friesland, and in nearly all the free cities, as Hamburg, Lübeck, Bremen, Magdeburg, Frankfurt, and Nürnberg; while in Austria, Bavaria, and along the Rhine, it was persecuted and suppressed. Among the principal causes of this rapid progress were the writings of the Reformers, Luther's German version of the Scriptures (his greatest and most useful work, begun 1521, completed 1534), and the evangelical hymns, which introduced the new ideas into public worship and the hearts of the people. That extraordinary man, as a sort of inspired apostle and prophet of Germany, gave to his people the Bible, the Catechism, and the Hymn-Book, in the purest and strongest idiomatic German; and well may Germany, and all the Protestant churches in Europe and America, celebrate the fourth centennial of his birth on the 10th of November of this year (1883). The Diet of Spire, in 1526, left each state to its own discretion concerning the question of reform, until a general council should settle it for all, and thus sanctioned the principle of territorial independence in matters of religion which prevails in Germany to this day; each sovereignty having its own separate ecclesiastical establishment in close union with the state. But the next Diet of Spire (in 1529) prohibited the further progress of the Reformation. Against this decree of the Roman Catholic majority, the evangelical princes entered, on the ground of the Word of God, the inalienable rights of conscience, and the decree of the previous Diet of Spire, the celebrated protest, dated April 19, 1529, which gave rise to the name of "Protestants."

The Diet of Augsburg, in 1530, where the Lutherans offered their principal confession of faith, drawn up by Melancthon, and named after that city, threatened the Protestants with violent measures if they did not return shortly to the old church. Here closes the first, the heroic, and most eventful, period of the German Reformation.

The second period embraces the formation of the Protestant League of Smalcald for the armed defence of Lutheranism, the various theological conferences of the two parties for an adjustment of the controversy, the death of Luther (1546), the imperial "Interims" or compromises (the Ratisbon, Augsburg, and Leipzig "Interims"), and the Smalcaldian war, and ends with the success of the Protestant army, under Maurice of Saxony, and the peace of Augsburg in 1555, which secured to the Lutheran states the free exercise of their religion, but with a restriction on its farther progress.

The third period, from 1555 to 1580, is remarkable for the violent internal controversies within the Lutheran Church,—the Osiandrian controversy, concerning justification and sanctification; the adiaphoristic, arising originally from the fruitless compromises with Romanists (called "Interims"); the synergistic, concerning faith and good works; and the crypto-Calvinistic, or sacramentarian controversy, about the real presence in the Eucharist. These theological disputes led to the full development and completion of the doctrinal system of Lutheranism as laid down in the Book of Concord (first published in 1580), which embraces all the symbolical books of that church: namely, the three oecumenical creeds; the Augsburg Confession and its "Apology," both by Melancthon; the two Catechisms of Luther, and the Smalcald Articles drawn up by him in 1537; and the "Formula of Concord," composed by six Lutheran divines in 1577. But, on the other hand, the fanatical intolerance of the strict Lutheran party against the Calvinists and the moderate Lutherans (called, after their leader, Melancthonians or Philippists) drove a large number of the latter over to the Reformed (Calvinistic) Church, especially in the Palatinate (1560), in Bremen (1561), Nassau (1582), Anhalt (1596), Hesse-Cassel (1605), and Brandenburg (1614).

The German Reformed communion adopted the Heidelberg Catechism—drawn up by two moderate Calvinistic divines, Zacharias Ursinus and Kaspar Olevianus, in 1563, by order of the elector Frederick III., or the Pious—as their confession of faith.

The sixteenth century closes the theological history of the German Reformation; but its political history was not brought to a final termination until after the terrible Thirty-Years' War, by the Treaty of Westphalia in 1648, which secured to the Lutherans and the German Reformed churches (but to no others) equal rights with the Roman Catholics within the limits of the German Empire. Those two denominations, either in their separate existence, or united in one organization under the name of the Evangelical Church (as in Prussia, Baden, Württemberg, and other states, since 1817), are to this day almost the only forms of Protestantism recognized and supported by the German governments; all others being small, self-supporting "sects," regarded with little sympathy by the popular mind, and nourished mostly by foreign aid (the Baptists and Methodists of England and America). But within those ecclesiastical establishments, Germany has bred and tolerated, during the present century, almost every imaginable form of theoretic belief and unbelief, from the strictest old-school orthodoxy to the loosest rationalism and scepticism. Theological schools take the place of contending sects. The third tercentennial jubilee of the Reformation (1817) marks a return to the doctrines and principles of the Reformers, and most of the theological chairs in the universities were gradually filled with men of evangelical convictions. But the conflict is still going on; and every new system of philosophy and theology has a fair chance of success or failure, under the protection of the academic liberty of teaching. Germany is the chief modern workshop of critical and scientific theology in all its branches, especially in biblical and historical studies, and sends forth annually the results of profound and acute research in the line of progress.

(2) The Reformation in Switzerland.—This was contemporaneous with, but independent of, the German Reformation, and resulted in the formation of the REFORMED communion as distinct from the Lutheran. In all the essential principles and doctrines, except that on the mode of Christ's presence in the Eucharist, the Helvetic Reformation agreed with the German; but it departed farther from the received traditions in matters of government, discipline, and worship, and aimed at a more radical moral and practical reformation of the people. It naturally divides itself into three periods,—the Zwinglian, from 1516 to 1531; the Calvinistic, to the death of Calvin in 1564; and the period of Bullinger and Beza, to the close of the sixteenth century. The first belongs mainly to the German cantons; the second, to the French; the third, to both jointly. Zwingli began his reformatory preaching against various abuses, at Einsiedeln, in 1516, and then, with more energy and effect, at Zürich, in 1519. His object was to "preach Christ from the fountain," and to "insert the pure Christ into the heart." At first he had the consent of the Bishop of Constance, who assisted him in putting down the sale of indulgences in Switzerland; and he stood even in high credit with the papal nuncio. But a rupture occurred in 1522, when Zwingli attacked the fasts as a human invention; and many of his hearers ceased to observe them. The magistrate of Zürich arranged a public disputation in January, and another in October, 1523, to settle the whole controversy. On both occasions, Zwingli, backed by the authorities and the great majority of the people, triumphed over his papal opponents. In 1526 the churches of the city and the neighboring villages were cleared of images and shrines; and a simple, puritanic mode of worship took henceforward the place of the Roman-Catholic mass. The Swiss diet took a hostile attitude to the Reformed movement, similar to that of the German diet, with a respectable minority in its favor. To settle the controversy for the republic, a general theological conference was arranged, and held at Baden, in the Canton Aargau, in May, 1526, with Dr. Eck, the famous antagonist of Luther, as the champion of the Roman, and Eccolampadius of the Reformed cause. Its result was in form adverse, but in fact favorable, to the cause of the Reformation. It was now introduced in the majority of the cantons, at the wish of the magistrates and the people, by Eccolampadius in Basel, and by Haller in Bern, also, in part, in St. Gall, Schaffhausen, Glarus, Appenzell, Thurgau, and the Grisons; while in the French portions of Switzerland William Farel and Viret prepared the way for Calvin. But the small cantons around the Lake of Lucerne, Uri, Schwytz, Unterwalden, Lucerne, and Zug, steadfastly opposed every innovation. At last it came to an open war between the Reformed and Catholic cantons. Zwingli's policy was overruled by the apparently more humane, but in fact more cruel and disastrous, policy of Bern, to force the poor mountaineers into measures by starvation. The Catholics, resolved to maintain their rights, attacked and routed the small army of Zürichers in the battle of Cappel, October, 1531. Zwingli, who had accompanied his flock as chaplain and patriot, met a heroic death on the field of battle; and Eccolampadius of Basel died a few weeks after. Thus the progress of the Reformation was suddenly arrested in the German portions of Switzerland, and one-third of it remains Roman Catholic to this day.

But it took a new start in the western or French cantons, and rose there to a higher position than ever. Soon after this critical juncture, the great master mind of the Reformed Church—who was to carry forward, to modify, and to complete the work of Zwingli, and to rival Luther in influence—began to attract the attention of the public.

John Calvin, a Frenchman by birth and education, but exiled from his native land for his faith, found providentially a new home, in 1536, in the little republic of Geneva, where Farel had prepared the way. Here he developed his extraordinary genius and energy as the greatest divine and disciplinarian of the Reformation, and made Geneva the model church for the Reformed communion, and a hospitable asylum for persecuted Protestants of every nation. His theological writings, especially the Institutes and Commentaries, exerted a formative influence on all Reformed churches and confessions of faith; while his legislative genius developed the Presbyterian form of government, which rests on the principle of ministerial equality, and of a popular representation of the congregation by lay elders, aiding the pastors in maintaining discipline, and promoting the spiritual prosperity of the people. Calvin died, after a most active and devoted life, in 1564, and left in Theodore Beza (d. 1605) an able and worthy successor, who, partly with Bullinger, the faithful successor of Zwingli in Zürich, and author of the Second Helvetic Confession (1566), labored to the close of the sixteenth century for the consolidation of the Swiss Reformation, and the spread of its principles in France, Holland, Germany, England, and Scotland.

(3) The Reformation in France.—While the Reformation in Germany and Switzerland carried with it the majority of the population, it met in France with the united opposition of the court, the hierarchy, and the popular sentiment, and had to work its way through severe trial and persecution. The tradition in that country was favorable to a change, as France had always maintained a certain degree of independence of Rome; and the university of Paris, once the centre of European intelligence and culture, had strongly urged a thorough reformation in capite et membris on the councils of the fifteenth century. The first professed Protestants in France were Lefèvre, Wolmar, Farel, Marot, Olivetan, Calvin, and Beza, all men of distinguished learning and ability; but most of them had to seek safety in exile. It was only after the successful establishment of the Reformation in French Switzerland, that the movement became serious in the neighboring kingdom. Calvin and Beza may be called the fathers of the French Reformed Church. Their pupils returned as missionaries to their native land. The first Protestant congregation was formed at Paris in 1555, and the first synod held in the same city in 1559. In 1561 the theological conference at Poissy took place, where Theodore Beza eloquently but vainly pleaded the cause of the Protestants before the dignitaries of the Roman Church, and where the name "Reformed," as an ecclesiastical designation, originated. In 1571 the general synod at La Rochelle adopted the Gallican Confession, and a system of government and discipline essentially Calvinistic, yet modified by the peculiar circumstances of a Church not in union with the State (as in Geneva), but in antagonism with it. The movement here unavoidably assumed a political character, and led to a series of civil wars, which distracted France till the close of the sixteenth century. The Roman-Catholic party, backed by the majority of the population, was headed by the Dukes of Guise, who derived their descent from Charlemagne, and looked to the throne, then occupied by the house of Valois. The Protestant (or Huguenot) party, numerically weaker, but containing some of the noblest blood and best talent of France, was headed by the Princes of Navarre, the next heirs to the throne, and descendants of Hugh Capet. The queen-regent, Catharine, during the minority of her sons (Francis II. and Charles IX.), although decidedly Roman Catholic in sentiment, tried to keep the rival parties in check, in order to rule over both. But the champions of Rome took possession of Paris, while the Prince of Condé occupied Orléans. Three civil wars followed in rapid succession, when the court and the Duke of Guise resorted to treason, and concerted a wholesale slaughter of the Huguenots (Aug. 24, 1572), the leaders of the party having been expressly invited to Paris to attend the marriage of Prince Henry of Navarre with a sister of Charles IX. as a general feast of reconciliation. But the party was only diminished in number, by no means annihilated. Other civil wars followed, with varying fortune, and terminated at last in the victory of Prince Henry of Navarre, who after the assassination of Henry III. in 1589, by a Dominican monk, became king of France as Henry IV. This seemed to decide the triumph of Protestantism in France. But the Roman party, still more numerous and powerful, and supported by Spain and the Pope, elected a rival head, and threatened to plunge the country into new bloodshed. Then Henry, from political and patriotic motives, abjured the Protestant faith, in which he had been brought up, and professed the Roman-Catholic religion (1593), saying that "Paris is worth a mass." At the same time, however, he secured to his former associates, then numbering about seven hundred and sixty congregations throughout the kingdom, a legal existence and the right of the free exercise of religion, by the celebrated Edict of Nantes, in 1598, which closes the stormy period of the French Reformation. But the Reformed Church in France, after flourishing for a time, was overwhelmed with new disasters under the despotism of Richelieu, and finally the revocation of the Edict of Nantes by Louis XIV., in 1685, reduced it to a "church of the desert;" yet it survived the most cruel persecutions at home, and enriched by thousands of exiles the population of every Protestant country in Europe and America.

(4) The Reformation in the Netherlands was kindled partly by Luther's works, but mostly by Reformed and Calvinistic influences from Switzerland and France. Its first martyrs, Esch and Voes, were burned at Antwerp in 1523, and celebrated by Luther in a famous poem. The despotic arm of Charles V. and his son Philip II. resorted to the severest measures for crushing the rising spirit of religious and political liberty. The Duke of Alba surpassed the persecuting heathen emperors of Rome in cruelty, and, according to Grotius, destroyed the lives of a hundred thousand Dutch Protestants during the six years of his regency (1567-73). Finally the seven northern provinces formed a federal republic,—first under the leadership of William of Orange, and, after his assassination (1584), under his son Maurice,—and after a long and heroic struggle accomplished their severance from the Church of Rome and the Spanish crown. The southern provinces remained Roman Catholic, and subject to Spain. The first Dutch-Reformed synod was held at Dort in 1574, and in the next year the university of Leyden was founded. The Reformed Church of Holland adopted as its doctrinal and disciplinary standards the Heidelberg Catechism of 1563, the Belgic Confession of 1561, and the canons of the synod of Dort of 1618-19. This important synod was held in consequence of the Arminian controversy, which violently agitated the country at that time. The Arminians, or Remonstrants, differing in five points from the orthodox Calvinists, and holding to the freedom of the will and a conditional predestination, were condemned by the synod of Dort, but continued as a tolerated sect, and exerted, through the writings of their distinguished scholars and divines,—Arminius, Hugo Grotius, Episcopius, Limborch, and Le Clerc (Clericus),—considerable influence upon Protestant theology in England, France, and Germany during the eighteenth century. The Methodists under the lead of Wesley adopted the Arminian views. The orthodox church of Holland has been represented in the United States, since 1628, by the Reformed Protestant Dutch Church (now the "Reformed Church in America"), the oldest, save one, of the denominations in the United States.

(5) The Reformation in Bohemia was thoroughly prepared by the labors of John Hus and Jerome of Prague, who were burned at the stake as heretics by order of the Council of Constance (the one July 6, 1415, the other May 30, 1416), but left a large number of followers, especially in the Czech or Slavic portion of the population. The wars which followed would have resulted in the triumph of the Hussites, if they had not been broken up by internal dissensions between the Calixtines, the Utraquists, and Taborites. From their remnants arose the "Unitas Fratrum," or the "Bohemian Brethren." They endeavored to reproduce the simplicity and purity of the apostolic church, and were in fraternal alliance with the Waldenses. Notwithstanding their violent persecution, they perpetuated themselves in Bohemia and Moravia. When the Reformation broke out, they sent several deputations to Luther: and many of them embraced the doctrines of the Augsburg Confession, but the majority passed to the Reformed or Calvinistic communion. During the reign of Maximilian II., there was a fair prospect of the conversion of the whole Bohemian nation; but the bloody Thirty-Years' War (which began in Prague, 1618), and the counter-Reformation of the Jesuits, crushed Protestantism, and turned Bohemia into a wilderness. A Jesuit named Anton Komiasch (1637) boasted that he had burned over sixty thousand Bohemian books, mostly Bibles. The Bohemian Brethren who had fled to Moravia became, under Count Zinzendorf's care, the nucleus of the Moravian Church (1722), which continues to this day one of the smallest but most active, devoted, and useful among evangelical denominations. But even in Bohemia Protestantism could not be utterly annihilated, and began to raise its feeble head when the emperor, Joseph II., issued the famous Edict of Toleration, Oct. 29, 1781. The recent revival of Czech patriotism and literature came to its aid. The fifth centenary of Hus was celebrated in Prague, 1869, and his works and letters were published. In 1880 there were about fifty Reformed congregations in Bohemia, and thirty in Moravia, holding to the Second Helvetic Confession and the Heidelberg Catechism. The number of Lutheran congregations is smaller, and mostly confined to the German part of the population.

(6) The Reformation in Hungary. — This country was first brought into contact with the Reform movement by disciples of Luther and Melancthon, who had studied at Wittenberg, after 1524. Ferdinand I. granted to some magnates and cities liberty of worship, and Maximilian II. (1561-76) increased it. The synod of Erdöd, in 1545, organized the Lutheran, and the synod of Czenger, in 1557, the Reformed Church. The German settlers mostly adopted the Augsburg Confession; the national Magyars, the Helvetic. Rudolph II. having suppressed religious liberty, Prince Stephen Bocskaj of Transylvania, strengthened by his alliance with the Turks, reconquered by force of arms (1606) full toleration for the Lutherans and Calvinists in Hungary and Transylvania, which under his successors, Bethlen Gábor and George Rákóczy I., was confirmed by the treaties of Nikolsburg (1622) and Linz (1645). In Transylvania, Socinianism also found a refuge, and has maintained itself to this day.

(7) The Reformation in Poland. — Fugitive Bohemian Brethren, or Hussites, and the writings of the German Reformers, started the movement in Poland. King Sigismund Augustus (1548-72) favored it, and corresponded with Calvin. The most distinguished Protestant of that country was Jan Laski, or John à Lasco, a Calvinist, who fled from Poland for his faith, was called back by the Protestant nobility, aided by several friends, translated the Bible, and labored for the union of the Reformed and Lutherans (d. 1560). A compromise between the two parties was effected by the general synod of Sendomir (Consensus Sendomiriensis), in 1570; but subsequently internal dissensions, the increase of Socinianism, and the efforts of the Jesuits, greatly interfered with the prosperity of Protestantism in that country. The German provinces now belonging to Russia — Courland, Livonia, and Esthonia — opened likewise the door to the Reformation, and adopted the Augsburg Confession.

(8) The Reformation in Scandinavia. — The Reformers of Sweden were two brothers, Oluf and Lars Peterson, or Petri, disciples of Luther, who after 1519 preached against the existing state of the church. They were aided by Loreuz Anderson of Strenguass. Gustavus Vasa, who delivered the country from the Danes, and became king in 1523, favored Protestantism from political and mercenary motives: the whole country, including the bishops, followed without much difficulty. He appropriated a large portion of the wealth of the church to meet the expenses of his wars and administration. The synod of Oerebro, in 1529, sanctioned the reform: and the synod of Upsal, in 1593, after a fruitless attempt to reconcile the country to Rome, confirmed and completed it. Sweden adopted the Lutheran creed, to the exclusion of every other, and retained the episcopal form of government in the closest union with the State. It did great service to the cause of Protestantism in Europe, through its gallant king, Gustavus Adolphus, in the Thirty-Years' War; and recently the intolerant laws against dissenters have been almost completely abolished. Denmark became likewise an exclusively Lutheran country, with an episcopal form of State-church government, under Christian III. But the episcopal succession was interrupted; the new bishops received presbyterial ordination, and are therefore merely superintendents, as the bishops in the Evangelical Church of Prussia.<sup>1</sup> A diet at Copenhagen in 1536 destroyed the political power of the Roman clergy, and divided two-thirds of the church's property between the crown and the nobility. The remaining third was devoted to the new ecclesiastical organization. Bugenhagen of Wittenberg was then called to complete the reform (1537). From Denmark, the Reformation passed over to Norway, in 1536. The Archbishop of Drontheim fled with the treasures of the church to Holland; another bishop resigned; a third was imprisoned; and the lower clergy were left the choice between exile, and submission to the new order of things, which most of them preferred. Iceland, then subject to Danish rule, likewise submitted to the Danish reform.

(9) The Reformation in England. — The struggle between the old and the new religion lasted longer in England and Scotland than on the Continent, and continued in successive shocks even down to the end of the seventeenth century; but it left in the end a very strong impression upon the character of the nation, and affected deeply its political and social institutions. In theology, English Protestantism was dependent upon the Continental reform, especially the ideas and principles of Calvin; but it displayed greater political energy, and power of organization. It was from the start a political as well as a religious movement, and hence it afforded a wider scope to the corrupting influence of selfish ambition and violent passion than the Reformation in Germany and Switzerland; but it passed, also, through severer trials and persecutions. In the English Reformation we distinguish five periods. The first, from 1527 to 1547, witnessed the abolition of the authority of the Roman Papacy under Henry VIII. This was merely a negative and destructive process, which removed the outward obstruction, and prepared the way for the reform. Henry VIII. quarrelled with the Pope on purely personal and selfish grounds, because the Pope properly refused consent to his divorce from Catharine of Aragon, and his marriage to Anne Boleyn. "The defender of the faith," a title given him by the Pope for the defence of the seven sacraments against Luther, remained in doctrine and religious sentiment a Roman Catholic to the end of his life; and at his death the so-called "bloody articles" — which enjoined under the severest penalties the dogma of transubstantiation, auricular confession, private masses, and the celibacy of the priesthood — were yet in full force. The only point of radical difference was the royal supremacy. He simply substituted a domestic for the foreign, and a political for an ecclesiastical Papacy, and punished with equal severity Protestant as well as Roman-Catholic dissenters who dared to doubt his supreme headship of the Church of England. But, while he thus destroyed the power of the Pope and of monasticism in England, a far deeper and more important movement went on among the people, under the influence of the revived traditions of Wiclif and the Lollards, the writings of the Continental Reformers, and chiefly of the English version of the Scriptures, commenced by Tyndale (1525), carried on by Coverdale (1535), Matthew alias John Rogers (1537), Taverner (1539), Crammer (1540), the Geneva exiles (1560), the Elizabethan Bishops (1568 and 1572), and completed in the Authorized Version of King James (1611). The second period embraces the reign of Edward VI., from 1547 to 1553, and contains the positive introduction of the Reformation by the co-operation mainly of the Duke of Somerset, protector and regent during the king's minority, and Crammer, archbishop of Canterbury, who by his pliable conduct, and subservieny to the will of Henry, had preserved the idea and hope of a reformation through that reign of terror. Crammer was assisted in the work by Ridley and Latimer, and by several Reformed divines from the Continent, whom he called to England, especially Martin Bucer of Strassburg, now elected professor at Cambridge, and Peter Martyr of Zurich (originally from Italy), for some time professor at Oxford. The most important works of this period, and in fact of the whole English Reformation, next to the English version of the Bible, are the Forty-two Articles of Religion (subsequently reduced to thirty-nine), or a new and moderately Calvinistic confession of faith, and the Book of Common Prayer, or a new directory of worship in the vernacular tongue, on the basis of the old Latin service, but with essential changes. The third period is the reign of Queen Mary, from 1553 to 1558, and presents to us the unsuccessful attempt of that queen and her friend Cardinal Pole (now made archbishop of Canterbury, after the deposition of Crammer) to undo the Reformation, and restore the Roman-Catholic religion and the authority of the Pope. This papal interim did more to consolidate the Reformation in England than Henry, Edward, and Elizabeth. Hundreds were martyred in this short reign, among them the three British Reformers, Ridley, Latimer, and Cranmer, who were publicly burned at Oxford in 1555 and 1556. Many others fled to the Continent, especially to Geneva, Zurich, Basel, and Frankfurt, where they were hospitably received, and brought into closer contact with the Reformed churches of Switzerland and Germany. The fourth period is the restoration and permanent establishment of the Anglican Reformation during the long reign of Elizabeth, — 1558 to 1603. The Roman-Catholic hierarchy was replaced by a Protestant; and the Articles of Religion, and the Common Prayer-Book of the reign of Edward, were introduced again, after revision. The ecclesiastical supremacy of the crown was likewise renewed, but under a modified form; the Queen refusing the title "supreme head" of the Church of England, and choosing, in its place, the less objectionable title "supreme governor." The Convocation and Parliament readily sanctioned all these changes. But the Anglican Church, as established by Elizabeth, was semi-Catholic in its form of prelatical government and liturgical worship, a sort of via media between Rome and Geneva. It suited the policy of the court, and the taste of the majority of the English people, but was offensive to the severer school of strict Calvinists who had returned from their Continental exile: hence the agitation in the bosom of the Reformed Church of England, and the growing conflict between the Episcopalian majority and the Puritanic minority. Elizabeth's reign was as intolerant against Puritan as against Papal dissenters, and passed the severest penal laws against both. But, while the Roman-Catholic party was almost annihilated in England, the Puritan party grew more powerful under the successors of Elizabeth, and overthrew the dynasty of the Stuarts, and even the Episcopalian establishment. But the latter revived from the shock, and was restored, with the restoration of the Stuart dynasty, in 1662; while a limited liberty of public worship was given to the dissenting denominations after the final overthrow of the Stuarts, by the Act of Toleration, in the reign of William and Mary (1688). These troubles and agitations constitute the fifth period in the history of English Protestantism, which in some respects is the most important and interesting, but lies beyond the age of the Reformation proper.

(10) The Reformation in Scotland. — The first impulse to the Reformation in Scotland proceeded from Germany and Switzerland. Copies of the writings of the Continental Reformers and of Tyndale's English Testament found their way to the Far North. The first preacher and martyr of Protestantism in that country was Patrick Hamilton, a youth of royal blood, and for some time a student at Wittenberg and Marburg, who was condemned to death by Archbishop Beaton, and burned at the stake. The movement gradually increased, in spite of persecution, especially after the rupture of England with the Pope, and was carried to a successful conclusion under the guidance of John Knox, the Luther of Scotland. He was a disciple and admirer of John Calvin, with whom he spent several years. He returned, after the accession of Elizabeth, to his native country, resolved to reform the Scotch Church after the model of the Church of Geneva, which he esteemed as "the best school of Christ since the days of the apostles." After a short civil war the Parliament of 1560 introduced the Reformation, and adopted a Calvinistic confession of faith, drawn up by Knox, Spottiswoode, Row, and three others (superseded afterward by the Westminster standards), and prohibited, under severe penalties, the exercise of the Roman-Catholic worship. In 1561 the first Book of Discipline was issued, and gave the new church a complete Presbyterian organization, culminating in a General Assembly of ministers and elders. The mode of worship was reduced to the greatest simplicity, with a decided predominance of the didactic element. When the unfortunate Mary Stuart, — of French education, tastes, and manners, and in no sympathy with the public opinion of Scotland, — began her reign, in August, 1561, she made an attempt to restore the Roman-Catholic religion, to which she was sincerely attached. But her own imprudences, and the determined resistance of the nation, frustrated her plans; and, after her flight to England (1568), Protestantism was again declared the only religion of Scotland, and received formal legal sanction under the regency of Murray.

APPEND. — A few words must be added on the LUTHER CELEBRATIONS of the present year (1883) and their historic significance. They are no less than a revival of the Reformation and a republication of the principles of evangelical Protestantism. They are the best vindication of Luther and his work against old and new calumnies, and misrepresentations of ignorance, prejudice, and malice. They were held not only in Eisleben, Eisenach, Erfurt, Wittenberg, and Worms, made memorable by Luther, but in every large city of Europe and North America, even in Rome. In the commemoration at Berlin the emperor and crown-prince of Germany, and eighty thousand children, took part. In London the event was celebrated in three hundred churches at once; and throughout Great Britain and Ireland the same theme resounded from pulpit and platform. In New York every Protestant minister preached on the blessings of the Reformation; and three public mass meetings were held beside, in Steinway Hall and the Academy of Music, on the 10th, 11th, and 13th of November which will long be remembered (especially the last) for their interest and enthusiasm. Similar celebrations took place in Philadelphia, Boston, Hartford, Princeton, Baltimore, Washington, and the great cities of the West, under the auspices of prominent citizens of all classes and denominations. Many thousands of addresses and sermons on the Reformation were preached in humble villages in Germany and throughout the world. Many Luther statues were unveiled. All the characteristic merits of the great Reformer were set before the people as never before: he lived his life over again as a man, as a German, as a husband and father, as a Christian, as a theologian, as a Bible translator, as a catechist, as a hymnist, as a preacher, as the founder of the Lutheran Church, as the champion of the sacred rights of conscience, and especially as the originator of a movement for religious and civil liberty which spread over Europe and across the ocean to the new world. His victorious battle-hymn, "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott," resounded throughout Christendom as never before. Truly the genius of the Reformation is still living and marching on in languages unknown to Luther, in countries not discovered, and nations not born, at the time of his birth.

The Luther bibliography of the year 1883 would fill several columns. See the Bibliographie der Luther-Literatur des Jahres 1883, published at Frankfurt; the Reading Notes on Luther, by JONX EDMUNDS, Philadelphia, Oct. 1, 1883; Die deutsche Rundschau for November, 1883; W. For illustrations, see the Luther-Nummer of the Illustrirte Zeitung of Leipzig, for October, 1883. Among American publications we mention two English translations of KÜSTLIN's popular Life of Luther (New York and Philadelphia), and several biographies by REIN (translated by Behringer), by Wackernagel, Schaeffer, etc.; a beautiful edition of The Hymns of Martin Luther (German and English), with his original tunes, edited by Bacon and Allen (Charles Scribner's Sons, New York); the Luther Document (No. xvii.) of the American Evangelical Alliance, containing the stirring addresses of Drs. Taylor and Phillips Brooks, in the Academy of Music, New York, Nov. 13, 1883; the Symposium on Luther, consisting of brief addresses of the seven professors of the Union Theological Seminary of New York, held Nov. 19, 1883, on the various aspects of Luther's character and labors, edited by Dr. Hitchcock.

The secular and religious newspapers during the weeks preceding and following the 10th of November are filled with reports and editorials on Luther and the Reformation. PHILIP SCHAEFF.

REFORMED (DUTCH) CHURCH IN AMERICA. 1. History.—The first settlers in New Amsterdam brought with them the schoolmaster, and the visitor of the sick; but a church organization was not made until 1628, when the Rev. Jonas Michaelius collected a congregation of more than fifty communicants, "Walloon and Dutch." This was five years after the trading-post on Manhattan Island had become a permanent agricultural settlement. The emigration from Holland, which then began, continued for half a century; the emigrants, for the most part, following up the valleys along the Hudson and the Mohawk Rivers in New York, and the Passaic, Hackensack, and Raritan in New Jersey. The church at home kept the colony well supplied with ministers; and for many years harmony prevailed, and growth was steady, the English conquest in 1660 in no respect interfering with the natural development of the church. But in the next century a change took place. The labors of the elder Frelinghuysen, who began his work in New Jersey in 1719, and was a very earnest and spiritual man, were attended with great success. He and those of like spirit felt that it was necessary that the colonial church should educate and ordain its own ministers, instead of sending its sons to Holland for that purpose. They applied to the classis of Amsterdam for permission. After years of waiting, authority for holding a subordinate ecclesiastical assembly, called a "Coetus," was obtained from the mother-country; and for a little while the plan worked well. But soon dissension broke out. The ministers and consistories who preferred the old ways withdrew from the coetus, and formed another body called the "Conferentie." A violent and very bitter controversy ensued, which went to great extremes, and hindered all progress for many years. At length, in 1770, through the efforts of Dr. John H. Livingston, a plan of union was adopted, and the churches worked together as a self-governing body. This organization was further perfected in 1793, and finally, in 1812, took the form which it has maintained, with slight alterations, to this day. The territory of the denomination, at first limited to the States of New York and New Jersey and a small portion of Pennsylvania, was gradually extended to the West, where, within the last forty years, there came a large increase, mainly owing to the thousands of Hollanders who sought a new home in this country, and naturally identified themselves with the church planted by their fathers. As these all speak Dutch only, they in part renew the difficulty which existed in the middle of the last century, when the transition from the Dutch language to the English was the cause of much heart-burning and alienation. It is hoped, however, that the lessons of experience will not be lost. In 1867 the denomination, which had been incorporated as the "Reformed Protestant Dutch Church in North America," changed its title to that of the "Reformed Church in America."

2. Organization.—This is substantially that of the Reformed churches of the Continent. The affairs of each congregation are managed by a consistory, consisting of elders and deacons chosen for two years, but in such a way that only one-half go out of office at once. The elders, with the pastor, receive and dismiss members, and exercise discipline: the deacons have charge of the alms. Both together are ex officio trustees of the church, hold its property, and call its minister. (A few congregations have a separate board of trustees to manage their temporal affairs; but this is an ill-advised and unhappy departure from the traditional usages and spirit of the church.) Ex-elders and ex-deacons constitute what is called "the Great Consistory," who may be summoned to give advice in important matters. The minister and one elder from each congregation in a certain district constitute a classis, which supervises spiritual concerns in that district. Four ministers and four elders from each classis in a larger district make a Particular Synod, with similar powers. And representatives, clerical and lay, from each classis, proportioned in numbers to the size of the classis, constitute the General Synod, which has supervision of the whole, and is a court of the last resort in judicial cases.

3. Doctrine. — The church is eminently confessional, having no less than five creeds, — the Apostles', the Nicene, the Quicunque Vult,<sup>1</sup> the Belgic Confession (1561), and the Canons of Dordrecht (1618-19). It requires the Heidelberg Catechism (1563) to be taught in families and schools, and also to be regularly explained from the pulpit on the Lord's Day, so that the whole is completed in at least four years. A short compendium of this Catechism is the standard of doctrine for all who seek full communion; and ministers are required to subscribe the Confession and Catechism, and to pledge themselves in writing not to promulgate any subsequent change of views without previously consulting the classis to which they belong. Parents offering children for baptism must acknowledge the articles of the faith as taught in this church, and engage to see their children instructed and brought up in the same. The salient characteristic of the body is its hereditary zeal for doctrine and order, which, however, knows how to reconcile unyielding attachment to its own views and usages with a large charity for all other Christians.

4. Discipline. — This is purely spiritual, and extends to all baptized members. It is in the hands of the ministers and elders, who are required, before every administration of the Lord's Supper, to attend to the censura morum; that is, to inquire if any communicant has become unsound in faith, or disorderly in life, and to take action accordingly. This action is subject to an appeal to each higher court in turn, even to the last. Careful provision is made for the trial of offences. Further to guard purity of doctrine and life, at every spring session of a classis each minister and elder is asked if the doctrines of the gospel are faithfully preached in their congregation, the Catechism explained from the pulpit, and taught in the schools, the censura morum observed, etc.; and the answers are entered in detail on the minutes, for the information of the higher judicatories. The church inherited from Holland a tolerably full Liturgy (parts from the pens of Calvin, Bucer, and John a Lasco), which has recently been enlarged, and has had appended to it the Psalter, arranged for responsive reading. The use of the greater part of the Liturgy is optional; but the offices for the sacraments, for ordination, and for church discipline, are of imperative obligation. No psalmody is allowed to be used unless it has been approved by the General Synod. The old custom of reading the Ten Commandments during the morning service on the Lord's Day, and of reciting the Apostles' Creed during the second service, has been revived, and is rapidly becoming general.

5. Institutions. — Rutgers College, founded under the name of Queen's College at New Brunswick, N.J., in 1770, is and ever has been controlled by members of this church. It has a hundred and twenty-nine students, who are taught by fifteen professors, and is growing in means, character, and usefulness. Hope College in Michigan, founded in 1865, is doing a good work for the people among whom it is placed. The Theological Seminary at New Brunswick is the oldest on the continent, having been established in 1784.<sup>1</sup> It has four professors (soon to be increased to five), forty-five students, commodious buildings, and a well-selected library of nearly 40,000 volumes. Foreign missions were begun through the A. B. C. F. M. in 1832, but independently in 1857, and now include stations in Japan, in Amoy, China, and in the Madura district, India. There are eighteen missionaries, thirty-seven churches, 2,843 communicants, and the annual outlay is from $70,000 to $80,000. A Woman's Auxiliary Board has been in operation for several years, and is very flourishing. The Board of Domestic Missions celebrated its jubilee in 1882. It aids in sustaining nearly a hundred churches, and expends about $10,000. A Board of Education aids between eighty and ninety students in the various stages of preparation for the ministry, and expends about $18,000, the larger portion of which comes from the wise endowments made by the benevolent during this century. The Board of Publication has a capital of about $12,000, and issues a valuable monthly paper called The Sower. The Christian Intelligencer, a weekly journal of high character, represents the church, but without official sanction. There is a widows' fund, amounting to over $59,000, and also a disabled ministers' fund of $53,000, the income of which, together with the voluntary offerings of the churches for the latter and similar offerings (aided by the annual payments of subscribers) for the former, is distributed twice a year by the treasurer.

6. Statistics. — At the present time (1883) the body numbers 516 churches, 569 ministers, and more than 80,000 communicants, who are organized into thirty-four Classes, four Particular Synods, and one General Synod. Its chief strength lies in the East; but four classes have been formed among the eighty thousand Hollanders who have settled within a generation in Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa. The contributions of the whole body for the last year were, for benevolent purposes, $224,000, and for congregational purposes, over $870,000.

Reformed Dutch Church, True. This is the result of a secession from the foregoing body, led by the Rev. Sol. Froeligh in 1822, a learned man who was once professor of theology. The reasons assigned for the separation were, that the Dutch Church had become erroneous in doctrine, lax in discipline, and corrupt in practice. The secession, however, did not adopt any new standards. At one time it was formidable, numbering over a hundred churches and as many ministers; but as it had no real basis, refused to co-operate in the benevolent institutions of the age, and was generally Antinomian in sentiment and practice, it began to dwindle in the first generation, and now numbers hardly more than a dozen churches, most of which are small and feeble. It was a great injury to the church from which it seceded, but it is hard to see of what service it has been to its own members or to anybody else. REFORMED (GERMAN) CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES. I. ORIGIN IN EUROPE. — The German Reformed Church traces its origin, in part to the rise of the Protestant Reformation in Switzerland, — where Ulrich Zwingli, as one of the leading Reformers, began to preach the Reformation views as early as 1516, just one year before Luther began the Reformation in Germany, — and in part, also, to the Reformation in Germany. A portion of the Protestant Church there was not prepared to indorse all the teaching of Luther, nor could they fully agree with the teaching of Zwingli. A tendency was therefore developed in Germany, under Melancthon, which subsequently found utterance in Calvin, the great theologian of the Reformation. The church in the Palatinate was of this Melancthonian type when Frederick III. became elector. In order to set forth the true doctrine for his people, he appointed Zacharias Ursinus and Caspar Olevianus, professors in the university of Heidelberg, to prepare a Catechism, which was first published in 1563, under his direct supervision. This Catechism became the doctrinal standard of the Reformed Church in Germany, and was adopted by the Reformed churches in Holland, Hungary, Bohemia, and other countries. It is the only doctrinal confession of the German Reformed Church in the United States. In the membership of this church, there is also a number of descendants of Huguenots, whose ancestors came to this country in small colonies, and united with the German Reformed, Dutch Reformed, and Presbyterian churches.

II. ITS ORIGIN AND ORGANIZATION IN AMERICA. — The German immigration to America began as early as 1681, being composed mostly of exiles, who fled to escape persecution in the Palatinate, and seek an asylum in the New World, where they could enjoy religious freedom. This immigration continued at intervals into the following century. Colonies were formed along the Delaware, the Lehigh, the Susquehanna, in New York, Maryland, Virginia, and North and South Carolina. The principal settlement was in Pennsylvania. As early as about 1730 one of the first German Reformed ministers in this country, Rev. George Michael Weiss, reported to the synod of Holland that there were in America many Germans, particularly from the Palatinate and the districts of Nassau, Waldeck, Wittgenstein, and Wetterau, holding to the Reformed Confession. The first German Reformed minister settled among them was Philip Boehm, who came to America in 1720, and followed for a time the calling of schoolmaster, and was then appointed minister over a congregation in Whitpain township, in Montgomery County, in the neighborhood of what is now known as Boehm's Church. Other ministers followed. — George Michael Weiss, Johannes Henricus Goetschey, John Bartholomew Reiger, John Peter Miller, John Bechtel, and in 1746 Michael Schlatter, the missionary father of the German Reformed Church in America (see that art.). The first organization into a cœtus, or synod, was formed Sept. 27, 1747, under the care of the Reformed Classis of Amsterdam, just fifteen days after the first cœtus of the Dutch Reformed Church was organized. In 1747 there were 5 ordained ministers and 46 organized churches. In 1793, at which time the synod was divided into classes, there were 22 ordained ministers, and about 150 churches. Subsequently the Synod of Ohio and adjacent States was organized. Though in friendly relations, there was no organic union between it and the mother-synod. This fact led to a change in the constitution, by which, in 1863, a General Synod was organized, which is the highest judicatory in the church, and is composed of delegates elected by the classes, and meets triennially.

Since 1863 these two synods have become six, and the twenty-six classes that then existed have grown into fifty. During the same period of twenty years (till 1883) the number of ministers has advanced from 447 to 817, and the communicant membership from 98,775 to 163,669.

III. EDUCATIONAL AND BENEVOLENT INSTITUTIONS. — The first organization of a theological seminary was effected at Carlisle, Penn., in 1825, afterwards removed to Mercersburg (1836), and then to Lancaster, Penn.; and the first college was established at Mercersburg in 1836. The church has now under its care and control Franklin and Marshall College and Theological Seminary at Lancaster, Penn., the oldest and most liberally endowed; Heidelberg College and Theological Seminary at Tiffin, O.; Ursinus College and Seminary at Collegeville, Penn.; Catawba College at Newton, N.C.; a collegiate department in connection with a theological seminary at Howard Grove, Wis.; Calvin Institute at Cleveland, O.; Palatinate College at Meyerstown, Penn.; Mercersburg College at Mercersburg, Penn., besides a number of select classical schools and female seminaries. The church has fifteen English periodicals and six German. It carries forward two orphan's homes, — one at Womelsdorf, Berks County, Penn., and one at Butler, Butler County, Penn.; the former having sixty-eight, and the latter forty, orphans under its care.

The Reformed Church maintains a board of foreign missions, which has a mission under its care in Japan; and missionary work is carried on also in India, and among the North-American Indians. It has home missionary boards, which have at present about a hundred missionaries under their care. An important part of the home-mission work refers to the wants of the large immigration from Germany to our shores, a considerable portion of which comes properly under the care of the German Reformed Church.

IV. ITS DOCTRINAL POSITION AND CULTUS. — The Reformed Church in the United States belongs to the large family of Reformed churches in the world which constitutes the greater portion of Evangelical Protestantism. The name "Reformed" came to be applied to all those Reformation churches that were distinguished from the Lutheran Church. They belong to different nations, — England, Scotland, Ireland, France, Switzerland, Holland, Germany, etc.; and they have a number of confessions; but these are all moulded by one general type, with a recognized consensus of doctrine. But, while the Reformed Church in the United States belongs to this general family, it has its distinguishing type of doctrine, cultus, and life.

It differs from the Lutheran Church, in common with all the Reformed churches, in its doctrine of the Lord's Supper, and holds the Calvinistic doctrine of the spiritual real presence of the body and blood of Christ in the holy Eucharist, for believers only. It differs from the Church of England in holding to the parity of the ministry, and the presbyterial form of government, and in its more simple ritual in conducting public worship. It differs, on the other hand, from the strictly Calvinistic Reformed churches, in allowing freedom for more moderate views on the doctrine of predestination. The Heidelberg Catechism teaches substantially the old Augustinian doctrine of natural depravity, and salvation by free grace alone; but it does not teach a double decree, — a decree of reprobation as well as salvation, and leaves room for some difference of views on this mysterious subject. The Catechism gives a central position in its system of doctrine to the Apostles' Creed, and points with special emphasis to the person of Christ as the source of redemption and salvation. It regards the children of the church, being born of Christian parents, and baptized, as standing in the covenant; and this view governs the faith and practice of the church on the subject of educational religion. It is required of her ministers that they shall faithfully instruct the young in the teachings of the Catechism, as the best means of preparing them for confirmation, and for their admission to the Lord's Supper, and full membership in the church. While it makes due account of experimental religion, it regards faithful instruction in the truths of God's word as the best means to be used to lead to this end.

In reference to its mode of public worship, the Reformed Church seeks to combine simplicity with decorum. It provides liturgical forms of service; but it has always allowed a certain degree of freedom in regard to their use, neither imposing such forms upon its congregations, nor forbidding their use. On the subject of liturgical worship, as well as in regard to certain doctrinal views, the church passed through considerable agitation and controversy for a number of years, especially during the rise and progress of the "Mercersburg Theology," which for a time threatened its unity and peace; but the different tendencies at length came to an amicable settlement, by the unanimous adoption of the measure submitted by the Peace Commission, at the general synod held at Tiffin, O., in the year 1881. (See MERCERSBURG THEOLOGY.)

The statistics of the church, as summarized for the year 1888, include under the General Synod six distinct synods, — four of which are English, and two German, — fifty classes (presbyteries), 817 ministers, 1,426 congregations, and 163,669 communicant members.

REGALIA (jus regaliæ, or jus regale). According to the oldest ecclesiastical legislation, any savings made by a bishop or other member of the clergy were to be spent for the interest of the church; and during vacancies the revenues of an episcopal see or other benefice were to be collected and held in the name of the church: Con. Chalcedon. (451), c. 25, Con. Narden. (516), c. 76, Petr. de Marca: De concordia sacerdotii et imperii, viii. 17. During the middle ages, however, the church received fiefs from the State; and such ecclesiastical fiefs were subject to exactly the same rules as the secular fiefs: during a vacancy the State took the revenues. The custom was general in France from the middle of the twelfth century, and in England even earlier. But while the king tried to extend his right of regalia to all ecclesiastical property, regardless of its historical origin, the Pope labored to abolish the right of regalia altogether; and sharp conflicts arose, as, for instance, between Boniface VIII. and Philip the Fair. By the aid of his Parliaments, Philip was able to vindicate his right; and it was formally recognized by Clement V. and Gregory XI. (see Petr. de Marca, c. 24). There were, however, in France several episcopal sees, — in the province of Bordeaux, in Provence and Dauphiné, — which were exempted from the royal claims; and when Louis XIV. simply in order to carry out consistently his idea of royal sovereignty, extended his right of regalia also to those sees, it came to a violent embroilment between him and Innocent XI. The general assembly of the French clergy sided with the king in a declaration of Feb. 3, 1682, which was confirmed by a royal edict of March 20, 1682; and, though Innocent XI. condemned the declaration as null and void, he had no means of enforcing his verdict directly. He chose an indirect way: he refused to confirm the bishops appointed by the king; and, as his successors followed the same policy, the affairs of the French Church soon fell into utter confusion, until a compromise was brought about under Innocent XII. See GASPARD ANDOUL. De l'origine de la régale, Paris, 1708; PHILLIPS: Das Regalienrecht in Frankreich, 1873.

REGENERATION. The idea of redemption leads directly to that of regeneration. For Christ's sake, sin is forgiven: the faithful is redeemed from the curse of his guilt. He is justified; that is, the fundamental condition for a communion between him and God is present. That communion, however, cannot be realized, unless man—whose natural tendency previously was towards sin, and against God—is internally transformed, and made another with respect to the very centre of his personal life. Nor does God forgive, or justify, or restore to favor, without communicating his own spirit: so that man, from the moment his sins are forgiven him, and his guilt is blotted out, feels within himself the germ of a new life, and the power to rise above his former misery; for the inner transformation is a real regeneration. A new man is born. It is not a simple restoration which takes place, a restoration by which man returns to the state of innocence and righteousness and grace before the fall, but a new creation by the quickening spirit of the lost Adam (1 Cor. xv. 45).

The testimony of Scripture concerning regeneration gradually develops under the old dispensation, and in the New Testament it stands forth in full definiteness. The Mosaic law, placing the divine will over against the human will, as the norm and rule of the latter, steadily inculcates the necessity of a moral conversion. Very characteristic in this respect are the passages in Deut. x. 16 and xxx. 6: the demand of the circumcision of the heart, the promise that God will circumcise the heart of his people, and the purpose of that demand and that promise, which is the love of God. But a total transformation of the inner man is not expressed by that simile. Still more characteristic is, for instance, Ps. li., referring in definite and very impressive terms to the gifts from above which the sinful man needs in order to begin a new moral life; not simply the forgiveness of sin, but the restoration of a clean heart, and the renewal of a right spirit. But even here a regeneration in the full sense of the word is only hinted at in a vague way. Quite otherwise in the New Testament. Jesus, too, insists upon conversion as the final aim of all his preaching; but the moral character to be accomplished is "perfection," and the religious character to be realized is "sonship" (Matt. v. 9). The agency is the Word, which falls like a seed into the soul (Mark iv. 26); and the process is that of being born anew, born of God (John iii. 3). In the apostolic writings, and more especially in the Epistles of Paul, the occult depths of this act of new birth, its various stages, and their internal relations, are set forth with matchless lucidity and impressiveness.

Not so in the after-apostolic age. Regeneration as a divine act became gradually connected with baptism in such a way that the whole ethical process, with the subjective appropriation of the divine grace, was swallowed up by a magical conception of the divine activity. When grown-up persons were baptized, the demand of faith, penitence, etc., was, of course, not abandoned; but faith itself was considered a kind of offering from man to God, rather than the organ through which divine grace was to be received, and moral conversion to be effected; and as infant baptism became more and more general in the church, the magical view of regeneration also spread. What little the scholastic theology of the middle ages had to say of regeneration, it presented under the head of gratia infusio, the first stage of justification. (See THOMAS AQUINAS: Summa, Pt. 2, 1, quest. 110.) And the Council of Trent, when fixing and systematizing the doctrines of the Roman-Catholic Church, had nothing to add to the meagre definitions of the schoolmen. It was, indeed, the German mystics, who, during the middle ages, kept alive the idea of regeneration. (See BÖHRINGER: Die deutschen Mystiker, 1855.) In the soul, Tauler says, which has become pregnant with the eternal Word, God bears his Son; and the man in whose soul that takes place is thereby born himself anew, a son of God. However deeply the mystics penetrated into the mysteries of this process, and however sedulously they investigated its ethical development, they always represented the state of man before regeneration, not as a positive degradation and guilt, but simply as a natural deficiency common to all creation.

At this point the Reformation effected a radical modification. Luther placed the idea of regeneration in the closest connection with those of forgiveness of sin, reconciliation with God, and justification; and the only essential difference on this point between him and Calvin was the emphasis he laid on the contritio, the pangs of conscience, as a preparation for regeneration, while Calvin referred the act more directly to the reconciliation with God through Christ. Too soon, however, the orthodox party, jealous of keeping the doctrine of justification pure, began to neglect the serious practical labor in behalf of the true internal transformation; but the corrective was rapidly and energetically given by Arndt and Spener. Spener wished to remain true to the orthodox doctrine of the Church; but he could not help reproaching the preachers of his time because they spoke too little of the power of faith as a heavenly light destined to bear the soul anew. The controversy between the pietists and the orthodox was, however, on this point confined to the question whether the intellectual light was or was not conditioned by a preceding moral conversion. By the rationalists not only that question, but the whole subject, was set aside; and with the exception of some remarkable allusions in the Kantian philosophy, and some singular insinuations in the Hegelian, it was abandoned to neglect, until revived by Schleiermacher, who gave it a solution as deep as ingenuous, and strictly evangelical in its whole bearing. [In popular religious books, "conversion" and "regeneration" are often used as synonymous terms. But they are properly to be distinguished, as in the Bible, where regeneration (ἀναγέννησις) is the act of God, and conversion (μετάνοια) is the act of man, who is exhorted to repent, and turn to God.]

REGULA FIDEI (rule of faith). This term was used by the Fathers of the second half of the second century and of the third century to designate the sum of Christian doctrine as based upon the formula of baptism, and accepted by the orthodox church. Irenæus, Tertullian, and Origen have preserved the earliest form. Irenæus (Hær., i. 10) says, "The church, although it is scattered to the ends of the earth, has received from the apostles and their disciples the faith in one God, the Almighty Father, Maker of heaven," etc. Tertullian dwells upon the rule of faith in his De præscr. Hæret., and in his De veland. virg. says, "The rule of faith is everywhere the same, alone unchangeable and immovable." Origen's statement (περί αρχών) is very important, when he says, "Because many of those who profess to believe in Christ differ not only in the smallest things, but also in the greatest, therefore it seems necessary to lay down beforehand a fixed line and clear rule (certain lineam manifestamque regulam ponere) about single matters."

These are the oldest utterances about the rule of faith. What conclusion are we to draw from them and the rules of faith in the treatise De trinitate seu regula fidei connected with Novatian's name, the so-called "Catholic teaching" of the Apostolic Constitutions (vi. 11), etc.? The substance of them all is essentially the same, and indicates an incontestable connection with the ancient Roman formula of baptism. This rule of faith was not identical with the Apostles' Creed, which was the accredited formula of baptism for the church. Called now lex fidei, fides legitima, regula veritatis, linea, mensura, canon, tradition, etc., it was simply a statement of the subjects of Christian faith based upon the New Testament and oral tradition. It is probable that the first attempts to formulate such a statement date back to the apostolic age, although the earliest account we have is that of Irenæus. At first it was probably a simple statement of the doctrine of the Trinity, which Tertullian calls "the substance of the New Testament (c. Præxian, 31). Subsequently polemical affirmations were added in defence against the heresies. Thus formulated, it no doubt formed an important part of the instruction of the catechumens. Irenæus (i. 9, 4) says the believer has in himself "the norm of the truth (τὸν κανόνα τῆς ἀληθείας) having received it in baptism."

In the Occident, the rule of faith was developed out of the formula of baptism. In the Orient, on the contrary, it seems to have influenced the formula of baptism; or, in other words, the formula of baptism adapted itself from time to time to the anti-heretical doctrinal statements of distinguished ecclesiastical leaders. The formula which the presbyters in Smyrna in 230 opposed to Noetus is quite similar to the old Roman formula of baptism, and the Apostles' Creed in Latin seems to have been a translation from the Greek (Caspari, iii. 251-263). The Nicæno-Constantinopolitan Creed (see art.) of 381 is nothing else than the first oecumenical formula of baptism enlarged. This creed is still used as the formula of baptism in the Eastern Church.

In the Protestant churches the numerous, and, for the most part, bulky confessions are substituted for the rule of faith. The Roman Catholic theologians now pretty generally understand by the expression the utterances of the infallible Church and Pope. See CASPARI: *Quellen zur Gesch. d. Taufsymbols u. d. REGULARS are those who have made their vows in some religious house, such as monks. A regular priest is in some order, while a secular priest lives in the world. Regular benefices were only conferred on regular priests. Regular places are those within the boundary of a convent, as the cloister, dormitory, chapter, and refectory.

REHOBOAM (enlarger of the people), son of Solomon by the Ammonite princess Naamah (1 Kings xiv. 21), and his successor in his forty-first year. He reigned seventeen years, and was himself succeeded by his son Abijah (Abijam), the child of his favorite wife Maachah (Michaiah), the granddaughter of Absalom (1 Kings xv. 2). To the new king at Shechem, assembled Israel brought their grievances, and prayed their amelioration. But he answered harshly, foolishly following the counsel of the contemporary advisers; and then Israel revolted, and under Jeroboam set up a rival kingdom. Only Judah and a part of Benjamin remained loyal to Rehoboam. Between the two kingdoms there was naturally constant friction, giving rise at times to bloodshed (1 Kings xiv. 30); but the prophet Shemaiah repressed Re-hoboam's desire to put down the revolt by force (1 Kings xii. 24; 2 Chron. xi. 4). Rehoboam, apprehending an attack from Egypt,—instigated by Jeroboam, or by the known wealth of Jerusalem,—fortified the south and west boundaries of his country (2 Chron. xi. 5 sqq.). But Shishak (Sesonchis), the first king of the twenty-second dynasty, in the fifth year of Rehoboam marched against him, captured the fenced cities, and "took away the treasures of the house of the Lord and of the king's house" (2 Chron. xi. 9). This glorious victory is portrayed upon the walls of a small temple finished by Shishak on the south side of the great Temple of Karnak, near the present Luxor, on the Nile. The remainder of Rehoboam's reign was passed in comparative peace, but "he prepared not his heart to seek the Lord." He had eighteen wives and sixty concubines, who bore him twenty-eight sons, whom he made governors of as many cities (2 Chron. xi. 21, 22). Unfortunately, the chronology of Shishak is uncertain; and therefore Rehoboam's dates are variously given as 975-957 (usual reckoning), 955-965 (Ewald), 977-960 (Thenius). [Besides the art. REICHEL, Johann Friedrich, a Moravian bishop; b. at Leuba, Altenburg, Germany, May 16, 1731; d. at Berthelsdorf, Saxony, Nov. 17, 1809. He joined the Moravians after he had for four years served as a Lutheran minister, and was for forty years on the executive board of the Unitas Fratrum. In 1775 he was consecrated bishop, and made very extensive episcopal visits, going as far east as the Cape of Good Hope and the East Indies, and as far west as the American Colonies. He staid for four years (1778-82) in America, and healed many a breach occasioned by the Revolutionary War.

REID, Thomas, D.D., professor of moral philosophy, Glasgow; father of Scotch philosophy; was b. at Strachan, Kincardineshire, Scotland, April 26, 1710; d. at Glasgow, Oct. 7, 1796. His father, Rev. Lewis Reid, was parish minister at Strachan. His mother was Margaret Gregory, daughter of David Gregory, Esq., of Kinairdie, Banffshire, and sister of three professors,—one of astronomy, at Oxford; the other two, of mathematics,—the one at St. Andrews, the other at Edinburgh. Thomas Reid was a student in Marischal College, Aberdeen, there being two colleges in the Granite City of the North. Afterwards he was appointed librarian to the college, which office he held till he was twenty-six years of age. A year later he was ordained minister of New Machar, Aberdeenshire, to which he was presented by King's College, Aberdeen. He married his cousin, Elizabeth Reid, daughter of Dr. George R. Reid, physician, London. While a minister, he devoted a great part of his time to philosophic study. His first effort as an author was a paper submitted to the Royal Society of London, and published in the Transactions, when he was thirty-eight years of age. This was a criticism of some positions in Hutcheson's Inquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue; Hutcheson being at the time professor of moral philosophy at Glasgow,—the position which Reid was afterwards to hold. In 1752 Reid was elected professor of philosophy in King's College, Aberdeen; the duties of the chair, however, requiring the teaching of physical as well as mental philosophy. Twelve years later (1761) he published his Inquiry into the Human Mind; and in the same year he was elected professor of moral philosophy in the university of Glasgow, as immediate successor to Adam Smith, afterwards author of The Wealth of Nations, who had succeeded Hutcheson in the chair. The Inquiry was an investigation into the conditions of knowledge, and produced a deep impression as a bold and resolute defence of the certainty of human knowledge against the scepticism which Hume had developed out of the theory of ideas then current. Its title was, An Inquiry into the Human Mind, on the Principles of Common Sense. This formal introduction of the phrase "common sense" by and by afforded the descriptive appellation of the Scotch philosophy, "the philosophy of common sense." The phrase had aptness for the end contemplated, and yet awkwardness, on account of its popular use as an equivalent for "good sense," or sagacity. Its consequent ambiguity led to mistaken applications and mis-pent criticism. What Reid meant by the phrase was that any adequate inquiry into the human mind must disclose certain principles or axiomatic truths common to all intelligence, as essential to a sound philosophy as to a healthy intellect. As in the philosophy of Locke, all knowledge had been traced to sensation and reflection, Reid took "sense" in the wide meaning of knowledge; and "common sense" was a knowledge common to all the race. In effect, Reid's title meant "an inquiry into the human mind, on the principles common to rational beings;" and his motto was a quotation from the Book of Job, "The inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding." Thus he suggested the form of his theory,—the creation of intelligence implies communication of the first principles of knowledge. All language suggesting that some men are highly endowed with a faculty of common sense, and perceive by special insight what others fail to recognize, is language wide of Reid's formula of common sense, and quite alien to his theory. See Hamilton's Note A, in Reid's Works, 742.

When he had prepared his reply to Hume, he submitted the manuscript in parts to the author of a Treatise of Human Nature, and received from Hume a friendly reply, reserving full judgment until the book appeared. Hume acknowledged having read it "with great pleasure and attention," adding, "It is certainly very rare that a piece so deeply philosophical is wrote with so much spirit, and affords so much entertainment to the reader." In reply to this, Reid said to Hume, "I have learned more from your writings in this kind than from all other put together." (STEWART'S Life of Reid; STEWART'S Works, x. 256; Reid's Works by HAMILTON, pp. 8, 91; BURTON'S Life of Hume, ii. 153-156.) Of Reid, Hill Burton says, "His was the greatest mind which set itself in opposition to Hume's system in British literature; and he was great because he examined the works of the sceptical philosopher, not in the temper of a wrangler or partisan, but in the honest spirit of an investigator, who is bound either to believe in the arguments he is examining, or to set against them a system which will satisfy his own mind and the minds of other honest thinkers" (Life of Hume, ii. 151). Reid did set himself to develop a system, which he offered to the acceptance of honest thinkers as a refutation of the scepticism of Hume, by refuting the theory of ideas previously in favor among philosophers. But in doing this Reid acknowledged, as Kant also afterwards did in a very similar manner, that he was indebted to Hume for rousing him to the task of criticising the popular philosophy, and endeavoring to replace it by another which could endure the test of sceptical argumentation.

Reid's Inquiry into the Human Mind is an investigation into the relations of mind to the special senses, dealing in succession with smelling, tasting, hearing, touch, seeing. The work shows that Reid had given considerable attention to the physiology of the senses; though it cannot meet the requirements of present knowledge as to the structure of the terminal organs of the special senses, and their relation to the brain. Considering the period of its publication, it sufficiently refutes the allegation that mental philosophers have shown themselves ignorant and indifferent as to the relations of mental phenomena to physiological facts. His main purpose is to show the ample warrant we have for trusting the information gathered by the senses, and constructing a theory of things by the application of rational principles. In point of form, his method is to confront scepticism with the bulwarks of common sense. Unhappily his favorite phrase, "common sense," is at times used vaguely, and does not always meet the requirements of philosophic procedure. At one time it seems as if "common sense" were opposed to philosophy; at another, as if it were essential to it; but commonly his reasoning is clear and forcible, and ambiguities are easily brought into harmony with the general drift of the argument. Thus, when he says, somewhat angrily, somewhat boldly, and rather unwisely in both respects, "If thou hast not power to dispel those clouds and phantoms which thou hast discovered or created . . . I despise philosophy, and renounce its guidance, — let my soul dwell with common sense" (Inquiry, sect. iii.), he seems to favor the allegation that this theory of common sense is not a philosophy, but is at variance with the deeper spirit of philosophy. But he means no more in this than to express strongly his detestation of "the received philosophy," the philosophy of ideas, which had furnished scepticism with its weapons. And in truth he is no more scornful of the popular philosophy of the time than Kant was of the "dogmatic philosophy." Reid's exaggerated words have been freely condemned by his own followers. Dugald Stewart and Hamilton, who distinguished themselves for their defence of the philosophy of common sense. But Reid's real intention is apparent when he complains, of the received philosophy, that her votaries "have endeavored to extend her jurisdiction beyond its first limits, and to call to her bar the dictates of common sense." Then he adds, "In reality, common sense holds nothing of philosophy, nor needs her aid. But, on the other hand, philosophy (if I may be permitted to change the metaphor) has no other root but the principles of common sense" (Inquiry, sect. iv.). By this he means that the essential conditions of intelligence are given to all men, so that intellect does not need to wait on philosophy for warrant of her procedure; while, on the contrary, all sound philosophy must start with unreserved acknowledgment of the principles of intelligence, which he would name "common sense." Equally for the weapons of defence against scepticism, and for the foundations of a structure in which a thinker can dwell with satisfaction, he turns to the "principles which irresistibly govern the belief and the conduct of all mankind in the common concerns of life." To find out what these principles are is the necessary and most momentous task of a philosophy which would present us with a scheme of the conditions of human knowledge.

The form of philosophy which Reid had thus described and introduced, he further vindicated and developed in his Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man (published in 1785), for which, also, he took as motto a quotation from Job, "Who hath put wisdom in the inward parts?" and in his Essays on the Active Powers of Man (published in 1788), for which the motto on titlepage was from the prophet Micah, "He hath showed thee, O man, what is good." These three works present us with Reid's answer to Hume, and they unify and give the result of his achievements in attempting to construct a theory of knowledge. His first and essential position was gained in showing that the use of the senses implies constant exercise of judgment, and that this implies fundamental principles of thought which could be neither demonstrated, nor disputed, nor dispensed with. His next position was reached in laying open to view certain first principles in reasoning which are essential to intelligence. "The judgment follows the apprehension of them necessarily; and both are equally the work of nature and the result of our original powers" (Intellectual Powers, essay vi. chap. iv.). These are axioms, first principles, principles of common sense, common notions, self-evident truths. His third position was reached when he entered the domain of morals, and maintained, in reference to our knowledge of moral truths, that there "must be in morals, as in other sciences, first principles which do not derive their evidence from any antecedent principles, but may be said to be intuitively discerned" (Intellectual Powers, essay vii. chap. ii.). Such is Reid's theory, often involved in considerable obscurity of statement, at times adopting forms of expression which favor the view that there is a measure of intellectual constraint holding man in subjection; but in the main a clear and strong vindication of the adequacy of intelligence as a guide to certainty. He had not Kant's distinction between reasoning and reason; he did not grasp Kant's problem, How is a knowledge a priori possible to mind? (see art. KANT): but, when treating of judgment as the ruling power in mind, he clearly distinguished those two functions, — to reason, and to recognize first principles apart from reasoning. "We ascribe to reason two offices or two degrees. The first is to judge of things self-evident: the second is to draw conclusions that are not self-evident from those that are. The first of these is the province, and the sole province, of common sense; and therefore it coincides with reason in its whole extent" (Intellectual Powers, essay vi. chap. ii.). Even though it be granted that there is in Reid's works a want of philosophic exactness and metaphysical range, there is a sagacity, a breadth of reflection, and a massiveness of thought, fully accounting for the power of his philosophy in Britain, France, and America. II. CALDERWOOD.

REIHING, Jakob, b. at Augsburg, 1579; d. at Tübingen, May 5, 1628. He entered the Jesuit order; taught theology and philosophy in their seminaries at Ingolstadt and Dillingen; and was in 1613 appointed court-preacher to the apostate count-palatine, Wolfgang William. He took a very active part in the Romanization of the Palatinate, but the careful study of the Bible which he found necessary in order to dispute with the Protestants had its influence. In the beginning of 1621 he suddenly fled to Stuttgart, and towards the close of the same year he formally embraced Protestantism. In 1622 he was made professor of theology at Tübingen. His writings are mostly polemical, first against the Protestants, afterwards against the Jesuits: they are described in his life by OEHLER, in MARIOTT'S Wahrn Protestanten, iii. 1854.

REIMARUS, Hermann Samuel, the author of the famous Wolfenbüttel Fragments, b. at Hamburg, Dec. 22, 1694; d. there March 1, 1768. He studied philology at Jena and Wittenberg; travelled in Holland and England; and was appointed rector of the gymnasium in Weimar, 1723, and in Hamburg, 1729. He was a pupil of Wolff, and one of the most radical among German rationalists. He published Diss. de assessoribus Siquidem Magni, Hamburg, 1751, and Die vornehmsten Wahrheiten der natürlichen Religion, Hamburg, 1754. His life was written in Latin by Büsch. See also sketch in Eng. trans. of the Fragments (Lond., vol. i., 1879), and art. WOLFENBÜTTEL FRAGMENTS.

REINHARD, Franz Volkmar, b. at Vohenstrauß in the Upper Palatinate, March 12, 1753; d. in Dresden, Sept. 6, 1812. He studied theology at Wittenberg, and was appointed professor there in 1780, and court-preacher in Dresden in 1792. He was a rational supranaturalist, that is, one of those rationalists who still retained the principal tenets of supranaturalism, the divinity of Christ, and the absolute authority of the Bible. His System der christlichen Moral, Sulzbach, 1788-1815, 5 vols., was several times re-printed; but he exercised the greatest influence as a preacher. His collected sermons comprise thirty-five volumes. See his Gedächtnisse, Sulzbach, 1810, and TZSCHIRNER'S Briefe, Leipzig, 1811, thereby occasioned. His life was written by BÖTTIGER, Dresden, 1813, and PÖLITZ, 1801-04, 4 vols. Cf. Palmer's art. in Herzog.

RELAND, Hadrian, b. at Ryp, near Alkmaar, July 17, 1676; d. at Utrecht, Feb. 5, 1718. He studied Oriental languages and ecclesiastical antiquities in Amsterdam, and was in 1699 appointed professor at Utrecht. His principal theological works are, Analecta rabbinica, Utrecht, 1702; De religione Mohammedica, 1705 (in which he tried to give a more accurate and impartial representation of the religion of Mohammed); Antiquitates sacræ veterum Hebræorum, 1705 (best edition by VOGEL, Halle, 1769); Palæstina ex monumentis veteribus illustrata, 1714 (his chief work, often re-printed, in which he displays such comprehensive learning and so much penetration and power of analysis, that it still remains the foundation of all study of ancient Palestine); De spoliis templi Hierosolymitani in arcu Titiano, 1716 (new edition by SCHULZE, Utrecht, 1775).

RELICS. The Latin word reliquia meant "remains," and was in that sense adopted by the Church, where, however, while on the one side its application was confined to the remains of saints and martyrs, it was on the other extended to every thing which had been in bodily contact with the deceased. Thus the church of Jerusalem boasted of the possession of the episcopal chair of James as a precious relic (EUSEBIUS: Hist. Eccl., VII. 19). The worship of relics developed with the worship of martyrs. The possession of the corpse of a martyr was held to guarantee the continuous communication between the deceased and the congregation; hence the custom of gathering around the tomb of the martyr for the celebration of the Eucharist. Though the worship of relics originally had to overcome a certain aversion founded on the views of the Old Testament concerning the uncleanness of a corpse, it easily succeeded, as may be seen from the Apostolical Constitutions, lib. vi. At the time of Constantine it was in full bloom; and the Greek Fathers of that and the next periods are unanimous in their recommendations (EUSEBIUS: Preparatio evang., 13, 11; GREGORY NAZIANZEN: Orat. in Cyp., 17; GREGORY NYSSA: Oratio in Theod., 740; BASIL: Epistolæ II. 197; CHRYSOSTOM: Laud. Dros., p. 683; THEODORET: In Psalm., 67, 11). In the West it also found zealous defenders (Jerome and Paulinus of Nola). From the latter, as well as from Gregory of Tours, it appears that people in general considered relics to be the bearers of some hidden miraculous power; and it became necessary to protect by laws the corpses of martyrs from being cut into pieces (Concl. Theod., ix. 17, 7). But so great was the credulity and superstition of the people, that the laws proved in vain. The church authorized this superstition to a certain extent by decreeing that relics should be deposited in every altar. Ambrose refused to consecrate a church when it had no relics (Ep. 22 ad Marcell.); and though the synod of Agde (506) simply demanded the anointing and benediction of altars, the seventh œcumenical synod of Nicæa (787) forbade the bishops, under penalty of excommunication, to consecrate a church without relics; and the synod of Mayence (888) presupposes that even the portable altars contain relics. In the Roman-Catholic Church the mediæval superstition is still maintained; while the whole Protestant world had adopted the views of Luther, set forth in his Larger Catechism: "'Tis but a dead thing which sanctifies nobody."

RELIGION AND REVELATION are correlative terms; that is, the relation in which man places himself to God in religion presupposes the relation in which God has placed himself to man in revelation. Without revelation there can be no religion; and it is a fact which should not be overlooked, that even those, who, on account of their idea of God, absolutely reject the idea of a direct divine revelation, recognizing nothing but Nature in her material existence and mechanical working, cannot help applying to Nature expressions and conceptions which tend to raise her above the dumb necessity, and constitute her a higher being, capable of moral relations; nor can they for a longer period escape a feeling of thirst after revelations of the secret depths of that being which they then strive to attain by ways more or less mystical and magical.

1. Religion—either from relegere, “to read over,” i.e., to reflect upon what has been written (Cicero), or from religare, “to bind” (Lactantius)—means the conscious relation between man and God, and the expression of that relation in human conduct. It has thus, though it presupposes certain objective conditions both for its origin and for its farther development, a purely subjective character, forming the innermost centre of the human personality, and the only true basis of spiritual growth. But, in spite of its decidedly subjective character, religion is as much a social as an individual affair. Not to speak of the specifically Christian ideal of the kingdom of heaven to be established here on earth by the Christian congregations, in all spheres of the human consciousness,—in the religious no less than in the moral, and in the moral no less than in the intellectual,—reciprocal contact between individual and individual is the general condition of development. Thus originate common forms of the religious consciousness and common forms of its expression in actual life; and thus the word “religion” assumed a new sense, an objective sense,—so objective, indeed, that not only there spring up many different religions, but it becomes possible for an individual to have religion without being religious, to stand in an external relation of recognition and obedience to a certain form of religion, without standing in any living relation to God himself.

It is the business of Christian science by a searching analysis to find those elements which constitute religion, and which must be present in all religious life, even on its lowest and most primitive stage, and to represent the psychological process by which the actual formation of a religion takes place. The New Testament gives a few but very important notices on the subject, which fully sustain the above propositions concerning the relation between religion and revelation (Rom. i. 18 sqq.; Acts xiv. 17, xvii. 27; John i. 19). From a comparison of the various Pagan religions it is apparent, that originally all religious life started from an impression of an overwhelming power; which impression could not fail to engender fear, as it was accompanied by a complete ignorance of the true nature and character of the power observed. But fear naturally leads to attempts at reconciling that which is feared; and as the understanding develops, and one light is lighted after the other, the attempts at reconciliation will result in a partial willingness to submit. Finally, when the idea of personal will holding the power dawns upon the consciousness, the willingness to submit will grow into a desire to obey; and religious life has thus reached the highest stage of development which it can attain within the bounds of Paganism. The old dispensation may be referred back to the covenant which God made with Abram: “And when Abram was ninety years old and nine, the Lord appeared to Abram, and said unto him, I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect. And I will make my covenant between me and thee, and will multiply thee exceedingly” (Gen. xvii. 1, 2). Here, too, the emphasis is laid upon the omnipotence of God, before whom it behooves man to walk in fear. But a new element, which in Paganism never reached beyond the dim dream, is here added in the form of direct promise,—the love of God to Abram: “And I will multiply thee exceedingly.” The law with its prescripts, and the prophets with their promises, made the outlines of the old dispensation still more precise and definite. At the same time they introduced a new element in religious life,—that of understanding the will of God, that of true human wisdom; which element, however, was never severed from its moral complement; for “the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom: a good understanding have all they that do his commandments” (Ps. cxi. 10). Under the new dispensation, love, God’s love to man, appears as the true centre of religious life, instead of fear, man’s fear of God. Man has become chiefly receiving. The words of life, forgiveness of sin, the sonship of God, eternal life, etc., is offered him, and he has only to take it. But how? By faith. Faith, however, though a sacrifice of one’s self, a submission of one’s own righteousness to the righteousness of God (Rom. x. 3), and consequently a moral act which cannot be accomplished without the aid of God (1 Cor. ii. 5), has a much more strongly pronounced intellectual character than the wisdom of the old dispensation, because that which shall be accepted, that to which man shall surrender himself, is the truth. Christ calls himself the truth (John xiv. 6), and even the possession of eternal life is referred back to the knowledge of the truth (John xvii. 3). Thus the elements of religion, though always the same, change as religion grows from its first germ in Paganism to its full maturity in Christianity.

A scientific treatment, however, of the subject was not attempted until quite recent times. The Reformation made a beginning with its comprehensive and penetrating analysis of faith as the informing centre of all religious life. In the Confessio Augustana and the Apologia, faith, as the confidence that in Christ the grace of God has been offered to us, is represented as an act of the will; and this moral act is again represented as the necessary condition of any true knowledge of God. But the old Protestant, more especially the Lutheran, theologians, very soon left that track. Calovius, Quenstedt, Buddæus, J. Gerhard—they all represent the moral act in faith as preceded by a theoretical acceptance of the divinely revealed truth, thus making the basis of faith purely intellectual; and in this they were followed both by the rationalists and the supernaturalists. The treatment of the subject received a much more powerful impulse from the development of German philosophy; though at times it looked as if philosophy were about to dissolve, and finally supersede religion. Kant excluded the idea of God from the competency of theoretical reason, and made it a mere postulate of practical reason: the existence of God is necessary for the realization of the highest good. But thus religion was defined as a mere recognition of our duties as divine commandments; that is, it was made a mere appendix to morals, and its innermost kernel, the direct relation between man and God, was set aside as something irrelevant. The opposite extreme was developed by Hegel. He considered all existence an evolution of the spirit. But the true character of spirit is thought; and the thinking of man, of the human spirit, of the subject, is the medium in which God, the divine spirit, the absolute, becomes conscious of itself. This process in its lowest form,—in the form of feeling, to be distinguished from the form of imagination (art) and the form of pure thought (philosophy),—Hegel called religion; that is, while Kant had made religion a simple, practical matter, Hegel made it a merely theoretical interest. A reaction against those extremes was started by Jacobi and Schleiermacher. Both agreed in deriving religion from feeling, in making feeling the proper sphere of religion, the place in which it has its roots. But there was, nevertheless, a considerable difference between them. "Faith in God is an instinct in man," said Jacobi: "when spoken to, it will answer." But, in order to reach full clearness in his relation to God, Jacobi held that man must rise above his own nature, because nature with its continuous web of cause and effect conceals God, and approach God as a free being, free of the necessity of nature. This rising above nature in order to reach freedom, Schleiermacher completely discarded; making the relation between man and God much deeper and much more direct, and finding its true expression, not in an instinct, ready to respond whenever it is touched, but in a never-dying feeling of absolute dependence. As representing the stand-point of Kant may be mentioned Wegscheider; Hegel is represented by Daub and Marheinecke; Schleiermacher by Nitzsch, Twisten, and Dörner. An attempt to go beyond Schleiermacher may be observed in Lipsius, Biedermann, and Pfeiderer, members of the so-called critical school.

2. Christian faith and Christian theology recognize, and have always recognized, both that religion in general would be impossible without a direct activity for the purpose from the side of God, and that specially the Christian religion is the result of such an activity. In details, and more especially with reference to the different religions, the views of the character and nature of that activity may vary considerably; but there is general agreement with respect to its principal features,—that it must be a direct communication between the divine will and the human consciousness, that is, have the character of a revelation; and that the revelation must present, for acceptance by man, truths which give a new form to religious life, and tend to gather communities or congregations which strive to express this new form. But the question then arises, whether that activity is identically the same at the origin of every religion,—like human nature, like the laws of spiritual development,—or whether the biblical revelation on which the Christian religion rests is the result of a special activity of a peculiar kind, which, in contradistinction from the general activity, may be designated as extraordinary and supernatural. Cf. AUBERLEN: Die göttliche Offenbarung, Basel, 1861; ROTHE: Zur Dogmatik, Gotha, 1862; A. E. KRAUSS: Die Lehre von der Offenbarung, Gotha, 1868.

The New Testament (for the Old Testament see F. E. KÖNIG: Der Offenbarungsbegriff des N. T., 1882, 2 vols.) speaks of a revealing activity of God, under the influence of which religious life has developed; but directly it makes no distinction between a general and a special revelation. The two terms it uses to express its ideas, φανερον and ἀποκαλύπτειν, it applies promiscuously, both to the general manifestation of God in his creation and to the specific Christian revelation. Indirectly, however, the distinction is present. The revelations reported in Scripture—the signs, miracles, prophecies, and other manifestations to the ear and the eye, culminating in the incarnation—form a continuous series, a logically connected totality, discovering the divine scheme of salvation. And to this revelation in the objective world corresponds a revelation in the subjective world. The final reason why so large a portion of the human race remained outside of the communion with God established by the old dispensation was, according to Paul (Rom. i.), the lack of power to comprehend the plans of God, the loss of the very organ for the divine truth; it being impossible to appropriate this special revelation without an internal resuscitation and revival. In the theology of the Reformers, this distinction between a general revelation, which can only prevent man from being overwhelmed in his own sin, and a special revelation, which alone can carry him safely to salvation, is set forth with great sharpness. The old orthodox theologians even made a distinction, with respect to the special revelation, between a revelatio immediata, made to the prophets and apostles, and a revelatio mediata, made to us through them. Nevertheless, the distinction was soon threatened with complete dissolution, and the attack came from two different points. On the one side, the general depravity of the race, which made a special revelation (objective as well as subjective) necessary, was denied; and; on the other side, the human intellect was supposed to be able to reach by itself the very truths of revelation, which made revelation itself superfluous. See the arts. on SOCINIANISM and RATIONALISM.

A strong re-action against rationalism, and its conception of religion as a merely intellectual recognition of the higher truths, naturally sprang up in the very moment, when, with Jacobi and Schleiermacher, the feeling, and not the intellect, was pointed out as the true source of religion; and a necessary result of that re-action was a complete remodelling of the relation between religion and revelation,—a complete reversion of the relation established by rationalism. The idea of revelation, almost extinguished by rationalism, now came to great honor. Yet it is a question, whether the distinction between the general and a special revelation, which Christian apologetics absolutely must insist upon, is not more radically hurt by the new theory than it ever could be by any of the propositions of rationalism. According to Jacobi, every strong religious emotion is a revelation, and outside of this inner enthusiasm there is no revelation; for God is felt only in secret, and the Word, which by itself reveals nothing, is set only to prove and corroborate the revelations of the inspiration. More especially the term "revelation" is applied to such productions of the religious spirit as exercised a decisive influence in wide circles and for long periods. But what difference is here between revelation and inspiration in the sphere of faith, in religion, and genius and originality in the sphere of imagination, in art? Schleiermacher put the so-called natural religion out of the world as a mere abstraction, and defined revelation as the product of a direct, divine activity. But, unable to give his definition the necessary preciseness, he was compelled to recognize every idea which rose in the soul, and could not be explained from external influences, as a revelation. Hence his exertions to stretch the supernatural and supra-reasonable in Christianity, until it will connect with nature and reason, or, rather, his exertions to raise nature and reason until they can reach the supernatural and supra-reasonable. Among the theologians after Schleiermacher, some — Richard Rothe, Isaac August Dörner, etc. — vindicate with great emphasis the claims of Christianity upon an extraordinary, supernatural origin; while others, the critical school, — Lipsius, Biedermann, etc., — hold that all religions rest in the same manner upon revelations. J. KÖSTLIN.

RELIGION, The Philosophy of, comprises two elements, — one historical, and one metaphysical, — which must be present, equally developed, and organically combined. On the one side, religion is a fact whose origin and manifold relations must be explained; on the other, that fact claims to contain the final truth, and the claim must be investigated. But a perfect fusion of these two elements is difficult, and the difficulty explains the late development of this branch of philosophy.

Researches concerning the final cause of existence and the true nature of consciousness are as old as philosophy itself; and during the middle ages a relation actually sprang up between metaphysics and religion, so far as the first part of the representation of the theological system generally occupied itself with the question, whether man is able to demonstrate the existence of God, and form a just idea of his nature, without the aid of a direct revelation. But the relation remained barren. Philosophy and religion were more and more sharply separated from each other, the former being confined to that which is mathematically demonstrable, the latter to that which is directly revealed; and an application of the results of metaphysical researches to the various forms of religion was impossible, simply because the history of religion was not yet written. Judaism and Christianity were the only religions known: even concerning Mohammedanism ignorance prevailed. In the latter part of the seventeenth century, however, the study of religion began. The first work of the kind was A. ROSS: A View of all the Religions of the World, 1652; which was often reprinted, and translated into French and German. Then followed HOFMANN: Umbra in luce sive consensus et dissensus religionum profanorum, Jena, 1680; JURIEU: Histoire critique des dogmes et des cultes, Amsterdam, 1704; KÖCHER: Abriss aller bekannten Religionen, Jena, 1753; KIPPING: Philosoph. Geschichte der natürl. Gottesgelehrsamkeit, Brunswick, 1761; OUVRIER:

Geschichte d. Religionen, Leipzig, 1781; MEINERS: Geschichte aller Religionen, Lemgo, 1785; REINHARD: Geschichte der religiösen Ideen, Jena, 1794; DUPUIS: Origine de tous les Cultes, Paris, 1796.

As soon as the historical materials were collected, the philosophical treatment began, with LESSING: Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts, 1780 (according to which all religion depends upon a revealing activity of God, whose purpose is the education of the race); and HERDER: Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte, 1784. Before KANT published his Die Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der reinen Vernunft, 1793, two other works appeared, — TIEFTRUNK: Entwurf einer Kritik der Religion, 1789; and J. G. FICHTE: Versuch einer Kritik aller Offenbarung, 1792, which, on the basis of the Kantian philosophy, subjected religion to a severe criticism, reducing religious faith, the ideas of God, of the freedom of the will, and of the immortality of the soul, to mere postulates of practical reason. Leaning against Jacobi, and constructing religion on the basis, not of reason, but of feeling, F. KÖRPER published his Philosophie des Christenthums in 1813; and to the same sphere of influence (Kant-Jacobi) belongs FRIES: Handbuch der Religionsphilosophie, though it was not published until 1832. Meanwhile the appearance of SCHELLING and HEGEL gave a new and powerful impulse to the movement. To Schelling — who defined God as the absolute, and the absolute as full identity of the subjective and the objective, the ideal and the real, the finite and the infinite — absolute knowledge, or, as he called it, intellectual intuition, was the only medium through which man could become fully conscious of God. Religion he was consequently compelled to reject as a mistaken conception: see his Philosophie und Religion, 1804. He was vehemently attacked by Fries, Jacobi, and Herbart, but in vain. Hegel, whose Religionsphilosophie was not published until after his death (1832), also defined God as the absolute. But with him every thing was process and evolution. The absolute was not a dead identity, always at rest, but the result of a never-ending process by which the opposites reached identity through contest and reconciliation. He was consequently able to give religion a legitimate place in his system, though only as a lower and temporary form of the consciousness of God.

Against Schelling's and Hegel's ideas of the absolute, though in many respects influenced by their methods, wrote ESCHENMAYER (Religionsphilosophie, 1818-24, 3 vols.). FRANZ VON BAADER (Fermenta cognitionis, 1822-25, Vorlesungen über religiöse Philosophie, 1827, and Vorlesungen über speculative Dogmatik, 1829), and HEINRICH STEFFENS (Religionsphilosophie, 1839, 2 vols.). All these writers have a more or less pronounced mystical character. The most interesting of them is Baader. He was a strict Romanist, but held that nature and Scripture reciprocally interpret each other, that a true natural philosophy and a true Christian theology must lead to the same results. Of still more importance among the adversaries of the pantheism of Schelling and Hegel are J. H. FICHTE (Spekulative Theologie, 1846), and CH. G. WEISSE (Philosophische Dogmatik, 1855), who both are representatives of pure theism. Very characteristic is the proposition with which Weisse starts: religion is an experience, and must be treated by science like any other experience. Recent writers on the subject are, J. D. MORRELL: Philosophy of Religion, London, 1819; J. CAIRD: Philosophy of Religion, 1876; I. RICHARD: Essai de philosophie religieuse, Heidelberg, 1877; [NEWMAN SMYTH: The Religious Feeling, New York, 1877]; O. RELIGIOUS DRAMAS IN THE MIDDLE AGES. Between the ancient and modern theatre there is an absolute void of several centuries. Only a few dramas were produced during that period, — the Χριστὸς πάσχω of Gregory Nazianzen, some cloister-plays from the Carolingian age, the six comedies of Roswitha, — and they were all simple imitations of the ancient models, and without any literary influence. When at last the modern drama began to germinate, it was prompted by no reminiscence of the ancient. Its origin was entirely religious: it grew up in the midst of the divine service of the Christian Church.

Even in its earlier form there were in the Christian service numerous dramatic elements which needed only a little development in order to become real dramas, such as the antiphonies and responsories of the mass, the change of persons and costumes in various parts of the Liturgy, the processions inside and outside the church, the washing of feet on Maundy-Thursdays, the imitation of the manger at Christmas and the tomb at Easter, the recitation of the gospel reports on Easter morning, etc. These recitations of the biblical narratives were soon recast in the form of rhymed dialogues interspersed with choral hymns. Costumes were added, to represent the angels, the women carrying incense, the soldiers keeping watch, etc.; and in the eleventh century the Christmas and the Easter plays were ready, though the period of their full bloom falls in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. In France they were called mistères (formerly derived from mysterium, now generally from ministerium); in England, miracles; in Spain, autos; in Germany, ludi. They were played in the church and by the clergy, who also wrote them, and they made a deep impression on the audience, as many anecdotes show. Gradually the dialogues were rendered into the vernacular tongue, and the singing became more elaborate and artistic; thus the words of God were composed for three voices, — descant, tenor, and bass, — with an allusion to the Holy Trinity.

The outlines of the drama were extended; non-scriptural matter was adopted, from the legends and other sources; and laymen were admitted to the scene, for the representation of certain characters, such as the impenitent thief. At last the church or the chapel became too small for the drama and the audience. Perhaps, also, incongruities crept in, or people began to think the whole business below the dignity of the clergy. At all events, in 1210 Innocent III. forbade to represent the plays in the churches, and also forbade the clergy to act any part in them.

After its removal from the church to the public square, the drama underwent many changes. It assumed a more historical character. Instead of a single episode, it undertook to represent the whole biblical history, from creation to doomsday. A huge stage was reared, consisting of three floors, of which the middle one represented earth, with heaven above, and hell below. Several hundred people might be engaged in the representation, which generally lasted for several days. The greatest change, however, and one by which a new kind of drama, the so-called moralities, was formed, consisted in the abandonment of the biblical text and the adoption of allegorical characters. Even in the oldest religious dramas, allegorical characters, such as Mercy, Justice, the synagogue, etc., occur; and when the drama fell into the hands of the laity, it was quite natural that they, more especially under the influence of the Renaissance, should develop a taste for a drama of a more secular character, — a drama which to a certain extent mirrored their own life, and expressed their own ideas. The moralities were invented in France; and in Paris their representation became the special privilege of the Bazochists, the guild of lawyers and advocates; while at the same time (1402) the Confrérie de la Passion erected the first stationary scene in Paris for the representation of mysteries. In England moralities also found much favor; and many plays of the kind were produced and became popular. In Germany, on the contrary, they hardly occur.

The moralities, as well as the mysteries, were strictly orthodox; not so with the sottises, or entremets in France, the English interludes, the German fastnachtspiele. They were from their very origin, while yet mere episodes of the larger plays, humorous and satirical; and, when the Reformation began to put men's ideas and passions in commotion, their satire was immediately directed against the Roman-Catholic Church and clergy. Already, in the first half of the thirteenth century, Anselm Faidit of Avignon wrote for Boniface of Montferrat a comedy, Heresie dels Peyres ("The Heresy of the Fathers"), which was represented in the palace of the marquis, and which depicted all the adversaries of the Albigenses as heretics. In the beginning of the fourteenth century Luca de Grimeald is said to have written a bitter satirical comedy against Boniface VIII., which, however, he was compelled by force to burn; and in the sixteenth century the satirical drama became a most effective weapon in the hands of the Reformers. In a sottise by the French poet Pierre Gringoire (1511), the Mother of all Fools enters the stage with the pontifical mantle on her shoulders, and the tiara on her head. In an auto da feyra, by the Portuguese poet Gil Vicente (1508), the church is represented as an inn-keeper. Thomas Heywood, the inventor of the English interludes, launched boldly out in the religious controversies of his time; and Edward VI. is said to have written a drama against the Roman-Catholic Church under the title, The Whore of Babylon. The most celebrated specimens, however, of this kind of dramas, are the fastnachtspiele of Pamphilus Gegenbach in Basel, Nikolaus Mammel Deutsch in Bern, and Hans Sachs in Nuremberg.

In England the religious drama of the middle ages connects directly with Shakspeare: in Spain, with Lope de Vega and Calderon de la Barca; in France, with Corneille. Its most direct artistic offspring, however, is the Protestant oratorio. In Catholic Germany the representation of mysteries has continued down to the present time. [See OBER-AMMERGAU.] GRÜNEISEN.

RELIGIOUS STATISTICS, reprinted from Holtzmann u. Zoepffel's Lexikon für Theologie, Leipzig, 1882.

NOTE.—The value of this table is not in the accuracy and freshness of its figures (for manifestly in the case of the United States a former census has been used, and it is probably so in other cases), but in its presentation of the comparative strength of the various religions. The first column expresses the number of millions and fractions of millions there are in the respective countries; thus in the German Empire there are 42 and 72 hundredth millions.

RELLY, James, b. at Jefferson, North Wales, 1720; d. in London about 1780. He may be regarded as the founder of the Universalist denomination from his association with John Murray. Both Relly and Murray were, in the early part of their career, disciples and co-workers of Whitefield. Very few particulars in the life of Relly have been preserved. Even Mr. Murray, his ardent admirer and convert, tells us nothing which would afford an insight into his personality. He became a Universalist about 1750, and organized a society a year or so later. His society, after his death, until its dissolution in 1830, was ministered to by laymen. He is best known through his writings, which are somewhat voluminous. Mr. Relly's style of writing is remarkably good, indicating more than ordinary culture. His principal works are as follows: The trial of spirits, or a treatise upon the nature, offices, and operations of the Spirit of Truth, London, 1756, 2d ed., 1762; Union, or a treatise of the consanguinity and affinity between Christ and his Church, 1759, reprinted, Philadelphia, 1813; Antichrist resisted, 1761; The life of Christ, 1762; The Sadducee detected and refuted, 1764; Christian liberty, 1775; Epistles, or the great salvation contemplated, 1776; Salvation completed ("a discourse on that subject by J. R., wrote in the year 1753"), 1779; The salt of the sacrifice, or the true Christian baptism delineated, according to reason and spirit [n. d., 1779?]; The Cherubimical mystery, or an essay on the mission of Daniel the prophete, 1780.

The chief of his works—that in which his doctrinal views are most fully elaborated, together with the grounds on which they rest—is Union. In this he holds to a certain mystical union between Christ and humanity. Christ's relation to men is like that of the head to the different members of the body. His actions and thoughts, therefore, are ours: his obedience and sufferings are ours. He has brought the whole human race into the divine favor as fully as if each member had obeyed and suffered in his own person, and thus has secured a complete salvation. His theology is of the ethical type, maintaining that there must be perfect harmony between the divine attributes. Of the Almighty he says, "that, as a God infinite in goodness, he doth not, will not, act from one attribute to the dishonor of another." He believed in the literal resurrection of the body. He says [see Sadducee refuted], "What does the term 'resurrection' imply, if not the rising again to life of that which was subjected to death? But the soul is immortal. . . It is the body only that dies. Therefore the future resurrection of the dead, if there be any, must be that of the body." He confesses, however, that the rising again of mankind in the second Adam from the sin in which they were involved in the first Adam implies a quickening and renewal of the mind through the truth. He teaches the millennial coming of Christ, in which the believers shall rise and reign with him. Afterwards, those who are under condemnation shall rise; and, through the mediation of the saints, they shall be brought to Christ: so that at last every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess that in the Lord they have righteousness and strength. He held that Christ had abolished ordinances. The "one baptism" spoken of in Eph. iv. 5 is spiritual, operating upon the mind and conscience through faith. Hence he placed special emphasis upon good works, and commended a broad and generous philanthropy. As to the nature of Christ, the views of Relly do not seem to differ from those which were accounted orthodox in his time. His writings show him to be a man of intellectual vigor, versed in theology, a careful student of the Scriptures, a keen logician, and a good controversialist. He must have been a powerful preacher, inasmuch as Mr. Murray, who abhorred Universalism, and who had been specially appointed to refute the Union, was converted by the first sermon which he heard him preach. ELMER H. CAPEN (President Tufts College).

REMIQIUS, St., b. probably in 437; d. Jan. 13, 533. He was made bishop of Rheims in 459, and was an intimate friend of Clovis, whom he converted to Christianity. Twice he was made the subject of a fraudulent fiction invented for political purposes by Hincmar of Rheims; first as having anointed Clovis with oil from the sacred ampulla, and next as having received a letter from Pope Hormisdas recognizing him as primate of France. He has left four letters. The Commentary on the Pauline Epistles, ed. by J. B. Villalpandus (1699), and also found in Bib. Moe. (Lyonis, 1677), is not by him, but by Remigius of Auxerre. [See A. AUBERT: Hist. de saint Remi, Paris, 1849; DESSAILLY: Authenticité du grand testament de saint Remi, Paris, 1878.] J. WEIZSÄCKER.

REM'PHAN (more correctly Raiphán), a god, so called in Acts vii. 43. It occurs in a quotation from the Septuagint of Amos v. 26, where the Hebrew has Chim. The god is generally identified with Saturn.

RENAISSANCE, The, is the term now commonly used to designate the general movement of the human mind against the system of government in Church and State which prevailed in Europe during the middle age. That system was founded upon the principle of absolute authority in both spheres, in accordance with the supposed divine order for the government of the world. The Church maintained this principle in its control of the consciences, opinions, and acts of men in their relations to subjects within its special jurisdiction; while the civil power, claiming the same divine origin, ruled with the same authority the citizen in his more immediate relations to the State. The theory was, that there could be no lawful resistance to the duly constituted authority either in Church or State, and no conceivable opposition between them, because the divine will was represented by its lawful exercise in either sphere. Against this theory, upon which the mediæval system was based, a revolt began in the twelfth century, which, in one form or another, continued to assert itself with aggressive force throughout Western Europe for nearly four hundred years; and that revolt is known by the general name of the "Renaissance." This movement was most active during the transition period between the middle age proper and our modern era (1100–1500), and its influence is clearly seen in some of the most characteristic features of existing civilization. It may be described in general terms as a struggle of individualism to control the forces of European life as against the power of Church and State as organized in the middle age.

The movement, as a general one throughout the countries of Western Europe, is said to have begun with the teachings of Abelard (1079–1142); and its special work was not completed, at least in France, until the close of the sixteenth century. Two eras are to be distinguished in its history: first, that in which the assertion of this claim to individualism — which is, after all, only another name for the right of private judgment — was boldly avowed, and persistently maintained, by scholars and philosophers, as a distinct general principle; and the second, that in which the outgrowth of these opinions, and the changes which they produced in the condition of European society, became conspicuous. The first was seed-time, the other the fruit-season; and between the two lay the dark night of nearly a century, in which the "new birth," the Renaissance, seemed to have reached an untimely end.

The following is an outline, in their historical order, of some of the principal events in which this spirit of individualism — afterwards known, from the marvellous changes it produced in European life, as the Renaissance, or "new birth" — exhibited itself.

1. Abelard (1079-1142) was the first great scholar in the middle age who openly maintained the principle of individualism in a definite form against that of the authority of the church as recognized and settled in his time. He did not claim, as later scholars did, that the church had actually reached wrong conclusions in any given case, but that her fundamental theory, that her own declaration of her own infallibility in all cases should be binding upon Christians, was a false one. Anselm had formulated the church's position by asserting that we must believe in order that we may be able to understand; Abelard, on the contrary, insisted that we must first understand before we can believe. Abelard, although condemned by the church for this and other errors, had many disciples, who, adopting his theory, did not hesitate to discuss and condemn many things which were done under the claim of church authority. Indeed, so wide-spread and potent was the influence of Abelard's example, that, according to Hallam, the greater part of the literature of the middle age from the twelfth century may be considered as artillery levelled against the clergy.

2. Arnold of Brescia, who lived in the first half of the twelfth century, was a pupil of Abelard, and applied the principle of free inquiry, as defended by his master, to an examination of the claim of popes and bishops to the exercise of authority as secular princes. His influence was so great, that he practically dethroned, for a time, one pope, and became himself the ruler of Rome. He was soon deposed, condemned, and burned; but his career lasted long enough to show that in Italy in the twelfth century there was an opinion strong enough to make itself felt effectually, questioning the authority of the church, not merely to make itself the interpreter of its own jurisdiction over civil as well as over ecclesiastical affairs, but revolting also against the system of government it had established. The same principle we see applied, about the same time, in a different sphere, in the insurrection of the Italian cities, under the name of the "Lombard League," against the authority of their German master, the emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, — an authority which had theoretically, in the middle age, the same divine origin and sanction, and the same claim to unquestioning universal obedience, as that of the Pope himself. Yet the cities of Lombardy did not hesitate to disown the imperial authority; and they acquired, by successful resistance to it, a certain qualified independence of the emperor, thus maintaining, as Sismondi says, the first and noblest struggle ever waged by the nations of modern Europe against despotism.

3. Another step in the process of change from the old to the new, the revolt of individualism against the theory of passive obedience to authority as maintained by the church, is seen in the condition of the south of France in the thirteenth century. This movement presents itself under a double aspect. We see a defiance of the church's authority by all classes of the population. The higher nobility and the peasants of that region were both arrayed at the same time against it, but from different motives. The nobility of Provence, affected, no doubt, a good deal by the example of their Saracen neighbors, not only led lives in this era characterized by a worldliness, luxury, and love of display, up to that time wholly unknown in Western Europe among Christians; but many of their opinions were regarded as loose and heretical, and they had become restless under the restraints of church discipline. They professed to be orthodox Catholics; but their practice of an extraordinary exaltation of the passion of sexual love, their pretentious gallantry to women of their own rank, the courts which they established for the formal regulation of the relations between the sexes, their strange notions of the nature and extent of the marriage obligation, the encouragement of the troubadours, whose love-songs are the expression of an important phase in the life of the time, — all this was a genuine revolt, as much directed against the church's ideal conception of Christian virtue based upon poverty and self-denial, as it was against the recognition of the authority which enforced its discipline. The nobles denied the power of the church, whose restraints had become distasteful to them; and naturally they found justification for their course in opinions regarded as heretical. The example of the nobles was followed by the peasants, who, known in history as the Albigenses, had long been ready to revolt against the church for another and opposite reason; viz., that its doctrines, as well as its authority, did not seem to them to be in accordance with the principles and examples revealed in the New Testament. As is well known, this revolt against the authority of the church was cruelly crushed in the thirteenth century: still, it must be regarded as one of the most important movements of the earlier Renaissance against that authority which had been recognized as paramount, not merely in settling the belief, but in regulating the lives and actions, of men. While the Provençal poetry was the outgrowth of an age and race thus characterized by disbelief and gross materialism, according to the church standard, the Norman ballads and the lays of the minnesingers in Germany, about the same era, seem to have been consistent with devotion to the authority of the church, and with the encouragement of the robust virtues of chivalry.

4. From Provence the spirit of opposition to the church's theory of the universality of its jurisdiction, and to the nature of the ideal of life which it set forth as the highest, passed into Italy. Dante (1310), Petrarch (1318), and Boccaccio are called the earliest humanists; that is, they are the earliest and most eminent of the writers who regarded human life as something more than a state of preparation for the life to come, and who believed that obedience to authority did not necessarily include all virtue. Dante, with his mind filled with a knowledge of mediæval history, and with mediæval conceptions of life, still does not hesitate, in La Divina Commedia, to try every human action by the standard of right and justice implanted in every conscience, and never makes mere obedience to the order of the church the test of rightfulness of conduct. He strikes at the very foundation of the secular power of the Pope, as understood in his age, by portraying vividly, in a celebrated passage, the evil results of the supposed gift by the Emperor Constantine, of the Roman territory, and with it the temporal authority, to the Bishop of Rome. While Dante thus made, in opposition to the spirit of the age, the conscience the final judge, Petrarch and Boccaccio strove to conceive of human life as a state less gloomy and ascetic, more human and natural, more joyous, in short, as it was supposed to have been in antiquity, than it was under the practice and the discipline of the church. Petrarch sang at the same time the praises of love and of the free spirit of antiquity, exalting human dignity and pride, and claiming that there were objects worth living for in this life outside of those included in the church's ideal. Boccaccio was even more worldly, attracting attention to human interests, and portraying man's passions, joys, and sorrows, the good and the evil so strangely mingled in life, concentrating interest upon man as he actually is, and not upon the ideal man, whom the church by its all-controlling power and discipline sought to make him.

The first or early Renaissance, then, was characterized by a general restlessness in European society; a strong desire making itself manifest through philosophers and poets, and by habits of self-indulgence, to free life from those restraints in opinions and acts which the Church and the State, by means of their universal authority, recognized for ages, had imposed upon it.

There was a long eclipse of the light shed by the earlier Renaissance, but at somewhat different epochs in the different countries of Europe. In Italy it occurred during the long struggle which resulted in the downfall of the city republics; in France and England, during the hundred-years war between those countries; and in Germany, during that reign of force and terror which accompanied the decline of the imperial power. During this eclipse the pretensions of the popes to absolutism became more pronounced than ever. The new orders of the Dominicans and Franciscans were their most active agents in repressing heresy; and, the practical control of the universities being in their hands, the most slavish theories of passive obedience to civil as well as to ecclesiastical authority were taught there. But nothing could restrain the bursting-forth in due time of the new and greater Renaissance, the force of which, unlike that of the earlier one, has gone on increasing ever since.

5. In Italy this revival was mainly stimulated by the enthusiasm awakened among scholars by the study of the works of the great writers of antiquity, and especially of Greek authors, whose writings were first brought to the knowledge of scholars in Western Europe during the fifteenth century and by the discovery of the works of Greek art. There had been many learned Greeks, and many manuscripts of Greek authors, in Italy before the taking of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453; but that event drove the Greek scholars into exile, and gave those in Italy who were students of the ancient classics invaluable aid in their interpretation. It was soon found that the ancient authors, Greek and Latin, offered to Italy a literature inspired by nature and reality, guided by reason alone, not subject to any authority, or shrouded by any mysticism. To cultivate and imitate this literature, and to seek for the ideal of life as set forth by the ancient philosophers and scholars, was to break the last bond imposed by the middle age. Italy soon became invaded by a species of fanaticism for the learning of antiquity. Search was made everywhere for the treasures of Greek and Roman art; and the discovery of a manuscript of a celebrated ancient author was regarded as a prize almost equivalent to the conquest of a kingdom. All classes, even the rough soldiers who had become sovereign princes in Italy, became enthusiasts in the study of Greek literature. Academies were founded in the principal cities for the study of the Greek philosophy; and very soon the ancient Greek ideal of life, which was that formed by the exaltation of human pride, and dignity, and force, — in other words, individualism, — was substituted, even among orthodox churchmen of the highest rank, for the Christian ideal, which was that of poverty, humility, and obedience. Some of the popes even became the unconscious instruments of sapping the foundations of their own authority. Nicolas V. (1455), for instance, who urged the Greek exiles to accept his hospitality, and to teach Greek literature under his protection, seemed to have no higher ambition in life than the patronage of Greek scholars, even those whose opinions were thoroughly Pagan, and the formation of a library made up of the manuscripts of the works of ancient authors. So Leo X. was, to say the least, as enthusiastic in the cultivation of the Platonic philosophy as in the performance of his proper duties as head of the church, or in maintaining its traditional authority. No one in Italy at that time, save a few unheeded enthusiasts, such as Savonarola, drew attention to the utter incompatibility between the Christian philosophy and that of the Greeks. Hence there was no open defiance of church authority, and outward conformity was maintained, being all that was required or expected from the learned. This love of antiquity included many things besides an enthusiasm for the Greek philosophy. The discovery of certain remains of Greek sculpture changed the whole ideal of art in the fifteenth century, or, rather, educated it in accordance with Greek models. The truth is, that the later Renaissance in Italy, with its wonderful results, may be regarded as a revolution brought about in the human mind and in culture by the study of beauty of form inspired by the literature and art of antiquity. This was the era of the glory of the fine arts in Italy. While the productions of such painters as Raphael and Michael Angelo, of such architects as Bramante and Brunelleschi, and of such a wonderful genius as Leonardo da Vinci, have given them fame unrivalled in the history of art, all their works are stamped with this peculiarity of the time, as distinguishing them from artists of the middle age: (1) They are utterly free from any conventional type, but are pre-eminently the expression of individual and original genius; and (2) Their ideal of form and beauty, even in the portrayal of Christian subjects, is the natural or Greek type, wholly unlike that consecrated by the piety and usage of the church in the middle age.

It was the passionate love of the literature and art of antiquity, and especially of Greece, which made Christian Italy during the Renaissance essentially Pagan in opinion and in life. The study of Greek in Germany and in England produced the same effect in disintegrating and crumbling the Catholic faith and authority in those countries, but in a different way. In Italy the tendency was to make life practically Pagan: north of the Alps, to which region the study of Greek soon spread, it became the seed of Protestantism. In the hands of such scholars as Erasmus, Melancthon, and Reuchlin in Germany, and as Colet and Sir Thomas More in England, a knowledge of Greek became a key to the interpretation of the original tongue in which the New Testament was written. It was thus the most powerful instrument of biblical study, and became a formidable instrument in assailing the doctrines, practices, and traditions of the Roman Church, and necessarily the authority of that church upon which so much that was distinctive in its system was based. The recent invention of printing, spreading the result of these investigations far more widely than any other agency could have done, strengthened and made permanent the revolt known in history as the Protestant Reformation. In France the revival of letters did not produce so great, or at least so immediate, a result as in the other countries we have named. The French campaigns in Italy, under Charles VIII. and Francis I., made those sovereigns familiar with the brilliant culture which prevailed in that country, and stimulated a desire to introduce it into their own. Greek scholars such as Lascaris, and artists such as Leonardo da Vinci, were invited to France by Francis I. For various reasons the influence of the new learning was not as marked there as elsewhere in the sixteenth century. It is seen, probably, more conspicuously in the new style of architecture which it introduced into France, called "La Renaissance," than in any thing else.

The general tendency, however, throughout Europe during the whole of the sixteenth century, was shown in a great variety of ways towards the development of individualism, and the decline in the recognition of the principle of authority, until this tendency reached its logical outcome in the Reformation. This tendency was much strengthened by the results of the discovery of America, — an event which, if the church's theory of the earth's cosmogony had been well founded, would have been simply impossible. The discovery of a new world turned men's thoughts, beliefs, and aspirations into a new channel. It opened to individualism in action a field wider and more attractive than any which had hitherto been presented to it. Love of adventure, enterprise, an ardent thirst for wealth, took the place of the typical virtues of the middle age, — celibacy, poverty, and obedience; and thus the last bond which united the life of the time to that of the mediæval era in Europe was broken.

RENATA, Duchess of Ferrara, daughter of Louis XII. of France, and Anne of Bretagne; b. at Blois, Oct. 25, 1511; d. at Montargis, June 12, 1575. She received an excellent education, — understood Latin and Greek, had studied philosophy and theology, mathematics and astronomy, — and was in 1528 married to Hercules of Este, who in 1534 succeeded to the ducal throne of Ferrara. From early youth she inclined towards Protestantism. She encouraged Bracciosi to translate the Bible into Italian, and she made her court a place of refuge for French and Italian Protestants. In 1535 Calvin came to Ferrara, and in 1541 began that correspondence which ceased only with his death (1564). But, when the religious re-action of 1542 set in, her position became difficult. The Inquisition was established at Ferrara in 1550, and in 1554 the duke complained to the king of France of the obstinacy of his wife. The inquisitor Oris came to Ferrara; and Sept. 7, 1554, Renata was imprisoned as a heretic in the old castle of Este. She was released on Sept. 26, but she was forced to recant. After her husband's death, in 1559, she returned to France, and openly embraced the Reformation. She lived at first in Paris; but, as she could not celebrate Protestant service there after the peace of Amboise, she retired to Montargis in 1563. She was in Paris during the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, and succeeded in saving Merlin and the daughter of L'Hôpital. See E. RENAUDOT, Eusébe, b. in Paris, July 20, 1646; d. there Sept. 1, 1720. He was educated by the Jesuits; entered the Congregation of the Oratory; visited Rome in 1700, and published a number of works referring to the history of the East and the agreement between the Eastern and Western churches with respect to the doctrine of the Eucharist; Défense de la perpétuité de la foi catholique, Paris, 1708, with two continuations, against Aymon's Monuments authentiques; Genædii homilie de Eucharistia, Paris, 1709, against Leo Allatius; Historia patriarcharum Alexandrinorum, Paris, 1713; Collectio liturgiarum orientalium, Paris, 1716. This last work is that which has most interest to our time. HERZOG.

REPENTANCE (the rendering, in the New Testament, of the Greek μετάνοια) signifies a change of mind and disposition. This idea can never be wanting where there is a genuine and earnest consciousness of the divine commands and human the Pope himself undertook to fill his place, because it had become vacant apud sedem apostolicam; and in 1265 Clement IV. formally established the rule concerning the Reservatio ex capite vacationis apud sedem apostolicam. Honorius IV. extended the rule, in 1286, also to cases in which the incumbent resigned his benefice into the hands of the Pope; and Boniface VIII. defined, in 1294, the apud sedem apostolicam as a circuit two days' journey distant from Rome. New kinds of reservations were trumped up; and in 1316 John XXII. decreed that all benefices which became vacant apud sedem apostolicam—not only by death, but also by deposition, cancelling of election, promotion, transference, etc.—were reserved for the Pope. The annoyances and scandalous transactions which were caused by this practice gave rise to much complaining, and the Council of Trent also effected some reforms; but it was the concordats which the popes were compelled to make with the various states which finally brought order and justice out of confusion.

RESIDENCE (that is, the personal presence at the place of one's office) seems to be a duty more evident in the case of an ecclesiastic than in that of any other official. Nevertheless, at a very early time it was found necessary to forbid absence. See Concil. Nicen. (325), can. 15, 16; Antioch. (341), can. 3; Can. Apost., 15, 16. Similar rules were established also in the Frankish Empire by Boniface. The accumulation of benefices, however, and other still more frivolous reasons, made absence one of the most glaring and widespread misuses of the church in the time of the Reformation. But the Council of Trent succeeded only in introducing partial reforms in the Roman-Catholic Church; while in the Protestant churches the abuse speedily disappeared, and made all legislation superfluous.

RESTORATION. See APOKATASTASIS.

RESIGNATION, the submission of the soul to the will of God, is a Christian grace distinguishing Christian from heathen ethics. Although the will of God is irresistible, Christian resignation is a voluntary act of submission, and rests upon the assurance that all things must work together for good to them that love God (Rom. viii. 28). The love of God for man, as revealed in the New Testament, awakens a sense of imperturbable trust in his care, the very hairs of our head being all numbered (Matt. x. 30). Resignation is therefore a mixture of voluntary obedience, humility, and trust. Christ is the fulfilment of this grace, and exhibited its highest manifestation in Gethsemane. Christian resignation is distinguished from Stoic submission and Mohammedan fatalism by being voluntary, and based upon the confidence that God will make all things to combine for the good of those that love him.

RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD. 1. Definition and Biblical Notices.—The term "resurrection" is a figurative one, taken from the conception of the deposit of the dead body under the ground. It stands in antithesis to the body's lying or resting in the grave. The essential reference of the term, however, is to the revivification of the dead, and the resumption of bodily and spiritual existence by them after a period of interruption. The firm belief in the resurrection and the eternal life is one of the products of Christianity, and rests upon the resurrection of Christ. Outside of Christian circles, death is and always has been the king of terrors. In the Old Testament the hope of the resurrection becomes clearer and clearer as revelation progresses. The prophets declare that the righteous shall participate in the consummation of the kingdom of God. The resurrection of the righteous is distinctly referred to in Isa. xxvi. 19 sqq. Ezekiel could not have used the imagery of chap. xxxvii., if he had not known about it; and Daniel (xii. 2, 3) distinguishes between the resurrection of the just and the unjust. Although this hope does not seem to us to be referred to in Ps. xvi. 9 sqq., xlviii. 14, lxxviii. 20, it certainly is in Ps. xlix. 15, lxxiii. 22 sqq. The Book of Job also assumes the continuation of the communion of the righteous with God after death in xix. 25-27. The New Testament everywhere assumes or states the doctrine of the resurrection. Christ calls himself the "resurrection and the life" (John xi. 25). Paul (Rom. viii. 11) conceives of this resurrection as already begun in the soul. He that hath the Son of God hath the eternal life already begun in him (John iii. 36; 1 John v. 12). The resurrection from the dead is regarded as one of the elementary truths of Christianity (Heb. vi. 1); and although Paul gives a sort of an argument for it in 1 Cor. xv., yet it may be said that the doctrine is considered so indisputable as not to be deemed in need of proof by the writers of the New Testament. It takes its root in the nature of God, in his relation to believers as his children.

2. Modes.—In regard to the manner of the resurrection we must confess that we know only in part. All mere human theories are mere guesses. We are shut up to the Bible: God (Rom. iv. 17, etc.) or Christ (John vi. 39) raises from the dead. This act will be consummated at the end of the world, or the second coming of Christ. According to 1 Thess. i. 16 sq., and 1 Cor. xv. 23 sqq., the righteous will be raised first, and take part in the judgment with Christ; then will follow the resurrection of the rest. In reference to the relation of the body of the resurrection to the present body, we may say in general that it will be subject to all the laws of the eternal life. We shall participate in the glory of God, and be like Christ. There will be a spiritual body (1 Cor. xv. 44 sqq.). Augustine (Serm. 99) defined it by the attributes, impassibility, lucidity, alertness, etc. The main point is its freedom from the service of sin and all mere sensualism. We can form to ourselves some conception of it from the transfiguration of Christ (Matt. xvii. 1 sqq.) and by the words used by Paul. "We shall be changed" (1 Cor. xv. 51). The difference of the sexes will continue, but there will be no prolongation of the sexual passion. We shall be like the angels (Luke xx. 36). The identity of the resurrection body with the earthly body cannot be denied. Origen and others hold to the survival of the eternal form and appearance (τὸ εἶδος); others hold to the survival only of the individuality, the essential nature which forms the body; others hold that already here on earth there is an organ or body of the soul, the ethereal body, which exists between the physical body and the soul. The consummation of this ethereal or spiritual body occurs at the resurrection, and its present relation to its future condition is represented by the relation of the seed to the ripe fruit. But why should not the soul be its own ethereal body? The soul itself, as J. H. Fichte says, forms the body; and the body of the resurrection will correspond to the individuality of the soul, and to the present body so far as it is characteristic of the individual.

REUCHLIN, Johann, b. at Pforzheim, Feb. 22, 1455; d. at Stuttgart, June 30, 1523; one of the most prominent among the humanist predecessors of the Reformation. He entered the university of Freiburg in 1470; was appointed court-singer to the margrave of Baden-Durlach in 1473; accompanied one of the sons of the margrave as tutor to the university of Paris, where he learned Greek from Andronikos Contoblaeos, and settled, after his return, at Basel (where he published a Latin dictionary which ran through twenty-three editions), and began to lecture on Latin and Greek. But the theologians of Basel found that "lectures on Greek" were an impious thing, which might draw away the flocks from the Roman fold; and Reuchlin left the city. He went first to Paris, where for some time he continued his Greek studies under Hermonymus of Sparta, and thence to Orleans, where in 1478 he began to study law. After his return, in 1481, he entered the service of the Duke of Wurtemberg, was made his councillor, and accompanied him in that capacity to Rome. In Rome he conversed much with Hieronymus Barbarus (who translated his name into the Greek, Cyprio), and in Florence with Marsilius Ficinus, Picus de Mirandola, Politian, and others, who inspired him with enthusiasm for the mysticism of Plato and the Cabala. The first Hebrew he learned from Jacob Jehiel Loens, a learned Jew who was court-physician to Friedrich III. Reuchlin was sent to the emperor in 1492, on some diplomatical mission; was very well received, ennobled, etc.; but the Hebrew knowledge he brought back with him he valued higher than any thing else; and in 1494 appeared his De verbo magifico, the first-fruit of his cabalistic studies. Afterwards, during a whole year's stay in Rome, in 1497, on business of the elector-palatine, he continued his Hebrew studies under another learned Jew; and in 1506 appeared his Hebrew grammar, from which dates the scientific study of Hebrew in Germany. Meanwhile he had published a text-book in universal history, another in civil law, Progymnasmatum scenica (a kind of school-comedies for exercise in Latin, which ran through twenty-nine editions), De arte predicandi, 1504 (which points more markedly in the direction of the Reformation), De arte cabalistica, 1516, etc.; and how great a fame and confidence he enjoyed is shown by the circumstance, that in 1502 the Suabian Union chose him for their judge.

In 1509 he first made the acquaintance of Pfefferkorn, a converted Jew holding some office in the asylum of St. Ursula at Cologne; but from that moment his life was filled with anxiety and misery. Pfefferkorn had obtained a decree from the emperor, Maximilian I., ordering all Jews living in the empire to give up their books to Pfefferkorn for examination, and permitting Pfefferkorn to confiscate and burn such books as contained polemical utterances against Christianity. Pfefferkorn wished to have Reuchlin for his partner in this enterprise, but Reuchlin excused himself. He was, nevertheless, dragged into it. Through the elector of Mayence he received an imperial order to present a memoir on the question of burning all the books of the Jews. The memoir, setting forth the absurdity of such a measure, was shown to Pfefferkorn; and he printed it in his Handspiegel, 1510, with the most venomous commentaries. Reuchlin answered with his Augenspiegel, 1511; but the theological faculty of Cologne then charged a committee with examining the orthodoxy of the Augenspiegel, and the Dominican inquisitor, Hoogstraaten, took openly the side of Pfefferkorn. The committee found forty-three condemnable propositions in the Augenspiegel; Hoogstraaten stepped forward as formal accuser, 1513; and for seven years Reuchlin always felt the danger of the stake hovering about him. The court of Spire fully acquitted him, March 29, 1514, and sentenced Hoogstraaten to pay a fine of a hundred and eleven gulden. But Hoogstraaten appealed to the Pope; and Leo X. formed a court, under the presidency of Benignus de Salviatis, archbishop of Nazareth. July 2, 1516, the court gave its verdict, which was an unqualified acquittal of Reuchlin; but the Pope dared not confirm the decision in the face of the powerful party of the Dominicans, who actually sin. The obligation to repent will only be acted upon where pardon and atonement have been offered to allay the guilt, condemnation, and pain of conscience. In the Old Testament the need of pardon is insisted upon; and pardon is offered for all sins committed without forethought or in haste, provided it is sought by the offering of a sacrifice to the God of mercy. In the Psalms and prophets a broken and contrite heart is substituted for sacrifices (Ps. li.; Joel ii. 13). The motives for the cultivation of such a state of heart are human guilt and the divine willingness to forgive sin (Isa. xlv. 22). God himself creates the new heart (Ps. li.; Ezek. xxxvi. 25 sqq.), converts (Jer. xxxi. 18), and promises a dispensation in which he will write his law upon the heart (Jer. xxxi. 31 sqq.).

The Mediator of the new covenant, and his forerunner, John the Baptist, began their public labors with the call to repentance (Matt. iii. 2, iv. 17; Mark i. 15). Citizenship in the kingdom of heaven depends upon this change of disposition. Jesus enunciated the code of the repentant sinner in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. v.-vii.), and gave a picture of such a one in the parable of the prodigal son (Luke xv.), who, "coming to himself," returned in humility, and with the confession of his sins, to his father. The thief was saved on the cross (Luke xxiii. 40 sqq.) when he besought the mercy of the crucified Saviour. The apostles called upon the people to repent, and urged, as the strongest reason for it, the elevation of Christ, the Saviour of the world, to the right hand of God (Acts v. 31, xi. 18). They used the term ἐπιστρέφειν as synonymous with μετανοεῖν (Acts iii. 19, ix. 35). The most emphatic statement of the thoroughness of this moral change is made by Paul when he speaks of it as a burial with Christ, which is followed by a change of life (Rom. vi. 2 sqq.; Col. ii. 12 sqq.), and in the Gospel of John, when it is spoken of as a new birth from above (John i. 12 sq., iii. 3). This brings us to the connection between genuine repentance and that which goes before it, and which is called regeneration. From the stand-point of regeneration, the change of heart is an act of God; from the stand-point of repentance, an act of the human will.

In the Roman-Catholic Church, baptism is regarded as simultaneous with regeneration and the washing-away of sins. It imposes, however, certain exercises, obligations, and burdens upon its members, which are subsumed under the head of penance (see art.). The Reformers went back to the original idea of repentance as "a transmutation of the mind and affections" (transmutatio mentis et affectus—Luther); and Luther, in his ninety-five theses, asserted that the entire life should be a penance, penitential act. The decisive element in repentance, or metanoia, is faith. Repentance, therefore, consists of contrition for sin, and faith in Jesus Christ; or, as the Augsburg Confession puts it, of "contrition, or the terrors of a startled conscience for sin, and faith, which is conceived by the gospel, or pardon, and believes its sins to be forgiven for Christ's sake." Good works are the necessary fruits of true repentance. Calvin did not differ from Luther, although he failed to emphasize the pangs for sin committed as much as he.

The Pietists in Germany, and the Methodists in England, laid great stress upon the necessity of a thorough repentance, or change of heart (metanoia). This led to the exaggeration that true repentance necessitates a prolonged and agonizing spiritual struggle. Spener never countenanced this idea, except to say, that whereas many passed into the joys of adoption without experiencing the terrors of the law, others might reach them only after prolonged spiritual gloom and sorrows, or after passing, as it were, through hell itself. Zinzendorf, however, under the influence of the former theory, lingered for a protracted period in a state of spiritual gloom and doubt before reaching conviction. The subject was warmly discussed by the Pietists on the one hand, and Luther on the other. (See JOCH: De desperatione salutari, Wittenberg, 1730; EISENHART: De Geheimnis d. Bekehrung, 1736; BURGMANN: De tactu penitentium, 1736, etc.) The Methodists insisted on a hearty contrition for sin; and under the preaching of Wesley, Whitefield, and their contemporaries, there were manifestations of violent bodily agony. The Rationalists insisted with all earnestness upon a change of the will, but failed to understand the nature of faith. Among the modern presentations of this subject which go back to the view of repentance which prevailed among the Reformers is that of CHR. F. SCHMID, in his Christl. Sittenlehre. [See the theologies of HODGE (iii. pp. 3 sqq.) and VAN OOSTERZEE; SHEDD: Sermons for the Natural Man, New York, 1871, etc.] J. KÖSTLIN.

REQUIEM, a mass for the dead, thus called from the opening words of the text, — Requiem æternam dona eis domine ("Give them, O Lord, eternal rest"). On account of its peculiar character, the Dies iræ, dies illa, is used instead of Gloria in excelsis, the Offertorium instead of the Credo, etc. The most excellent compositions of the kind are those of Mozart and Cherubini.

REREDOS (from the French l'arrière-dos) is the division wall or screen at the back of an altar, rood-loft, etc., in old churches.

RESERVATION, Mental, is a trick by which, according to the moral school of the Jesuits, it is possible for a man to tell a lie, or even commit perjury, without doing any thing wrong; namely, by adding mentally some qualification to the words actually spoken. Thus a man who is the only witness of a crime may, when asked by the court, answer, "I know nothing of it," when he mentally adds, "as a public fact." This infamous doctrine was first set forth by the Jesuit Sanchez (d. 1610), and then developed by Filliucius, Castro Palao, Escobar, and Jo. Caronuel, in his Haplotés de restrictionibus mentalibus disputans, Leyden, 1672. Outside of the order of the Jesuits, the doctrine found a zealous defender in Antoninus Diana (d. 1663): see his Resolutiones morales. ZÖCKLER.

RESERVATION, Papal. The success with which the popes began to interfere with the appointment to vacant benefices by the issue of preces and mandata de providendo (comp. the art. MENSIS PAPALES) gave the Roman curia occasion for further exertions in that direction. From the end of the twelfth century, instances occur, in which, when a foreign ecclesiastic died in Rome, threatened him with rebellion. The final solution was effected by Franz von Sickingen, who politely advised the Dominicans of Cologne to stop all further proceedings, and pay the fine, or to be prepared for a visit from himself and his friends. The Dominicans chose to pay and be silent.

The sensation caused by the trial of Reuchlin was enormous. All the humanists sided with him; and a party with very outspoken reformatory tendencies, and something of an organization, was formed under the name of Reuchlinists. It must not be understood, however, that Reuchlin himself stood at the head of that party. On the contrary, during the whole course of his trial he did his utmost not to fall out with the church. There was in his nature and character not the least trace of a talent for martyrdom. The last years of his life were much disturbed by war-incidents; and the brilliant engagement he accepted in 1521, as professor in Greek at Tübingen, he was by death prevented from fulfilling. After the appearance of Luther he also became estranged from his grand-nephew, Melancthon, who had previously been his pride. REUTERDAHL, Henrik, b. at Malmö, Sweden, Sept. 10, 1795; d. at Upsala, June 28, 1870. He studied theology at Lund, and was appointed adjunct to the theological faculty in 1821, professor ordinarius in 1844, minister of worship and public education in 1852, bishop of Lund in 1855, and archbishop of Upsala in 1856. His principal work is Svenska kyrkans historia (History of the Swedish Church), 1838-63, 5 vols., reaching to the Reformation, — a work based on original and exhaustive researches, but often admitting too much space to secular history. A. MICHELSSEN.

REVELATION, Book of, called, also, by adoption, instead of translation of the Greek title, The Apocalypse, a term, which, according to its original sense, would denote the future glorious revelation of Christ, and only by a later idiom, the prophecy of it, and which is now commonly used to designate that specific kind of prophecy, of which this book is the most perfect example, which expresses itself in symbolical visions rather than in simple predictive words. According to the usual arrangement, it stands at the end of the New Testament, a position appropriate to its contents, and probably, also, to its date. It is the only prophetic book of the New-Testament canon, and, with the partial exception of Daniel, the only prophetic book of either Testament which is planned and written in the form of a carefully ordered and closely concatenated whole. The boldness of its symbolism makes it the most difficult book of the Bible: it has always been the most variously understood, the most arbitrarily interpreted, the most exegetically tortured.

Any question of its genuineness, authenticity, or canonicity, may be considered excluded by the strength of the external evidence. The book asserts itself to be by John in terms which forbid our understanding another than the John of the other New-Testament books (i. 1, 4, 9, xxii. 8). "An unknown John, whose name has disappeared from history, leaving hardly a trace behind it, can scarcely have given commands in the name of Christ and the Spirit to the seven churches;" and it is indubitable that "all this was generally understood in the first two centuries of the apostle John" (Hilgenfeld). Traces of the use of the book are found as early as Barnabas, Ignatius, and the Testt. xii. Patt.; John's pupil, Papias, witnessed to its credibility; Justin (147) declares it an inspired prophecy of the apostle John. No church writer expresses a different opinion (Gaius of Rome has been misunderstood) until Dionysius of the third century, who, on purely internal grounds, denies it to the author of the Gospel, although asserting it to be certain that its author was some holy and inspired John, who saw a revelation, and received knowledge and prophecy. Nor did doubt, when it had thus once entered the church, spread rapidly. The third century closes without giving us the name of another doubter; and although Eusebius himself wavers, and tells us that opinion in his day was much divided, and soon afterwards the Syrian Church rejected it, — not without affecting the judgment of individual writers in Jerusalem, Asia Minor, and Constantinople, — yet Eusebius himself believed it to be inspired and canonical, the doubts were purely of an internal kind, the church at large was never affected by them, and the storm, even in the East, was soon weathered. Objection was renewed in the Reformation era by Erasmus, Carlstadt, Luther, Zwingli: but the churches refused to follow their leading; and, so soon as the subject of controversy changed, the book was used authoritatively by all parties. Modern objection began with W. Mace, 1729, and especially with the party of Semler in Germany. The latest opinion is divided into four classes. The moderate theologians, chiefly of the school of Schleiermacher, just because John wrote the Gospel, deny to him the Apocalypse, which they assign to some other John. The Tübingen school, on the other hand, rightly judging the evidence for the apostolical authorship of the Apocalypse decisive, just on that account deny to him the Gospel. Several extremists wish to pronounce both books forgeries. The church at large, on the other hand, together with the great majority of critics, defends the common apostolical authorship of both books; although some feel compelled to place them as far apart in date as possible, in order to account for their internal unlikeness: so, e.g., Hase, Réville, Weiss (1882), Farrar, Niermeyer. The grounds of modern objection are almost wholly internal, turning on divergences between the Gospel and Apocalypse in doctrinal conception, point of view, style, language. But Gebhardt has shown that no argument against unity of authorship can be drawn from the doctrinal relations of the two books; and every new investigation into the differences of style and language renders it more and more plain that it is consistent with unity of authorship. "The difference in the language can have no decisive weight attached to it" (Reuss).

The integrity and unity of the book are not in dispute. Grotius, Vogel, Schleiermacher, Völter, and (at one time) Bleek and De Wette stand almost alone in doubting them. To-day "the assumption of the unity of the Apocalypse forms the uniform basis of all works upon it" (Völter). Its text, because of the comparatively few manuscripts which contain it, remains in an uncertain state in comparison with the other New-Testament books, though not so in comparison with other ancient works, or to any such degree as to impair our confidence in its use.

Its date has been much disputed; although the testimony of the early church, which is ancient, credible, and uniform, would seem decisive for A.D. 94-95. Irenæus, who was not only brought up in Asia Minor, and there knew several apostolical men, but was also the pupil of John's pupil, Polycarp, explicitly testifies that it was seen towards the close of Domitian's reign; and he is supported in this by Clement of Alexandria, according to Eusebius' understanding of his words, as well as by Victorinus, Jerome, and later writers generally. Eusebius drops no hint that any other opinion was known to him. Even those who denied the book to the apostle, yet assigned it to this time. Not the slightest trace (except, perhaps, an obscure one in Origen) of another opinion is found until the late fourth century (the Muratori canon has been misunderstood), when the notoriously inaccurate Epiphanius, not without self-contradiction, places the banishment and prophecy of John under Claudius (II. 51). Some few writers adopt interpretations of special passages which might appear to imply their writing before the destruction of Jerusalem, but this inference is sometimes clearly excluded. No early writer assigns John's banishment, or the composition of the Apocalypse, to the times of Nero or his immediate successors. The earliest direct statement to this effect is found in the Syriac Apocalypse of the sixth century, which declares that John was banished to Patmos by Nero Caesar. (Is this due to a clerical error for Nerva?) This is thought to be supported, (1) by Theophylact (eleventh century), who places the writing of John's Gospel at Patmos thirty-two years after the ascension, but at the same time assigns John's condemnation to Trajan, and (2) by a false reading (Domitieu [understood of Nero] for Domitianou) in one passage of Hippolytus Thebanus (tenth or eleventh century), which is corrected in another. Certainly, if historical testimony is ever decisive, it assigns the Apocalypse to the closing years of the first century. Nor are supporting internal considerations lacking. (1) The natural implication of i. 9 is, that John was banished to Patmos; and this is in accordance with Domitian's, and not with Nero's, known practice. (2) The churches are addressed after a fashion which suggests intimate, perhaps long-standing, personal acquaintance between them and the author; yet it is certain, that, up to A.D. 68, John was not their spiritual head, and was probably unknown to them. Neither in Second Timothy nor in Second Peter (both sent to this region) is there the remotest hint of the relation between John and these churches, which seems to have been of long standing when Rev. ii. and iii. were written. (3) The internal condition of the seven churches appears to be different from that pictured in Ephesians, Colossians, First and Second Timothy, First and Second Peter; and the difference is such as seems to require not only time, but a period of quiet time, succeeded by a persecution, for its development. (4) The ecclesiastical usages of the churches seem to have made an advance.

The term "the Lord's Day," for Sunday, is unique in the New Testament; the office of "pastor," found elsewhere clearly marked in the New Testament only in the case of James, is here assumed as universal in Asia Minor, and well settled; the public reading (i. 3) of the Christian writings in the churches is spoken of as a usage of long standing, and a matter of course.

On the other hand, it has of late become the ruling opinion among critics, that the book comes from a time previous to the destruction of Jerusalem. The chief arguments which are urged in its support are: (1) The whole tradition of the Domitianic origin of the Apocalypse hangs on Irenæus; and it is quite conceivable that Irenæus has fallen into an error, either as to time alone (e.g., Stuart), or as to matter as well, — the banishment, and hence the time of it, and hence the date of the Apocalypse, all depending on a misunderstanding of Rev. i. 9 (e.g., Dusterdieck). But Rev. i. 9 seems most naturally to imply a banishment. Irenæus does not depend on any inference from the book, but mentions excellent independent sources of information in the matter. It does not follow, because all the evidence of the first three centuries and a half is consentient, that it is dependent on Irenæus. Eusebius, on the contrary, understands Clement to the same effect, and appeals as well to a plurality of sources (H. E., III. 20). (2) There is not even an obscure reference in the book to the destruction of Jerusalem as a past event, — a catastrophe of too great importance in God's dealings with his church to be passed over in silence in a book of this kind. This would probably be a valid argument if the book were thought to be a history or practical treatise written about 70-80; but, if a prophecy written about 95, it is too much to demand that it should contain reference to a catastrophe the lessons of which had been long since learned, and which belonged to a stadium of development as well as date long past. (3) Jerusalem is spoken of in it as still standing, and the temple as still undestroyed (xi. 1, 2, 3 sq., and even i. 7, ii. 9, iii. 9, vi. 12, 16), — a statement which proceeds on a literalistic interpretation confessedly not applicable throughout the book, or in the parallel case of Ezek. xl. sq. (4) The time of writing is exactly fixed by the description of the then reigning emperor in xiii. 13 and xvii. 7-12. Until, however, it be agreed who this emperor is, — whether Nero (Berthold, Bruston), or Galba (Reuss, Ewald, Hilgenfeld, Gebhardt), or Vespasian (Bleek, De Wette, Dusterdieck, Weiss), — this reasoning is not strong; and the interpretation on which it is founded (implying the assumption that the ideal date of any vision can be the actual date of the book itself) is exceedingly unnatural in itself, cannot be made to fit the description, except by extreme pressure of its language, and seems to fasten false expectations on the prophet, if not, indeed, the invention of what is known as the "Nero fable." (5) The chief argument with evangelical men, however, is that derived from the literary differences between the Apocalypse and Gospel of John, which are thought by many to be too great to be explained, except on the supposition that a long period of time intervened between the writing of the two books. The differences in dogmatic conception and point of view will hardly, however, after Gebhardt's investigations, be asserted to be greater than may be explained by the diverse purposes and forms of the two writings; and it is perfectly vain to contend that the differences in style and language are such as are explicable by lapse of time. The Apocalypse betrays no lack of knowledge of, or command over, Greek syntax or vocabulary: the difference lies, rather, in the manner in which a language well in hand is used, in style, properly so called; and the solution of it must turn on psychological, and not chronological, considerations. Every new investigation diminishes the amount and significance of the difference on the one hand, and on the other renders it more and more clear that its explanation is to be sought in the different requirements of the well-marked types of composition and the divergent mental condition of the writer. The evangelist, dealing freely with his material, takes pains to write better Greek than was customary with him; the seer is overwhelmed with the visions crowding upon him, and finds no other speech fit for their expression than that of the old prophets, and therefore rightly yields himself to a prophetic, antique, Ezekiel-like, Hebraizing form of speech (Ebrard).<sup>1</sup>

The plan and structure of the book, the whole of which seems to have been seen by John in one day (i. 10), are exceedingly artistic, and are based on progressive repetitions of sevenfold visions. It thus advertises to us at once its copious use of numerical symbolism, and the principle underlying its structure. Ewald, Volkmar, Rinck, Weiss, Farrar, have further correctly seen that the whole consists of seven sections, and thus constitutes a sevenfold series of sevens, and symbolizes the perfection and finality of its revelation. Five of these sections are clearly marked; it is more difficult to trace the other two. But, if we follow the indications of the natural division of the matter, we shall find the separating line between them at xix. 11 (so De Wette, Weiss, Godet, Hilgenfeld). The plan of the whole, then, is as follows: Prologue, i. 1-8; (1) The seven churches, i. 9-iii. 22; (2) The seven seals, iv. 1-viii. 1; (3) The seven trumpets, viii. 2-xi. 19; (4) The seven mystic figures, xii. 1-xiv. 20; (5) The seven bowls, xv. 1-xvi. 21; (6) The sevenfold judgment on the whole, xvii. 1-xix. 10; (7) The sevenfold triumph, xix. 11-xxii. 5; Epilogue, xxii. 6-21. The sevenfold subdivision of each section is easy to trace in all cases except in (4), (6), and (7), where it is more difficult to find, and is more doubtful.

Within this elaborate plan is developed the action of a prophetic poem unsurpassed in sacred or profane literature in either the grandeur of its poetic imagery, or the superb sweep of its prophetic vision. It is of the first importance to its correct understanding, that we should grasp the fact that its prime design is not chronological, but ethical. It was not intended to write history beforehand, but, by tracing the great outlines of the struggle between Christ and the enemy, to keep steadily before the eye of the believer the issue to which all tends, and thus comfort him in distress, encourage him in depression, and succor him in time of need. It has always been the recourse of a persecuted church. In proportion as a church has waxed cold, and settled upon her lees, in that proportion has she neglected this book; but, whenever earthly help and hope have slipped from her grasp, she has addressed herself to it, and found in it all she could need to comfort, encourage, and enhearten. As Luke adjoined to his Acts of the earthly Christ Acts also of the risen Christ, conquering the world from Jerusalem to Rome, and establishing his church in the face of all opposition, so John, to his Acts of the God become man, adjoins the Acts of the man become God, triumphing not only over one age, but over all ages, not only establishing, but perfecting, his church; and thus he brings to the New Testament and the Bible its capstone and crown. "If the Gospels are principally intended to lay the foundations of faith, and the Epistles to enkindle love, the Apocalypse gives food to hope. Without it, we should perhaps see in the church only a place across which believers pass in order to attain individually to salvation. But by its help we recognize in her a body which develops and which struggles, until, with all its members, it attains the full stature of Christ" (Godet).

It is evident that all attempts at the interpretation of such a book are foredoomed to failure, unless they proceed in full recognition of its special peculiarities. Certain guiding principles to its exegesis emerge from a general view of its form and scope. (1) The primarily ethical purpose of the book, which at once determined the choice and treatment of its matter, and which gives it a universal and eternal application and usefulness, forbids us to expect in it, what we might otherwise have looked for, a continuous or detailed account of the events of future ages. All expositions are wrong which read it as a history framed with chronological purpose and detailed minuteness, and seek to apply its main portions to events of local or temporal interest, or to recognize the vast outlines of the future as drawn in it in the minute and recondite details of past or contemporary crises. We might as well see in Michael Angelo's Last Judgment a county assize. This were to make John a pedant, puzzling his readers with his superior knowledge of petty details, instead of a comforter, consoling and strengthening their hearts by revelation of the true relations and final outcome of things. He is dealing with the great conflict of heaven and earth and hell, not with such facts as the exact time when Roman emperors began to wear diadems, or that Turcomans used horse-tail standards, or that the arms of old France were three frogs. (2) Like the other biblical books, the Apocalypse was intended to be, for the purpose it was meant to subserve, a plain book, to be read and understood by plain men. No more than elsewhere are we to find here a hidden and esoteric wisdom, but must labor to avoid the two opposite errors, — of considering the book an elaborate puzzle, or refusing to find any mystery in it at all. It would be difficult to determine which notion is the more hopelessly wrong, — that which supposes that the original reader readily understood its whole meaning in every particular, and which thus refuses to allow here the brooding shadow which hangs over all unfulfilled prophecy, especially if only broadly outlined; or that which supposes, that, in delineating each prophetic picture, the seer chose emblems appropriate, not to his own age or all ages, but specifically to that in which this special prophecy was to be fulfilled, and which thus condemns him to write in enigmas unintelligible to all ages alike, — a concourse of meaningless symbols enclosing one single spot of lucidity for each era. Both the analogy of other Scripture and the experience of all time have disproved both fancies. Notwithstanding the naturalists, no one has ever understood all the details of these visions unto perfection: notwithstanding the pedants, the unlettered child of God has found them always open to his spiritual sight, and fitted to his spiritual need. (3) The Apocalypse is written in a language of its own, having its own laws, in accordance with which it must be interpreted. There is such a thing as a grammar of apocalyptic symbolism; and what is meant by the various images is no more a matter for the imagination to settle than are points of Greek syntax. This is not the same as calling the book obscure, in any other sense than a writing in a foreign language is obscure to those ignorant of it. "As all language abounds in metaphor and other materials of imagery, imagery itself may form the ground of a descriptive language. The forms of it may become intelligible terms, and the combination of them may be equivalent to a narrative of description" (Davison). The source and explanation of this symbolism are found in the prophets of the Old Testament (especially Daniel, Ezekiel, and Zechariah) and our Lord's eschatological discourses, which, moreover, furnish the model on the lines of which the Apocalypse is composed. The study of apocryphal apocalypses has also its uses, since their symbolism is also drawn from the canonical prophet; but it is best to draw water direct from the fountain. (4) The question of the fulfilment of the prophecy is totally distinct from and secondary to that of the sense of the prophecy. Nowhere is it more necessary to carry out the processes of exegesis free from subjective preconceptions, and nowhere is it more difficult. There seems no way, except to jealously keep the exegesis of the prophecy and the inquiry after its fulfilment sharply and thoroughly separated. It is only after we know fully what the book says, that we can with any propriety, ask whether, and how far, these sayings have been fulfilled. (5) As the very structure of the book advises us, and numerous details in it make certain, it is exegetically untenable to regard it as one continuously progressive vision: it is rather a series of seven visions, each reaching to the end, not in mere repetition of each other, but in ever-increasing clearness of development.

<sup>1</sup> [The early date is now accepted by perhaps the majority of scholars. In its favor, besides the arguments mentioned by the author of the article, may be urged the allusion to the temple at Jerusalem (xi. 1 sq.), in language which implies that it yet existed, but would speedily be destroyed; and, further, that the nature and object of the Revelation are best suited by the earlier date, while its historical understanding is greatly facilitated. With the great conflagration at Rome, and the Neronian persecution fresh in mind, with the horrors of the Jewish war then going on, and in view of the destruction of Jerusalem as an impending fact, John received the visions of the conflicts and the final victories of the Christian Church. His book came, therefore, as a comforter to hearts distracted by calamities without a parallel in history. Cf. SCHAFF, History of the Christian Church, rev. ed., vol. I. 834-837. — Ed.]

Doubtless it is because of failure to note and apply these and like simple principles, that the actual exegesis of the book has proceeded after such diverse fashions, and reached such entirely contradictory results. No book of the Bible has been so much commented on: the exegesis of no book is in a more unsatisfactory state. It is impossible here to enter upon the history of its interpretation: the works of Lucke and Elliott, mentioned below, treat the subject in detail. In general, the schemes of interpretation that have been adopted fall into three roughly drawn classes. (1) The Preterist, which holds that all, or nearly all, the prophecies of the book were fulfilled in the early Christian ages, either in the history of the Jewish race up to A.D. 70, or in that of Pagan Rome up to the fourth or fifth century. With Hentensius and Salmeron as forerunners, the Jesuit Aleazar (1614) was the father of this school. To it belong Grotius, Bossuet, Hammond, LeClerc, Wetstein, Eichhorn, Herder, Hartwig, Koppe, Hug, Heinrichs, Ewald, De Wette, Bleek, Reuss, Réville, Renan, Desprez, S. Davidson, Stuart, Lucke, Dusterdieck, Maurice, Farrar, etc. (2) The Futurist, which holds that the whole book, or most of it, refers to events yet in the future, to precede, accompany, or follow the second advent. The Jesuit Ribera (1603) was the father of this school. To it belong Lacunza, Tyso, S. R. and C. Maitland, De-Burgh, Todd, Kelly, I. Williams, etc. (3) The Historical, which holds that the book contains a prophetic view of the great conflict between Christ and the Enemy from the first to the second advents. It is as old as the twelfth century, when Berengaud, followed by Anselm and the Abbot Joachim, expounded it. It has received in one form or another, often differing extremely among themselves, the suffrages of most students of the book. It is the system of DeLire, Wiclif, the Reformers generally, Fox, Brightman, Pareus, Mede, Vittinga, Sir I. Newton, Flemming, Daubuz, Whiston, Bengel, Gausen, Elliott, Faber, Woodhouse, Wordsworth, Hengstenberg, Ebrard, Von Hofmann, Auberlen, Alford, W. Lee, etc. The last six of these writers will be found nearest the truth.

REVIVALS OF RELIGION. This phrase is ordinarily applied to the spiritual condition of a Christian community, more or less limited in extent, in which a special interest is very generally felt in respect to religious concerns, accompanied with a marked manifestation of divine power and grace in the quickening of believers, the reclaiming of backsliders, and the awakening, conviction, and conversion of the unregenerate.

Theory of Revivals.—The progress of Christianity in the world has rarely, for any length of time, been uniform. Its growth in the individual and in the community is characterized by very obvious fluctuations. Like all things temporal, it is subject to constant change, exposed to influences the most varied and antagonistic. Now it makes rapid advances in its conflict with sinful propensities and developments; then it is subjected to obstructions and reverses that effectually check its onward course, and result in spiritual declensions.

The natural is ever at enmity with the spiritual. "The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary the one to the other." Growth in grace is attainable only by ceaseless vigilance, untiring diligence, unremitting conflict, and a faithful improvement of the opportunities and means of spiritual advancement. Any relaxation in the strife with moral evil tends to spiritual retardation: the evil gets the advantage over the good; the religious fervor abates; the soul becomes lukewarm, cold, dead.

As with the individual believer, so is it with the community. A church, a sisterhood of churches covering a large section of country, by reason of the predominating influence of some worldly interests, — the greed of gain in a season of great commercial prosperity, the strife of party during a highly excited political campaign, the prevalence of a martial spirit in a time of international or civil war, or the lust of pleasure in a time of general worldly gayety and festivity, or any absorbing passion for mere temporal good, — may be so diverted from the direct pursuit of holiness, and the prosecution of the work of advancing the kingdom of Christ, as to lose, to a considerable extent, the power, if not the life, of godliness. The spiritual and eternal become subordinate to the worldly and temporal. The blight of spiritual declension settles down upon them, and attaches itself to them with increasing persistency year by year. Such has been the history of Christian churches everywhere.

The ancient people of God were rebuked with great frequency by their priests and prophets for their proneness to spiritual declension. "My people are bent to backsliding from me." "Why is this people of Jerusalem slidden back by a perpetual backsliding?" This proneness was continually coming to the surface, in the days of Moses and the judges, under the kings, and both before and after the exile. Judges and rulers, priests and prophets, Deborah and Barak, Samuel and David, Elijah and Elisha, Jonah and Daniel, Ezra and Nehemiah, were raised up to beat back the waves of corruption, to arrest the tide of degeneracy, and to heal the backslidings of the people. The fire was kept burning on the altar only by repeated divine interpositions, resulting successively in a revival of religion.

Similar tendencies have from the beginning been developed in the history of the Christian Church: Ephesus loses her first love, Laodicea becomes lukewarm, Sardis defiles her garments, Philippi and Corinth yield to the blandishments of worldly pleasures. Worldliness and carnality, leanness and spiritual death, succeed, too often, a state of pious fervor, godly zeal, and holy living. The annual narratives of ecclesiastical communities bear painful testimony to this degenerating tendency.

Such being the testimony of universal experience to the proneness of human nature to decline from the spirit and power of godliness, how, it is asked, is this tendency to be checked? Obviously the true and only effective and appropriate remedy for a season of spiritual declension is a season of spiritual revival. Such a season, by whatever agencies or instrumentalities brought about, by whatever adjuncts of questionable propriety it may be accompanied, and of greater or less extent, may properly be termed "a revival of religion."

These manifestations, moreover, are to be regarded as the result of a special and peculiar effusion of the Holy Spirit. All spiritual life, all progress in the divine life, whether in the individual or in the community, in the church or in the nation, is the Spirit of God. The whole period of grace, from the Day of Pentecost to the final judgment, is properly termed "the dispensation of the Holy Spirit." Every true convert is begotten of the Spirit, and so becomes a child of God. The Spirit is always in and with the church, carrying forward the work of redemption.

Revivals in Biblical Times.—Mention, moreover, is made in the Scriptures of special dispensations of the Holy Spirit, of copious effusions of the Spirit, of particular times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord: "It shall come to pass afterward, that I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh." The fulfilment of this prediction of the prophet Joel began, as the apostle Peter testifies, on the Day of Pentecost next following the crucifixion of our Lord. So great and so efficacious was this outpouring of the Spirit, that about three thousand souls were that day made partakers of the divine nature by regeneration. And this was only the initial of a marvellous dispensation and display of divine grace in the renewal and sanctification of a great multitude of souls, extending through a continued series of years, whereby the Christian Church was planted, took root, and filled the land of Israel with its blessed fruits. It was a great and glorious revival of religion.

This was but the first great revival in the history of the Christian Church. Times without number, at particular periods, in peculiar exigencies, God has interposed for the redemption of the church and for the triumphant advancement of the gospel of Christ. After a season of spiritual declension, when iniquity had come in, and rolled over the whole land like a desolating flood, a wave of renewing and sanctifying grace has spread itself over a whole region of country, whereby the attention of the multitude has been aroused, great numbers of the careless and thoughtless have been brought under saving conviction, and converts by thousands have been brought into the church of such as should be saved. Marvellous changes have thus been wrought in the aspect of large communities, affecting most favorably the character and the results of the preaching of the Word, the devotions of the closet, the family, and the sanctuary, and the interest taken by the multitude in spiritual and eternal concerns, resulting in an extraordinary quickening of religious affections, a general stimulus of Christian graces, and the divine renewal of souls that were dead in trespasses and sins.

Not only at Jerusalem, but everywhere in all the region round about where the apostles and apostolic men preached in those days, and far away among the Gentiles,—at Samaria, at Cæsarea, at the two Antiochs, at Lystra and Derbe, at Philippi and Thessalonica, at Athens and Corinth, at Ephesus and Rome,—such scenes were witnessed. So many and so mighty were those special manifestations of divine power and grace in the gospel, by reason of such effusions of the Holy Spirit, that Tertullian could say at the beginning of the third century, in his appeal to the civil authorities, "We have filled all places of your dominions,—cities, islands, corporations, councils, armies, tribes, the senate, the palace, the court of judicature." "So mightily grew the word of God, and prevailed."

The Great Protestant Revival.—Passing over the intervening centuries, it may well be asked, What was the Protestant Reformation, that beginning in the fourteenth century under Wiclif, and continued under Hus in the fifteenth, at length culminated in the sixteenth under Luther and Calvin, and a host of kindred spirits? It was a special dispensation of the Spirit, whereby the minds of men everywhere in Christian lands were turned towards the utterances of the Divine Word, the errors of the Papacy were discovered and renounced, the truth as it is in Jesus apprehended and embraced by multitudes, and the churches built up in the faith of the gospel. It was a great and general revival of religion, whereby converts in tens of thousands were born of the Spirit of God. So thorough and wide-spread were those conversions, that the fires of persecution were kindled in vain. In spite of princes and prelates, converts to the pure faith of the gospel were made all over Germany, Switzerland, France, Holland, and Great Britain, and not a few in Spain and Italy. It was the greatest revival of religion that the world had witnessed, and the church enjoyed, since the days of Constantine.

Revivals in Great Britain and Ireland.—From that day, all along the centuries, the annals of the church abound in testimonies to the reality and efficacy of these special effusions of the Spirit. The Church of Scotland was born anew in the great revival under Knox and his brethren. "The whole nation," says Kirkton, "was converted by lump." Near the close of the sixteenth century, under the ministry of such divines as Wishart, Cooper, and Welsh, all Scotland was visited by an extraordinary effusion of the Holy Spirit. So mightily were men affected, that the whole General Assembly, four hundred ministers and elders, while renewing their solemn league and covenant, with sighs and groans and tears, were swayed by the Spirit, as the leaves of the forest by the "rushing mighty wind" of the driving tempest.

Similar scenes were further witnessed in Scotland, beginning in 1625, at Stewarton, extending through the land, and into the north of Ireland, and eventuating in that remarkable display of divine grace in the Kirk of Scotland, where, in June, 1630, under the preaching of Bruce and Livingston, "near five hundred" souls, in one day, were brought under deep conviction of sin, and presently into the light and liberty of the gospel. So, too, in 1638, on the occasion of signing the covenant, the whole country was stirred as by the mighty hand of God. "I have seen," says Livingston, "more than a thousand persons, all at once, lifting up their hands, and the tears falling down their eyes," as with one heart they vowed to be the Lord's. Such was the preparation in Scotland, and in England also, for the great reformation, that issued in the Commonwealth under Cromwell, and the prevalence of Puritanism in the Church of England.

The Great Awakening in the Eighteenth Century.—A period of great degeneracy, profligacy, and corruption, succeeded the restoration of the monarchy, extending into the next century. At length, in 1730, an era of spiritual revival was ushered in, under the preaching of the Wesleys, Whitefield, and a host of like-minded men of God, during which the churches of England, Scotland, and Ireland, were visited with a wonderful refreshing from the presence of the Lord. The wave of divine grace extended to the British Colonies in America, where, under the preaching of Edwards, and Bellamy, and the Tennents, and others of kindred spirit, the churches everywhere, in and out of New England, were so graciously and powerfully revived, that the period has ever since been known as "The Great Awakening," so many were the revivals of religion among the Christian people of the Western World.

These visitations of the Spirit were followed by the French War and the war of the American Revolution, resulting in a great decay of piety, and a wide diffusion of seething infidelity and profanity. During this period, here and there a church or neighborhood was favored with a gracious outpouring of the Spirit; but, for the most part, the churches in America were brought into a most lamentable state of spiritual declension. At length, in 1792, "commenced," says Dr. Griffin, "that series of revivals in America which has never been interrupted. I could stand at my door in New Hartford, Litchfield County, Conn.," he adds, "and number fifty or sixty congregations laid down in one field of divine wonders, and as many more in different parts of New England."

The Grand Era of Modern Revivals.—All over the new settlements in the Western and Southern States of America, particularly in Kentucky and Tennessee, a work of divine grace, resulting from a special outpouring of the Spirit, beginning in 1796, and continuing for a dozen years or more, completely remoulded the character of the people, and led large numbers to forsake their sins and unbelief, and to connect themselves with the church. Again: after the war with Great Britain (1812-15), many of the churches were favored with revivals. Especially was this the case in the years 1827-32, when, under the preaching of Nettleton, Finney, and other evangelists, and by means of protracted meetings of four days' continuance, or longer, revivals were multiplied all over the land.

Very marked, also, was the wave of spiritual grace, that, beginning in the city of New York early in 1858, shortly after a season of widespread bankruptcy, spread from city to city, and town to town, all over the United States, until, within a single year, nearly half a million of converts had been received into the churches. It was confined to no denomination, no section, and no one class, in the communities where it prevailed. It was a great and wonderful revival.

During the year 1837 a work of peculiar power began at a mission-station at Hilo, in Hawaii, under the preaching of Mr. Coan, and continued for a period of five years, during which 7,557 converts were received into that one church; 1,705 having been admitted the same day, July 1, 1838. Since the days of the apostles, the world had scarcely witnessed so wonderful a display of divine grace. And now, within the past five years (1878-83), a still more powerful movement of the Spirit in the Telugu Mission, India, has resulted in bringing more than twenty thousand hopeful converts into the churches; the accessions during the past year (1882) averaging not less than two hundred per month.

The evangelical churches in America very generally, and to a considerable extent in Great Britain and Ireland, as also in the British Provinces, most heartily believe in revivals of religion, look for them, pray and labor for them, and derive much of their vitality from these effusions of the Spirit. A large proportion of their ministry have been converted in revivals. A class of preachers known as "evangelists," or "revivalists," devote themselves wholly to their promotion. Here and there, serious irregularities have been introduced by enthusiasts, and much harm done to religion. These offences, however, are exceptional, and of very limited influence. Very generally, revivals of religion are regarded by the best people as mighty helpers to the churches, and as most salutary in their influence over the church and the world.

REVOLUTION, The French. In Ecclesiastical Respects.—The violent commotion, which, towards the close of the eighteenth century, almost destroyed the whole social and political organization of the French people, was principally and primarily an attack upon mediæval feudalism; but so close was the connection between the feudal State and the Roman-Catholic Church, that an attack on the former could not fail to affect also the latter. Moreover, all the writers and teachers who had engaged in undermining the foundations of the social fabric were utterly hostile, not only to the church and her officials, but to religion in general. A supercilious scepticism with respect to the positive doctrines of the church, and a fickle-hearted frivolity, which felt the moral code of Christianity as a galling chain, stirred up a suspicion that the clergy clung to their political privileges, their social organization, their wealth, not from any conviction of having a higher calling, but from mere egotism and arrogance. The idea of the church as an institution based on divine authority was gone, and to employ her wealth in aid of the bankrupt State seemed a simple and natural expedient.

Before the outbreak of the Revolution, it was generally believed in the higher circles of French society, that the clergy, as a privileged class, would make common cause with the nobility; but this supposition was rudely shaken at the very opening of the contest. While the nobility insisted upon strict class-separation in the debate and voting of the states-general, nearly one-half of the delegates of clergy (a hundred and forty-eight out of three hundred and eight) joined the third estate on June 22, 1789; and, two days later, a hundred and fifty-one other ecclesiastical delegates, led by Talleyrand, bishop of Autun, followed the example. The clergy began to become popular, the more so as they proved very liberal under the discussion of the financial emergency. The abolition of tithes, Aug. 7, without any recompense, they submitted to almost without resistance; and when, on Sept. 26, it was moved that all the gold and silver service of the church not absolutely necessary to a decent celebration should be used for the alleviation of the people, the Archbishop of Paris supported the move; and on Sept. 29 the generous offer, estimated at a value of about a hundred and forty million francs, was accepted by the Assembly. But heavier sacrifices were soon demanded,—sacrifices which apparently meant ruin. When Necker, in August, presented his desperate report on the finances, some one proposed to confiscate the estates of the church, and thus pay the debt of the State. But at that time the proposition met with no favor. It was again taken up, however, in the fall, and then by one of the dignitaries of the church, Talleyrand. On Oct. 10 he moved that one-third of the annual revenue of the church, estimated at fifty million francs, should be used for covering the deficit of the budget, arguing that the clergy were not the proprietors, but only the usufructuaries, of the ecclesiastical estates; that the State had absolute authority over every corporation or society formed within its pale: that, according to the principle of the church, the incumbent of a benefice was only an administrator, and could appropriate for his own use only so much as was absolutely necessary, while the rest belonged to the poor. Under the hands of Mirabeau and Abbé Gringoire, the motion received a much more radical redaction; and on Nov. 2 the Assembly decided, with five hundred and eighty-six votes against three hundred and forty-six, that all ecclesiastical estates were in reality the property of the nation, and stood at the disposal of the nation on the condition that the expenses of the public worship and of the support of all church-officials were first defrayed. Two days later the king confirmed the decree, and among the people the clergy found no sympathy; on the contrary, scoffing caricatures were showered down upon them in pamphlets, theatrical plays, etc.

The clergy still hoped that the decree would never be practically carried out, but in this they were completely mistaken. Other decrees were issued soon after, which showed that the proceedings of the Assembly were not governed by a mere regard to the financial emergency. On Feb. 11, 1790, all ecclesiastical orders and congregations were dissolved, with the exception only of those which were devoted to instruction of children and the nursing of the sick. The inmates of the monasteries were allowed to return to civil life by a simple announcement to the nearest secular authority; and according to the character of their monastic vows, the circumstances of their monastery, their age, etc., they received a pension of from seven hundred to twelve hundred francs. The nuns, when they were not disposed to break their vows, were generally allowed to remain in their monasteries; while, under similar circumstances, the monks were transferred to certain houses set apart for the purpose. It was evident that the Assembly considered the church the main-stay of all old superstition, the corner-stone of the feudal State, and that her total destruction was the real aim of the whole movement. On April 19 the administration of all church property was transferred to the State, and the Committee on Ecclesiastical Affairs was charged with selling four hundred million francs' worth of ecclesiastical estates; and on May 29 the debate on the re-organization of the church, the civil constitution of the clergy, began. A new circumscription of the bishoprics, in order to make them conform with the departments, reduced their number from a hundred and thirty-four to eighty-three. The bishops should be elected by the same body of voters as the members of the departmental Assembly, and should be installed by the metropolitan, or the oldest bishop of the province. To seek papal confirmation was formally forbidden. The chapters were dissolved, and only a limited number of episcopal vicars appointed for each see. Priests should be chosen by the qualified electors of the parish, and confirmed by the bishop. Their salary was fixed at from twelve hundred to four thousand francs, besides house and garden; that of the bishops, at twenty thousand francs, with the exception of the Bishop of Paris, who received fifty thousand francs. In the debate the clergy took very little part. Their principal speakers were the Archbishop of Aix and the Jansenist theologian Camus, who tried hard to prove that the plan was in perfect harmony with the New Testament and the councils of the fourth century. On July 12 the debate was ended, and the civil constitution of the clergy was ready: only the assent of the king was lacking.

The king had been most painfully touched by the attacks on the church, and he actually felt his conscience hurt in giving his assent to the civil constitution of the clergy. In this emergency he addressed a letter to the Pope, dated July 28, 1790; but the Pope's answer of Aug. 17 was vague and evasive, and on Aug. 24 the king confirmed the decree. Meanwhile the bishops were busy with organizing a passive resistance. Boisgelin, archbishop of Aix, drew up a protest, Exposition des principes, representing the contradiction between the principles of the church and those of the civil constitution; and a hundred and ten bishops signed the instrument, which on Nov. 9 was sent to the Pope through Cardinal Bernis. The National Assembly answered by a law of Nov. 27, which demanded that all ecclesiastics should take an oath on the Constitution, and threatened those who refused with deposition, loss of civil rights, and punishment for disturbance of the public order. Abbé Grégoire was the first to take the oath; Talleyrand and seventy-one other clergymen followed the next day; but the rest of the three hundred ecclesiastics who sat in the National Assembly refused; and out in the country refusal became, in many districts, the rule. In Southern France, traces of rebellion began to show themselves. By a letter of March 10, 1791, to the archbishop of Aix, and a formal brief of April 13, the Pope now defined the position he proposed to maintain with respect to the whole movement. He absolutely condemned the civil constitution of the clergy, declared all its prescripts and arrangements null and void, demanded that the clergymen who had taken the oath should retract within forty days, under penalty of deposition and excommunication, and exhorted the faithful among the people to keep aloof from any priest not recognized by the papal church. The declaration made a deep impression. On the one side, many priests retracted; Talleyrand resigned his bishopric, and returned to civil life; on the other, the mob of Paris burnt the Pope in effigie, and the National Assembly closed all the churches in which the priests did not conform to the civil constitution. But, on account of an earlier law establishing freedom of worship, it was not possible for the National Assembly to forbid the obstinate priests to celebrate service in private houses and chapels; and it now became a point of honor among all royalists to support and encourage those priests who had not taken the oath. By the king's unsuccessful attempt at flight and the Pope's too hasty letter of congratulation, — which latter fell into the hands of the revolutionists, and was published, — the tension of the situation was very much increased. On Sept. 14 the National Assembly incorporated the papal dominions of Avignon and Venaissin with France; and on Nov. 29 it issued a law that every priest who had not taken the oath should present himself within eight days, and take the oath, before the municipal authority, under penalty of losing his pension, and, according to circumstances, being punished with imprisonment. The king vetoed the law, but with no other result than a palpable increase of the hatred against him and the church; and when he also vetoed the law of May 27, 1792, which condemned all refractory priests to deportation in order to stop their re-actionary agitation, the National Assembly was, by the fury of the mob, forced to supersede the royal veto. Deportation to Guiana was impossible, as the government lacked the necessary means. But very severe measures were employed, and in a very short time the situation of the non-sworn clergy became terrible. A great number of priests were dragged to Paris, and imprisoned in the monastery of the Carmelites; eighteen of them were murdered in the streets by the mob, and sixty more in the courtyard. One Rossignol boasted that he had killed more than sixty-eight priests. Fortunate were those who escaped by flight. More than forty thousand French priests fled to England, Spain, the Papal States, etc. In England alone about eight thousand found refuge.

Nevertheless, the whirlwind was yet far from having reached the acme of its fury. A number of laws now appeared, purporting to dissolve the connection between Christianity and civil life. A law of Sept. 20, 1792, defined marriage as a merely civil contract, dissolvable by common consent, and transferred the registration of births, deaths, and marriages, from the ecclesiastical to the civil authorities. A law of Sept. 22 inaugurated the complete re-arrangement of the calendar, — the year should be reckoned from the establishment of the republic; the month should be divided into three decades, each of ten days, the first of which should be kept a holiday; the five surplus days of the new year should be feast-days, in honor of Genius, Labor, etc.; the celebration of the Christian Sunday was positively prohibited. On the whole, the convention proved much more hostile to Christianity than any of its predecessors. Public avowals of atheism became quite common. On Aug. 25, 1793, a deputation of teachers and pupils presented itself before the convention; and the pupils begged that they should not any longer be trained "to pray in the name of a so-called god," but be well instructed in the maxims of liberty and equality; and on Nov. 1 another deputation, from Nantes, openly demanded the abolition of the Roman-Catholic service. The granting of the demand was not far off. On Nov. 7 a letter from a priest was read aloud in the convention, beginning thus: "I am a priest; that is, I am a charlatan." Immediately after, the Archbishop of Paris, an old man, Gobel by name, entered the hall, laid down his staff and his ring on the president's table, renounced his office in the Roman-Catholic Church, and declared, amidst immense applause, that he recognized no other national worship than that of liberty and equality. On Nov. 10 the municipal council of Paris celebrated a grand festival in the Cathedral of Notre Dame, in honor of Reason. Mademoiselle Maillard of the Grand Opera, in white robe and blue cap, represented the goddess of Reason. On men's shoulders she was carried from the church to the convention. The president embraced her; and the whole convention accompanied her back to the church, and participated in the festival thus sanctioning the abolition of Christianity, and the introduction of the worship of Reason. On Nov. 13 all magistrates were authorized to receive the resignations of the clergy, and all priests were admonished to renounce Christianity; and on Nov. 22 those bishops and priests who willingly abdicated were granted pensions. The church-buildings were used as temples of Reason, as storehouses, as sheep-pens, etc.: not a few were destroyed.

It must not be understood, however, that all religion had died out in France: by no means. Everywhere the people, especially the women, continued to visit the churches; and even in the convention, voices were heard denouncing the rude, anti-religious demonstrations. Singularly enough, it was Robespierre who gave the first sign of a coming re-action. On Nov. 21 he hotly attacked Hebert in the club of the Jacobins. "There are people," he said, "who, under the pretence of destroying superstition, try to establish a religion of atheism. But atheism is only for the aristocrats; while the idea of a Supreme Being, who defends innocence, and punishes crime, is for the people." The speech was not without effect, and Robespierre neglected no opportunity to push his plans. Finally, on May 7, 1794, he persuaded the convention to decree that the French people acknowledges the existence of a Supreme Being and the immortality of the soul, and that festivals ought to be introduced tending to re-awaken in men thoughts of the Divinity. The first festival was held on June 8. Robespierre, as president of the convention, appeared with a huge bouquet in his hand, and colored plumes in his hat, and made a politico-moral speech, interspersed with various kinds of childish mummeries. Of course the infidels laughed, and the faithful were scandalized: nevertheless, the festival denotes the turning-point of the movement. The constitution of Aug. 22, 1795, granted religious liberty. Christian worship was tolerated once more; and in many places the congregations received back their church-buildings on the simple condition that they should themselves defray the expenses to keep them in repair; also a great number of emigrant priests returned to France. Many restrictions, however, still remained in force, — thus, it was not allowed to use bells; and the persecutions did not cease altogether. After the coup d'état of Aug. 24, 1797, it was demanded that all priests should take an oath on the new constitution, which bound them to hate royalty, and devote themselves wholly to the republic. About seventeen thousand clergymen are said to have taken the oath, but such as would not were treated with great severity. Three hundred and eighty were deported to Guiana, and as many died miserably at Oleron and Rhé.

The complete restoration of the Roman-Catholic Church proceeded, generally speaking, along with the growing influence of Napoleon. Immediately after his return from Egypt, the imprisoned clergymen were set free, Dec. 28, 1799; the civil authorities were instructed to let alone all religious affairs; the churches were allowed to be kept open, not only on the first day of the decade, but on any day it pleased the congregation; the number of the revolutionary festivals was diminished to two; and the civil oath, binding them to hate royalty, was not demanded. In spite of the rapid spreading of infidelity during the last ten years, and though the people had, so to speak, been weaned from religious worship by the Revolution, about forty thousand congregations immediately returned to the Roman-Catholic Church; and on April 18, 1801, service was celebrated, on the order of Napoleon, in the most solemn manner, in the Cathedral of Notre Dame. He hoped thus to form a solid party in support of his own power, and he partly succeeded. A peculiar difficulty arose from the dissension which prevailed among the clergy. Those priests who had taken the oath on the Constitution considered themselves as the true bearers of the French Church, and prided themselves on having remained steadfast at their post in the days of danger; while the non-sworn priests — the emigrants, who now returned — looked down upon them as apostates and infidels, who had suffered themselves to be swayed by the circumstances like reeds by the winds. Napoleon first entered into negotiations with the former party, the constitutional priests; but, when he saw that not one of the non-sworn priests was present at the great National Council, opened by Bishop Grégoire on June 29, or took the least notice of its proceedings, he immediately changed policy, and opened direct negotiations with the Pope through the emigrant bishops, — negotiations which finally resulted in the Concordat. REYNOLDS, Edward, D.D., Church-of-England prelate; b. at Southampton, 1599; d. at Norwich, Jan. 16, 1676. He was educated at Merton College, Oxford; became probation-fellow in 1620, on account of "his uncommon skill in the Greek tongue;" was preacher at Lincoln's Inn, London, and rector of Braynton, Northamptonshire; was the "pride and glory of the Presbyterian party," a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, a very eloquent, learned, and popular preacher, though his voice was harsh, and a cautious man, though lacking in firmness. On the ejection, by the Long Parliament (1646), of obnoxious heads of colleges, he succeeded Dr. Fell as vice-chancellor of the university of Oxford, and dean of Christ Church. From 1651 to 1659 he was deprived of his deanery, because he refused, in common with the Presbyterians, to take the "Engagement," and therefore accepted the vicariate of St. Laurence Jewry, London. In 1659 he was restored, conformed at the Restoration, and was in that year (1660) chaplain to the king, warden of Merton College, and made bishop of Norwich, without, however, surrendering his Presbyterian view, that a bishop was only a chief presbyter, and governed with the assistance of his co-presbyters. In the Assembly he was on the committee to draw up the Confession of Faith, and in 1661 he was a member of the Savoy Conference. In the latter capacity his weakness showed itself. He carried, however, his Puritanic principles into practice even while a bishop, and lived simply for his diocese. His Works were first collected and published in 1658; best edition, with Life, by A. CHALMERS, London, 1826, 6 vols.

REYNOLDS (RAINOLDS), John, D.D., Puritan; b. at Pinho, Devonshire, 1549; d. at Oxford, May 21, 1607. He was successively scholar, fellow, and president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford. For a while he was dean of Lincoln (1593), but resigned when chosen president. He was one of the great Puritan leaders, and played a prominent part in the Hampton Court Conference, where he had the distinguished honor of suggesting to King James the desirability of a new translation of the Bible. (See ENGLISH BIBLE VERSIONS.) He was appointed one of the revisers, and assigned to the committee to translate the prophets, but he did not live to finish his part. He was endowed with a wonderful memory, and passed for a marvel of scholarship. See NEALE: History of the Puritans, vol. i. 252; J. I. MOMBERT, Handbook of English Versions, pp. 338, 345.

RHECIUM (breach) now Rheggio, with ten thousand inhabitants, in extreme south-west Italy, opposite Messina. Paul stopped there a day on his way to Rome (Acts xxviii. 13).

RHEGIUS (not RECIUS, for his family name was "Rieger," and not, as his own son, and, after him, many others have it, "König"), Urbanus, b. at Langenargen, on the Lake of Constance, in the latter part of May, 1489; d. at Celle, May 27, 1541. He studied jurisprudence at Freiburg under Zasius the humanist, among the jurists; but he seems to have been chiefly occupied with the study of classical languages and literatures under the celebrated humanists, Capito and Esticampianus; and such progress did he make in that field, that in 1517 he was crowned as imperial orator and poeta laureatus by the Emperor Maximilian. Theological influences, however, were not altogether lacking, even at that time. In Freiburg he became so intimate with Eck, that in 1510 he followed him to Ingolstadt; and in 1518 he wrote his first theological work, De dignitate sacerdotum. In 1519 he was ordained a priest. He was at that time in perfect harmony with the Church of Rome, the shield-bearer of Eck; and when, in 1520, he was called as preacher to Augsburg, his adoption of the principles of the Reformation could at all events not have been publicly known. It seems that the controversy between Eck and Luther gradually drew him towards the latter, and that the promulgation of the papal bull decided him. In Augsburg he openly preached the views of Luther: against the bull he wrote Anzuegung dass die Romisch Bull, etc., He was mentioned as author of many of those satirical pamphlets which in that year were published at Augsburg against the Romanists; and the clergy of the city were glad, when, in 1521, an incident offered them an opportunity of having him superseded by a trustworthy Romanist, Dr. Kratz.

After a short stay at Hall in the valley of the Inn, Rhegius returned in 1521 to Augsburg, and was appointed preacher at the Church of Ste. Anna. The state of affairs in the city was very critical. All the most violent elements of the time were seething within its walls, and Rhegius was not exactly a strong man. When the Peasants' War approached the city, he wrote Von Leibeigenschaft oder Knechtschaft (1525) and Schlussrede von weltlicher Gewalt; but he did not satisfy the lower classes, which sympathized with the peasants, and the Romanists ascribed the calamity to him and his party. When the great controversy broke out between the Swiss and the German Reformers concerning the Lord's Supper, his Wider den neuen Irrsal Dr. Karlstadt (1524) was found weak, and he was for some time strongly drawn towards the Zwinglian camp; first after 1527 he is again found firmly planted on Lutheran ground. Shortly before, the Anabaptists had entered the city, and formed a considerable party. Rhegius's Warnung wider den neuen Tauforden (1527) was not an unsuccessful move; but the disturbances were not quelled until the city council stepped forward, and decided to employ very severe measures, as, for instance, capital punishment. With the opening of the diet of 1530 Rhegius's activity in the city came to a sudden end. Immediately after his entrance, June 16, the emperor forbade the evangelical ministers to preach; and, shortly after, Rhegius entered the service of Duke Ernest of Lüneburg, and settled at Celle.

His labor in Northern Germany for the establishment of the Reformation in Lüneburg, Hanover, etc., was very successful; and to this last period of his life belong also some of his best works: Formule caute loquendi, 1535, in Latin, and 1536 in German, often reprinted, and considered almost as a symbolical book; Dialogus von der trostreichen Predigt (1537), a devotional book very much read during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, etc. In the present century the character of the man has been unfavorably judged by Dollinger, Keim, Keller, and others; and their charges of vanity, lack of strength, etc., are by no means unfounded. He was a humanist, and he fancied himself a poet. Nevertheless, he was one of those humanists who did not shrink back from the Reformation when it became deadly earnestness. His works, nearly complete, were edited by his son, in twelve volumes folio, Nuremberg, 1561-77. [His Formule was edited by H. Steinmetz, Celle, 1880.] See UHLHORN: Urbanus Rhegius, Elberfeld, 1861.

RHODES, an island of the Mediterranean, ten miles off the coast of Asia Minor, with a capital of the same name, became early known as a centre of commerce. The brazen statue at the entrance of the harbor, the so-called Colossus of Rhodes, was one of the seven wonders of the world. Paul visited the city on his return from his third missionary journey (Acts xxi. 1). The island vindicated its independence until the time of Vespasian, but under the Roman rule its prosperity gradually declined. The city, however, flourished much as a possession of the Knights of St. John, the last outpost of the Christians in the East (1399-1522); but, after its surrender to Soliman the Great, it fell rapidly into decay. See ED. BILIOTTI ET L'ABBÉ COTTRET: L'île de Rhodes, Compiègne, 1882.

RICCI, Lorenzo, b. at Florence, Aug. 2, 1709; d. in Rome, Nov. 24, 1775. He entered the order of the Jesuits in 1718, and became its general in 1758. He was a haughty and imperious man, ill suited for the position. To all propositions of reform, from the Pope and from the Roman-Catholic princes, he answered, "Sint ut sunt, aut non sint." The consequence of which was, that the Pope dissolved the order by the bull Dominus ac redemptor noster, July 21, 1773. Ricci was confined in the Castle of St. Angelo, and remained there for the rest of his life. His biography was written by CARRACCIOTTI in Italian, and by SAINTE-FOI in French.

RICCI, Scipione de', b. at Florence, Jan. 9, 1741; d. at the Villa Rignano, Jan. 27, 1810. Educated for the church, and ordained a priest in 1766, he was shortly after appointed auditor to the papal nuncio at Florence, in 1776 vicar-general to the Archbishop of Florence, and in 1780 bishop of Pistoja and Prato. He was a pious man, and sincerely devoted to the reform of the Roman-Catholic Church; and he found warm support in the grand duke Leopold, a brother of Joseph II. But the reforms on which the diocesan synod of Pistoja (1786) agreed, and which by the grand duke were laid before a general Tuscan synod held at Florence in 1787, were rejected by that assembly; and agents from Rome, together with the monks, brought about uproarious riots in Prato, which had to be put down by military force. In 1790 the grand duke left the country, and succeeded his brother as emperor of Germany; and in 1791 Ricci felt compelled to abdicate, and retire into private life. In 1794 followed the papal condemnation of the propositions of the synod of Pistoja. RICE, John Holt, D.D., Presbyterian; b. near New London, Bedford County, Va., Nov. 28, 1777; d. in Prince Edward County, Va., Sept. 3, 1831. He studied at Liberty-Hall Academy (later, Washington College); was tutor in Hampden-Sidney College, 1796-99 and 1800-01; in 1800 began the study of theology; was licensed in 1803; ordained and installed pastor at Cub Creek, Charlotte County, Va., in 1804. In May, 1812, he came to the first Presbyterian Church in Richmond, Va.; for up to that time the Presbyterians and Episcopalians had worshipped together. In 1815 he started The Christian Monitor, the first publication of the kind in Richmond, and in 1817, The Virginia Evangelical and Literary Magazine (discontinued in 1829). In 1819 he was moderator of the General Assembly at Philadelphia. In 1823 he was elected president of Princeton College, and professor in the Union Theological Seminary, Virginia. He accepted the latter position, and was installed in 1824. His publications consist chiefly of sermons, but include Memoir of Rev. James Brainerd Taylor (1830), and a work which made a great stir, Historical and Philosophical Considerations on Religion, addressed to James Madison (1832). See SPRAGUE: Annals, iv. 325.

RICE, Nathan Lewis, D.D., Presbyterian; b. in Garrard County, Ky., Dec. 29, 1807; d. in Bracken County, Ky., June 11, 1877. He studied at Centre College, Danville, Ky., but did not graduate; was licensed; went to Princeton for further theological study; and finally was settled at Bardstown, Ky., 1833. Noticing the success of the Roman Catholics in alluring Protestant children to their schools at Bardstown, he established there an academy for each sex, and also a newspaper, the Western Protestant, afterwards merged in the Louisville Presbyterian Herald. From 1841 to 1844 he was stated supply at Paris, Ky. In 1843 he had the famous debate at Lexington, Ky., with Alexander Campbell, founder of the Disciples, on the subject of baptism. He ably held his own, and won great repute. From 1841 to 1853 he was pastor in Cincinnati. During this period he held three other public debates: (1) in 1845, with Rev. J. A. Blanchard, on slavery; (2) in 1845, with Rev. E. Priggree, on universal salvation; (3) in 1851, with Rev. J. B. Purcell (afterwards Roman-Catholic archbishop; see art.), on Romanism. These debates, except the last, were published, and widely circulated. From 1853 to 1858 he was pastor in St. Louis, Mo. While there, edited the St. Louis Presbyterian. In 1855 he was elected moderator of the General Assembly (Old School) at Nashville, Tenn. From 1858 to 1861 he was pastor, and from 1859, also theological professor, at Chicago, Ill.; from 1861 to 1867, pastor in New-York City; from 1868 to 1874, president of Westminster College, Mo.; and from 1874 till his death, professor of theology in the theological seminary at Danville, Ky. Dr. Rice was a great debater and an able preacher. In New York he was listened to by crowded assemblies. He was one of the leaders of his denomination. His publications, besides the debates already referred to, include God Sovereign, and Man Free, Philadelphia; Romanism not Christianity, New York, 1847; Baptism, St. Louis, 1855; Immortality, Philadelphia.

RICH, Edmund. See EDMUND, ST.

RICHARD, Fitzralph (Armachanus), Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of Ireland; d. at Avignon, France, December, 1359. He was fellow of Balliol College, Oxford; was by Edward III. promoted to be archdeacon of Lichfield; and in 1333 became chancellor of the university of Oxford. He was for a time private chaplain to Richard de Bury, bishop of Durham (1333-45); but in July, 1347, he was consecrated archbishop of Armagh. He is chiefly known as an opponent of the mendicant orders, but left theological lectures, a commentary upon the Sentences of Peter Lombard, and two apologetico-polemical works, — one against Judaism (De intentionibus Judeorum); another against the errors of the Armenian Church, which wished to unite with the Roman Church, in nineteen books, called his Summa. The latter was prepared about 1350, at the request of John, bishop-elect of Khelat, and his brother Nerses, archbishop of Menaz-Kjerd. His attack on the mendicant orders was publicly begun in a course of eight sermons he preached in London, in which he maintained that Jesus never taught any one to beg, and that mendicancy was no part of the Franciscan rule. His discourses made a great stir. They were replied to by Roger Conway, D.D., of Oxford, a Franciscan. He was accused in the papal court, and therefore obliged to journey to Avignon in 1357 to defend himself. His travelling-expenses were probably partly paid by his fellow-bishops. He delivered his address in the council before Pope and cardinals, Nov. 8, 1357. But his bold move was unsuccessful. The story of his Bible translation into Irish is insufficiently supported. His works in print are, Defensio curatorum adversus Fratres mendicantes, Paris, 1496; Sermones quatuor ad Crucem, London, 1612. See John Wiclif, by LECHLER, Lorimer's translation, vol. i. pp. 75-88, pp. 117, 118.

RICHARD OF ST. VICTOR, d. 1173. Very little is known of his personal life. He was a native of Scotland, but became very early an inmate of the Augustine abbey of St. Victor, in Paris. He was chosen prior in 1162; and after a long contest he finally succeeded in driving away the abbot Ervicias, who scandalized the brethren by his frivolous life. Of Richard's writings quite a number are still extant, — exegetical, moral, theological, and mystical. As his method was the mystical allegory, his exegetical works have now only historical interest. His moral works (De statu interioris hominis, De eruditione interioris hominis, etc.) are also strongly colored by mysticism. Of his theological works, the principal are, De verbo incarnato, in which he praises sin as the filice culpa, because, if there had been no sin, there would have been no incarnation; De trinitate, one of his most original productions; De Emmanuele, against the Jews, etc. The most celebrated of his mystical works is his De gratia contemplationis, in which he gives the psychological theory of contemplatio as an intuition, an immediate vision of the divine, in contradistinction from cogitatio, the common reasoning, and meditatio, the pondering on a single, special subject. The first edition of his works is that of Paris, 1528; the best, that of Rouen, 1650. See J. G. V. ENGELHARDT: Richard von St. Victor, Erlangen, 1838; LIEBNER: Richardin doctrina, Göttingen, 1837-39. C. SCHMIDT.

RICHARD, Charles Louis, b. at Blainville-sur-Eau, Lorraine, 1711; executed at Mous, Aug. 16, 1794. He entered the Dominican order in 1727; taught theology in Paris; and took active part in the polemics against the encyclopedists. At the outbreak of the Revolution he settled in Belgium, and was overtaken by the French army of occupation. Too old to flee, he was seized, and sentenced to be shot, on account of his Parallèle des Juifs qui ont crucifié Jésus Christ avec les Français qui ont tué leur roi. His Dictionnaire des sciences ecclésiastiques (1760, 5 vols.) and Analyse des conciles (1722-77, 5 vols.) are still of value.

RICHARDS, James, D.D., Presbyterian; b. at New Canaan, Conn., Oct. 29, 1767; d. at Auburn, N.Y., Aug. 20, 1843. He entered Yale College in 1789; but poverty and ill health compelled him to leave at the end of freshman year. In 1793 he was licensed, and in May, 1797, ordained at Morristown, N.J. In 1805 he was moderator of the General Assembly. In 1809 he settled at Newark, N.J. In 1819 he was elected professor of theology in Auburn Theological Seminary, New York, but declined; however, upon his reelection in 1823, he accepted, and served the seminary with remarkable fidelity and ability. After his death, there were published his Lectures on Mental Philosophy and Theology, with a Sketch of his Life (New York, 1846), and A Selection of Twenty Sermons, with an Essay on his Character by WILLIAM B. SPRAGUE, D.D. (Albany, 1849). See SPRAGUE: Annals, iv. 99.

RICHARDS, William, American Congregational missionary; b. at Plainfield, Mass., Aug. 22, 1792; d. at Honolulu, Sandwich Islands, Dec. 7, 1847. He was graduated from Williams College, 1819, and from Andover Seminary, 1822, and on Nov. 19, 1822, sailed for the Sandwich Islands, under commission of the American Board. He was stationed at Lahaina, on the Island of Manui, and was very successful. In 1837 he returned home; went out again the next year; and, being taken into the king's confidence, he was made his counsellor, interpreter, and chaplain, while still continuing missionary labors. In 1842, on the independence of the islands being guaranteed by England, Belgium, France, and the United States of America, he was sent as ambassador to England and several other foreign courts. In 1845 he returned to Honolulu, and was appointed minister of public instruction, which made him a member of the king's privy council. See SPRAGUE: Annals, ii. 688.

RICHELIEU, Armand Jean Duplessis de, b. in Paris, Sept. 5, 1585; d. there Dec. 4, 1642. He was educated for the military profession, but took holy orders, and was in 1607 consecrated bishop of Luçon, and in 1622 made a cardinal. His career as a statesman he began in 1614, when sent as a deputy of the clergy to the states-general; and from 1622 to his death he governed France as its prime-minister. The great aim of his foreign policy was the humiliation of the house of Austria, the baffling of its aspirations to a world's empire; that of his home policy was the annihilation of the independence of the feudal lords, the establishment of the absolute authority of the crown. He succeeded in both fields. Very characteristic are his relations with the Protestants. Making a sharp distinction between religion and politics, he allied himself with the Protestants in Germany against the emperor; while in France he completely destroyed the political influence of the Huguenots. By the edict of grace (Nîmes, July 14, 1629) the fortifications of the cities of the Huguenots were razed, and their synods were not allowed to meet unless by authority of the government; but in other respects the freedom of worship, and the civil equality of Huguenots and Roman Catholics, were fully respected. See ROBSON: Life of Cardinal Richelieu, 1854; SCHYBERGSON: Le duc de Rohan et la chute du parti protestant en France, Paris, 1880.

RICHER, Edmund, b. under humble circumstances at Chource, a village of Champagne, Sept. 30, 1560; d. in Paris, Nov. 28, 1631. He entered the service of the church; studied theology; was made a doctor in 1590, and director of the College of Cardinal Lemoine in 1594. In 1629 he published his De ecclesiastica politica potestate (Cologne, 2 vols.), a learned and acute argument in favor of Gallicanism, defending the views of the Sorbonne, that the oecumenical council stands above the Pope, that in secular affairs the State is entirely independent of the Church, etc. He was deposed, however, and, with the assassin's knife on his neck, compelled to recant. See his life by BAILLET, Amst., 1715. C. SCHMIDT.

RICHMOND, Legh, Church of England; b. at Liverpool, Jan. 29, 1772; d. at Turvey, Bedfordshire, May 8, 1827. He was graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, 1794, and proceeded M.A., 1797. In the latter year he was ordained, and became a curate on the Isle of Wight. In 1805 he was made rector of Turvey. While a child, by leaping from a wall, he was lamed for life. He edited The Fathers of the English Church, or a Selection from the Writings of the Reformers and Early Protestant Divines of the Church of England, with Memorials of their Lives and Writings (London, 1807-12, 8 vols.), and wrote Domestic Portraiture, or the Successful Application of Religious Principle in the Education of a Family, exemplified in the Memoirs of the Three Deceased Children of the Rev. Legh Richmond (9th ed., 1861). But the work by which he is best known is The Annals of the Poor, 1814, 2 vols.; which contain those immortal tracts, The Dairyman's Daughter, The Negro Servant, and The Young Cottager, previously published separately. Of the first, four million copies, in nineteen languages, had been circulated before 1849. See his Memoirs by Rev. T. S. GRIMSHAW, London, 1828; 9th ed., 1829; edited by Bishop G. T. Bedell, Philadelphia, 1846.

RICHTER, Æmilius Ludwig, b. at Stolpen, near Dresden, Feb. 15, 1808; d. in Berlin, May 8, 1864. He studied jurisprudence, more especially ecclesiastical law, at the university of Leipzig, and was appointed professor there in 1835, at Marburg in 1838, and at Berlin in 1846. His works on ecclesiastical law — Lehrbuch des kathol. und evangel. Kirchenrechts, Leipzig, 1842 (7th ed. 1874); Die evangelische Kirchenordnungen des 16ten Jahrhunderts, Weimar, 1846; Corpus Juris Canonici, 1833-39 (the best edition of that work); Canones et Decreta Concilii Tridentini, Leipzig, 1853, etc. — have exercised a decisive influence on that branch of study.

RICHTER, Christian Friedrich Gottlieb, M.D., German hymnologist; b. at Sorau, Silesia, Oct. 5, 1676; d. at Halle, Oct. 5, 1711. After studying medicine and theology at Halle, he was appointed by Francke superintendent of the academy there, and, later, physician to the famous Halle Orphan-House. He was a Pietist. He wrote thirty-three excellent hymns, of which several have been translated; e.g., "Jesus my king! thy mild and kind control," "O watchman! will the night of sin," "My soul before thee prostrate lies," "O God! whose attributes shine forth in turn," "Thou Lamb of God! thou Prince of peace!" "Tis not too hard, too high, an aim." He also wrote four remarkable treatises upon the bodily sufferings of Christ during his crucifixion, contained in vol. iii. of his Opuscula Medica, Leipzig, 1780-81, 3 vols. For a brief account of his views, see LANGE: Matthew, p. 523, note. See RICHTER'S Leben u. Wirken als Arzt, Theolog. u. Dichter, Berlin, 1865; and MILLER: Singers and Songs of the Church, pp. 141, 142.

RIDDLE, Joseph Esmond, Church of England; b. about 1804; d. at Cheltenham, Aug. 27, 1859. He proceeded M.A. at Oxford, 1831; was ordained priest, 1832, and settled at Leckhampton, near Cheltenham, 1840. In 1852 he was Bampton lecturer. He is best known for his Latin-English Dictionary, founded on Freund, London, 1849, and (with T. K. Arnold) English-Latin Lexicon, 1849; but he also wrote the valuable Manual of Christian Antiquities, London, 1839, 2d ed., 1843; Ecclesiastical Chronology, 1840; Natural History of Infi- delity (his Bampton Lectures), 1852, besides other works.

RIDGLEY, Thomas, D.D., Independent; b. in London about 1667; d. there March 27, 1734. In 1695 he became assistant of Thomas Gouge; and in 1712, in conjunction with John Eames, established a theological school, in which he delivered his highly esteemed lectures upon the Westminster Assembly's Catechism, published as A Body of Divinity, London, 1731-33, 2 vols.; new ed., revised, corrected, and illustrated, with notes by Rev. J. M. Wilson, Edinb., 1844, N.Y., 1855.

RIDLEY, Nicholas, English reformer and martyr; was b. early in the sixteenth century at Wilmanstock, Northumberland; d. at the stake, in Oxford, Oct. 16, 1555. After studying at the grammar-school at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, he entered Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, in 1518; was supported by his uncle, Dr. Robert Ridley, fellow of Queen's College; and in 1522 became fellow of Pembroke. In 1527 he took orders, and went to the Sorbonne, Paris, and Louvain, for further studies. Returning to Cambridge in 1529, he became senior proctor in 1533. He was at that time much admired as a preacher. Fox calls his sermons "pithy sermons." Cranmer made him his domestic chaplain, and vicar of Herne, East Kent. In 1540 he became king's chaplain, and master of Pembroke Hall, and in 1541 prebendary of Canterbury. At this period he was accused, at the instigation of Bishop Gardiner, of preaching against the Six Articles. The case being referred to Gardiner, Ridley was acquitted. In 1545 he was made prebendary of Westminster, in 1547 bishop of Rochester, and in 1550 Bonner's successor in the see of London. Bishop Ridley's name will always be mentioned in the same breath with those of Cranmer and Latimer, and honored for its distinguished connection with the emancipation from the errors and superstitions of the papal system. In 1545 he publicly renounced the doctrine of transubstantiation, to which he was led by reading Bertram's Book on the Sacrament. He committed to memory, in the walks of Pembroke Hall, nearly all the Epistles in Greek. He was committed to the Tower, July 26, 1553, from which he was removed with Latimer to the jail of Bo-cardo, Oxford. There he was burned before Balliol Hall. The night before his execution he said to some friends, with whom he had supped, "I mean to go to bed, and, by God's will, to sleep as quietly as ever I did in my life." He seems to have been less imperturbable than his fellow-martyr, Latimer, who, on the way to the stake, cheered him up with the famous words, "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley: play the man. We shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as, I trust, shall never be put out." Fox has preserved an interesting account of Ridley, and describes him as "a man beautified with excellent qualities, so ghostly inspired and godly learned, and now written, doubtless, in the Book of Life," etc. Quarles has a poem on Ridley, in which he says, —

"Rome thundered death; but Ridley's dauntless eye Star'd in Death's face, and scorned Death standing bye.

In spite of Rome, for England's faith he stood;

ings behind him. They are, 1. Treatise against Image-Worship: Declaration against Transubstantiation; A Piteous Lamentation of the Miserable Estate of the Church in England in the Time of the Late Revolt from the Gospel, etc. And there have been published by the Religious Tract Society, London, Treatise and Letters of Dr. Nicholas Ridley; and by the Parker Society, The Works of Nicholas Ridley, Cambridge, 1841. See FOX: Acts and Monuments; DR. GLOUCESTER RIDLEY: Life of Bishop Ridley, London, 1763.

D. S. SCHAFF.
RIEGER, Georg Conrad, b. at Cannstadt, March 7, 1687; d. at Stuttgart, April 16, 1743. He studied theology at Tübingen, and was appointed professor at the gymnasium of Stuttgart in 1721, and pastor of St. Leonhard in 1733. He was one of the most celebrated preachers of the pietistic school of his age, and published a considerable number of sermons, which are still much read in Württemberg, — Herzensruhe, Züllichau, 1742 (latest edition, Stuttgart, 1853-54); Richtiger und leichter Weg zum Himmel, Stuttgart, 1744; Hochzeitpredigten, 1749 (latest edition, Stuttgart, 1856), etc.

PALMER.
RIGHTEOUSNESS, Original. (For the Righteousness of Faith see JUSTIFICATION.) The elder Protestant theologians designated by the term Justitia originalis, or "original righteousness," the condition of man as made in the image of God, and before the fall. It is found for the first time in the writings of the scholastics, but the treatment of the doctrine was begun by Augustine. In his treatise De peccator. mer. et remiss. (ii. 37), he uses the term prima justitia, "first righteousness." He considers the doctrine from the standpoint of man's creation in the divine image. Irenæus, Theophylact, Justin, and others, speak of this first estate as one of childlike simplicity and innocence. The statement of Athanasius (ed. Paris, ii. 225) stands alone: "Those who mortify the deeds of the body, and have put on the new man, which is created after God, have the man after his image; for such was Adam before his disobedience" (ἐχόντι το κατ' εἰκόνα, τοιοῦτος γάρ ἦν ὁ Ἀδὰμ πρὸ τῆς παρακοῆς). Prominence was given, in the treatment of this subject, to man's spiritual endowment with reason and freedom, by which he was to secure moral perfection. With Augustine the image of God is the inalienable "rational soul" (anima rationalis). This includes the will, with a positive inclination to holiness. The first man, however, stood in need of divine help to reach full righteousness (plena justitia). At first he was willing not to sin, and by supernatural grace he was able not to sin (posse non peccare). At the fall the concupiscence of the flesh (concupiscentia carnis) took the place of the good will (bona voluntas), and is itself sin; that is, the opposite of righteousness. After Augustine's death, semi-Pelagianism prevailed in the church; and at the synod of Orange, in 529, it was stated, that, "by the sin of Adam, the free will was so inclined and attenuated (attenuatum), that no one was afterwards able to love God as he should, to believe in God, or to be influenced concerning God, except the preventient grace of the divine mercy acted upon him." The scholastic theologians went farther. They dated the discord between flesh and spirit before the fall. The divine grace subjected the former to the latter in the case of Adam: therefore man's original righteousness was a superadded gift (donum superadditum). The proof was found in the alleged difference between likeness and image (similitudo imago, Gen. i. 26). The essential elements of the divine image were reason and will. Eternal life was a superadded gift.

The Reformers, with their deep sense of the sinfulness of sin, defined the original state of man as one in which righteousness and goodness were essential elements. Bellarmine developed the Roman-Catholic doctrine. As man came forth from the Creator's hands, he consisted of flesh and spirit, and stood related to the animals and the angels. By the latter he had intelligence and will; by the former, passions and appetite (sensus et affectus). A conflict arose, and from the conflict a terrible difficulty in doing well (ingens bene agendi difficultas). This was the disease of nature (morbus naturæ) which inheres in matter; hence God added the gift of original righteousness. It was this perfection of the divine image, and not the image itself, which man lost at the fall.

The question is, whether man began with a state of absolute moral perfection, as the older Protestant theologians, especially the Lutheran theologians, asserted. Against this view, Julius Müller properly brings the objection that it excludes the possibility of the fall. But man's original condition was not one without a positive inclination to goodness. His will had this disposition; but, while it was in harmony with God's will, it might sin, and in the possibility of its sinning consisted its freedom. It was man's duty to preserve his rectitude by his own voluntary choice, thus confirming God's work. The doctrine of man's original righteousness is not necessarily found in Eph. iv. 24, but in Gen. i., ii., Eccl. vii. 29, and especially in the scriptural definitions of sin, — as a defiance of the divine will, and the cause of human corruption, and the analogy presented by the righteousness of faith. RIMMON (רִמּוֹן, pomegranate), the name of an Aramaic divinity mentioned by Naaman (2 Kings v. 18). It occurs as the name of three places (Josh. xv. 32; 1 Chron. vi. 77; Judg. xx. 45), and also as a proper name (2 Sam. iv. 2); but it is uncertain whether, in these cases, the name comes from the god, or the pomegranate. The LXX. makes a distinction between them, calling the god Ῥεμμῶν, and the pomegranate Ῥεμμῶν, Ῥεμμῶν. The correct form for the god's name is, indeed, Raman, or Ramman; for he is the Assyrian god Rammanu. The best explanation of the word is "the height." The many-seeded pomegranate is the symbol of fruitfulness. The tree was holy, and its fruit appears upon the sculptures in the hands of deities (Baal Ihamman, Zeus Kasios). Astarte planted the pomegranate upon Cyprus: hence the close connection between the name "pomegranate" and the god. See BAUDISSIN: Studien; P. SCHOLZ: Gotzendienst. WOLF BAUDISSIN.

RING, Melchior, was schoolmaster at Hersfeld, when in 1524 he became acquainted with Thomas Münzer, and soon, also, one of his most ardent disciples. In the same year he went to Sweden as leader of an Anabaptist movement in Stockholm, but returned shortly after to take part in the Peasants' War. After a visit to Switzerland, he began to preach in the vicinity of Hersfeld, attacking the Lutherans with great violence; but in 1531 he was imprisoned by the landgrave of Hesse, and probably never released. His writings have perished.

RINGS were used as ornaments for the nose, the ears, the arms, and the legs, and more especially for the fingers, as far back in the history of the human race as historical researches reach. The Babylonians, Hebrews, Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans, and the barbaric peoples of Teutonic origin which invaded Europe, or, rather, the Roman Empire, at the beginning of our era, wore them. In course of time, however, the ornament received a special signification, and the finger-ring became a token of authority, or a sign of a pledge. A token of authority was that ring which Pharaoh gave to Joseph (Gen. xli. 42), or Ahasuerus to Haman (Esth. iii. 10), or Antiochus to Philip (1 Macc. vi. 15); and so was the ring which every member of the equestrian order in the Roman Commonwealth wore. After the battle of Cannæ, Hannibal sent a bushel of such rings to Carthage. A sign of a pledge was the ring, which, among the Hebrews and the Romans, the bridegroom gave to the bride on the occasion of their betrothal, and which in the tenth century of our era became the Christian marriage-ring. A combination of both these significations is represented by the episcopal ring, which is at once emblematic of his espousal to the church and of the power of his office, whence it is sometimes called annulus sponsalitiis, and sometimes annulus palatii. At what time it became a part of the official costume of a bishop is not exactly known. It is mentioned for the first time in the second book of the Ecclesiastical Offices by Isidore of Seville, 595-633, then in a letter from Pope Boniface IV., read in the Council of Rome, 610, and in the twenty-eighth canon of the Fourth Council of Toledo, 633. For the "Fisherman's Ring," see ANNULUS PISCATORII. See MARTIGNY: Des Anneaux chez les premiers Chrétiens, Mâcon, 1858.

RINKART, Martin, German hymnologist; b. at Eilenburg, April 23, 1586; d. there, as archdeacon, Dec. 8, 1649. After studying at Leipzig, and serving as pastor in Eisleben and Eudeborn, he settled in Eilenburg (1617), and there remained till his death: thus his settlement was synchronous with the Thirty-Years' War. In the pestilence of 1637, and famine of 1638, he was a savior to his fellow-townsmen; and when the Swedish Lieut.-Col. Dörfling, on Feb. 21, 1639, demanded thirty thousand thalers (ten thousand dollars) as the ransom of the city from destruction, and he had pleaded in vain, he assembled the citizens to prayer and service, with the result that the victorious Swede at last accepted two thousand gulden (one thousand dollars) as ransom. But it is as the author of the German Te Deum (Nun danket alle Gott, 1614) that Rinkart is immortal. The hymn is in three stanzas, of which the first two are based upon Sirach, lines 24-26, and the third upon the old Gloria Patri. Miss Winkworth has made a close English translation. See PLATO: M. Rinkart, Leipzig, 1830; MILLER: Singers and Songs of the Church, pp. 56, 57.

RIPLEY, Henry Jones, D.D., Baptist; b. in Boston, Mass., Jan. 28, 1798; d. at Newton Centre, Mass., May 21, 1875. He was graduated at Harvard University, 1816, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1819; was evangelist among the Southern slaves from 1819 to 1826, with the exception of one year. In 1826 he became professor of biblical literature and pastoral duties in the newly founded Newton Theological Institution; from 1832 he taught biblical literature only, until in 1839 he was transferred to the chair of sacred rhetoric and pastoral duties. He resigned in 1860; for five years engaged in literary work and evangelistic labors among the freedmen of Georgia; in 1865 became librarian of Newton; and from 1872 to 1875 was associate professor of biblical literature. Besides much work in periodicals, he wrote, Memoir of Rev. T. S. Winn, Boston, 1824; Christian Baptism, 1833; Notes on the Four Gospels, 1837-38, 2 vols.; Notes on the Acts of the Apostles, 1844; Sacred Rhetoric, 1849; Notes on Romans, 1857; Exclusiveness of the Baptists, 1857; Church Polity, 1867; Notes on Hebrews, 1868.

RIPON, a town in Yorkshire, Eng. The abbot of Melrose founded a monastery there in 661, which the Danes destroyed in 867. The cathedral was begun in 1331, finished, probably, 1494. The town was made the seat of a bishopric in 1836.

RIPPON, John, D.D., a prominent Baptist minister, and for sixty-three years pastor of a single charge in London; was b. at Tiverton, Devon, April 29, 1751; and d. in London, Dec. 17, 1836. He edited the Baptist Annual Register, 1790-1802, An Arrangement of the Psalms, Hymns, etc., of Dr. Watts, and A Selection of Hymns, 1787, 10th ed., enlarged, 1800. Some of the contents of this last are supposed to be wholly or in part his own; but his services to hymnody are much more eminent as a compiler than as a composer. His Selection included many originals by Beddome, S. Stennett, Ryland, Turner, Francis, and others, and brought to public notice many lyrics previously in print, but little known. Frequently reprinted, and consulted by almost every subsequent compiler, its direct and indirect influences have been incalculable. It ranks as one of the half-dozen hymn-books of most historical importance in the English language. F. M. BIRD.

RISLER, Jeremiah, Moravian; b. at Mühlhausen, Upper Alsace, Nov. 9, 1720; d. at Berthelsdorf, Saxony, Aug. 23, 1811. He was graduated at Basel; from 1744 to 1760 a Reformed minister at Lübeck and St. Petersburg, but from 1760 to his death a Moravian; from 1782 a bishop; and from 1786 a member of the Unity's Elders Conference. He was an eloquent preacher, and faithful bishop. He made a French translation of Zinzendorf's Discourses, and of the Hymnal (1785), wrote La sainte doctrine (1769), Leben von A. G. Spangenberg (Barby u. Leipzig, 1794), and Erzählungen aus der Brüdergeschichte, 3 vols.

RITTER, Karl, b. at Quedlinburg, Aug. 7, 1779; d. in Berlin, Sept. 25, 1859; was appointed professor of geography in the university of Berlin in 1820, and gave a new and powerful impulse to that branch of study. Those of his works which interest the student of the Bible are Der Jordan und die Beschiffung des Todten Meeres, Berlin, 1850; Ein Blick auf Palästina, Berlin, 1852; The Comparative Geography of Palestine and the Sinaitic Peninsula, trans. by Gage, Edinburgh, 1866, 4 vols.

RITUAL means a regulation of external worship, and has aptly been defined as "the external body of words and action by which worship is expressed and exhibited before God and man."

RITUALE ROMANUM. After the Council of Trent, the popes took great care to suppress the various rituals which had developed within the pale of the Roman Church, and to establish uniformity of worship throughout the church. For that purpose, Pius V. published the Breviarium Romanum and the Missale Romanum; Clement VIII., the Pontificale and Ceremoniale; and Paul V., the Rituale Romanum, which, by a decree of June 16, 1611, was made obligatory on all the officers of the Church of Rome. See J. CATALANUS: Sacrarum Ceremon. sive Rituum Eccles. S. Rom. Ecclesie Lib. Tres, Rome, 1750, 2 vols. fol. H. F. JACOBSON.

RITUALISM. This popular catchword is used to describe the second stage of that movement in the English Church which in its earlier condition had been named Tractarianism. The name first appears, probably, in connection with the riots at St. George's-in-the-East in 1859 (cf. quotation from East London Observer of May, 1859, quoted in Letter to Bishop of London, by Bryan King, 1860).

The revival of interest in Catholic dogma, effected by the Oxford writers of the Tracts for the Times, was naturally succeeded by a revival of interest in Catholic observances. This practical revival carried the movement into novel circumstances and situations; for the earlier detection and exhibition of that sacerdotal structure of the church which had been secured to it by struggles of the Elizabethan divines, was carried on, of necessity, in the intellectual, academic region. The claim asserted, first had to make good its doctrinal status: it had to begin by working its way into the mind and the imagination. The Tractarian writers recognized this necessary order: they anxiously held aloof from precipitating those effects, which they, nevertheless, distinctly anticipated from this teaching. "We the old Tractarians," wrote Dr. Pusey in the Daily Express, May 21, 1877, "deliberately abstained from innovating in externals." "We understood the 'Ornaments Rubric' in its most obvious meaning, — that certain ornaments were to be used which were used in the second year of King Edward VI.: we were fully conscious that we were disobeying it; but we were employed in teaching the faith to a forgetful generation, and we thought it injurious to distract men's minds by questions about externals. We left it for the church to revive" (Letter of Dr. Pusey to English Church Union). Also, Letter to the Times, March 28, 1874: "There was a contemporary movement for a very moderate ritual in a London congregation. We (the Tractarians) were united with it in friendship, but the movements were unconnected."

As soon as their teaching had secured believers, it set itself to apply its principles in action; and this active application of recovered belief in a sacerdotal church inevitably took the form of recovering and re-asserting that liturgical structure which still underlay the Book of Common Prayer.

The movement, in making this fresh effort, passed from the study to the street: it became practical, missionary, evangelistic. It insisted that its work upon the masses, in their dreary poverty, demanded the bright attraction and relief of outward ornament, and the effective teaching of the eye. This change from the university to the town was signalized by the establishment of, e.g., St. Saviour's, Leeds (to which the Tractarian leaders lent all their authority), and of the Margaret-street Chapel, under F. Oakeley, a devoted companion of J. H. Newman.

The transition to ritual was not only a practical expediency, it was also the logical outcome of the new position; for the doctrinal revival lay in its emphatic assertion of the conception of mediation, of mediatorial offering. This mediation was, it taught, effected by the taking of flesh; i.e., of the outward to become the offering, the instrument of worship. The body of the Lord was the one acceptable offering, sanctified by the Spirit; and in and through that mediatorial body all human nature won its right to sanctification, to holy use. The spirit needs, according to this teaching, an outward expression to symbolize its inward devotion. Its natural mode of approach to God is through sacramental signs; and the use of special sacraments justifies, of necessity, the general use of visible symbols. If grace comes through outward pledges, then devotion will obviously be right in using for its realization forms and signs and gestures; love will be right in showing itself through beauty; and prayer and praise will instinctively resort to ceremonial.

Nor was the pressure towards ritual merely doctrinal. The double movement in the church had its parallel in the secular world. The spiritual revival of Wordsworth had its reflex in the emotional revival of Walter Scott. The set of things was running counter to Puritan bareness. The force and reality of imagination in the shaping of life's interests were recognized with the glad welcome of a recovered joy. A touch of kindness repeople the earth with fancies and suggestions, and visions and dreams. This world was no longer a naked factory, housing the machinery of a precise and unyielding dogma; nor was it the bare and square hall in which reason lectured on the perils of a morbid enthusiasm: it was a garden once more, rich with juicy life, and warm with color. This literary warmth mixed itself in with the doctrinal movement towards the enrichment of the churches. The emotions were making new demands upon outward things: they required more satisfaction. They had been taught by the novelists to turn to the past, whether of cavaliers with plumes and chivalry, or of the middle ages with wild castles and belted knights, and praying monks and cloistered nuns. All this world of strange mystery and artistic charm had become alive again to them, and the revival made them discontented with the prosy flatness of common life. The churches were responding to a real and wide need when they offered a refuge and a relief to the distressed imagination. Everywhere began the Gothic revival. The restoration of the disgraced and destitute parish churches, which had become practically necessary, was taken up by men full of admiration for the architecture which had first built them. They were passionately set on bringing them back as far as possible into their original condition. The architects thus were, indirectly, ardent workers on the side of the ecclesiastical revival. They eagerly studied liturgical correctness in restoring the beauty of the chancels, in placing the altar at its proper height and distance, in arranging the screen and the stalls, the altar-rails and credence-table. This combination of ecclesiastical and architectural sentiment was greatly furthered by the Cambridge Ecclesiological Society; which did much to foster antiquarian exactness, and to promote active efforts at restoration. (BERESFORD HOPE'S Worship in the Church of England.) This architectural movement, which dated its earliest impulses from J. H. Newman's church, built at Littlemore amid much ferment and anxiety, culminated in the vast achievements of Gilbert Scott and George Street, whose handiwork has been left in restored churches throughout the length and breadth of England. This general restoration of order and fairness into the public services, which ran level with the renewal of church fabrics, roused much popular hostility, which made itself known in riotous disturbances, as at Exeter, etc., chiefly directed against the use of the surplice in the pulpit, following a direction for its use given in a charge by Bishop Blomfield in 1842.

But just as the artistic movement deepened from the external ornamentation of the Waverley novels into the impassioned mysticism of D. G. Rossetti and the pre-Raphaelite brothers, so the architectural revival deepened into the symbolism of a more rapt sacramentalism. This it was which produced the historical crisis; and this crisis became yet more critical by forcing into sharp antagonism the civil and ecclesiastical jurisdictions which were called upon to deal with the renovating ministers. The story of the movement turns round the various legal judgments given to determine the sense of the "Ornaments Rubric;" i.e., the Rubric inserted, in its first form, into the Prayer-Book of Elizabeth, and re-inserted, in a slightly changed form, in the Prayer-Book of the Restoration, prescribing the ornaments of the minister and of the chancel during all offices. The aim of the Elizabethan divines had been to secure the main work of the Reformation, and yet to protect the Liturgy from the "loose and licentious handling" of the more eager of the Marian exiles. They had therefore accepted, with some important alterations, the second of the two Prayer-Books of Edward VI. as the standard of the Reformed services; but, owing to the strong pressure of the queen, they refused to adopt it also as the standard of the ornaments; and for this they went back to an earlier date, the second year of King Edward VI., when much ritual remained which the first Prayer-Book of Edward VI. had accepted, but which the second book had rejected. There is no doubt that this included and intended chas-

bles and copes, albs and tunicles, with other details of altar-furniture. The question that arose was as to how far this Rubric, when re-enacted in the Act of Uniformity, was intended by the divines of the Restoration to retain its full original sense. In its earlier form it was prescribed "until the queen should take further order." Was that "further order" ever taken? and, if so, does the later condition of the Rubric, in omitting any reference to this "further order," assume that order, or ignore it? If it ignored it, why was it never acted upon? For certainly these ornaments have never been in full use. But, if it assumed it, how was it possible not to define what the "order" was, or to prescribe still the second year of Edward VI. as the standard, without a hint of any qualification? Round this main issue a swarm of complicated historical, legal, and liturgical arguments arose; and who was to decide among them? Here started up a new difficulty. The juridical relations between Church and State were the result of a most long and intricate history, which at the Reformation had finally assumed this general form. The old machinery of ecclesiastical courts remained entire, — consisting of the Bishop's Courts of First Instance, in which the bishop's chancellor adjudicated; and the Archbishop's Court of Appeal, in which the dean of arches gave judgment, as the embodiment of the archbishop. But from this, again, there was to be an appeal to the king; and for hearing such appeals a composite court had been erected by Henry VIII., the Court of Delegates, the exact jurisdiction of which had never been clearly defined. This had continued, rarely used, dimly considered, until, without anybody's notice, a great legal reform, carried out by Lord Brougham, was discovered to have transferred, without intending it, all the power of this Court of Delegates to a certain Committee of Privy Council, composed and defined for other general purposes. When suddenly there was need of a final adjudication on anxious and agitating spiritual questions, it was this Committee of Privy Council which the rival parties found themselves facing. It dealt with the question of baptism, in the case of Mr. Gorham (1850); and Bishop Blomfield of London had in consequence, speaking in the House of Lords, protested against the nature and character of the committee as a court of final appeal in ecclesiastical questions. No change, however, had been effected; and in March, 1857, the question of ritual was brought before it, on appeal, in the case of "Westerton vs. Liddell," in which case the ritualistic practices of St. Barnabas, Pimlico, had been condemned in the Consistory Court of London and in the Court of Arches. Amidst great excitement, the committee pronounced that the Rubric permitted generally the use of those articles which were prescribed under the first Prayer-Book, and therefore sanctioned the use of credence-table, altar-cross, altar-lights, colored altar-cloths, etc. From that moment the Ritualists have acted steadily in the belief that this legal decision was but affirming that which is the plain, historical sense of the words in the Rubric, and have pressed, often with rashness, sometimes with insolence, for the revival of all the ritual which this interpretation justified. In accomplishing this, they have been aided, advised, and sustained by the elaborate organization of the English Church Union, numbering now over twenty thousand members, formed for the defence and protection of those, who, in carrying out the Rubric so understood, were menaced by perils and penalties. For however favorable single congregations might be, yet the work of revival had to be carried on, (1) in defiance of the long unbroken usage, which had never attempted any thing beyond that simpler ritual which had been adopted and allowed as the practicable minimum under Elizabeth and Charles II.; (2) in defiance of the bishops, whose paternal authority was generally exercised to suppress, by any pressure in their power, any sharp conflict with this common custom; (3) in defiance of fierce popular suspicion, roused by dread of Romish uses, such as broke out, e.g., in the hideous rioting at St. George's-in-the-East (1858-60), which the weakness of the Bishop of London, and the apathy of the government, allowed to continue for months, and finally to succeed in expelling the rector, Mr. Bryan King, and in wrecking his service; (4) in defiance of the Court of Final Appeal, which in a series of fluctuating, doubtful, and conflicting judgments, had created a deep distrust in its capacity to decide judicial questions so rife with agitated feelings and popular prejudices. This distrust—strongly roused by the Mackonochie judgment (1868) and the Purchas judgment (1871), in which it was supposed, in spite of obvious paradox, that every thing not mentioned in the Prayer-Book was disallowed and illegal—culminated in the Ridsdale judgment (1877), in which it was declared that the “further order” allowed the Queen had been taken in the issuing of the advertisements under Archbishop Parker, and that the divines of Charles II. therefore, when they permitted the ritual of the second year of Edward VI., really intended only so much of it as was required in the Elizabethan advertisements. This startling decision the main block of High-Church clergy found it impossible to respect or accept; and this repudiation of its verdict brought to a head the protest that had been made ever since the Gorham judgment against the validity of the court itself as an ecclesiastical tribunal. This last problem had been made critical by the famous Public-Worship Regulation Act (1874), introduced in the House of Lords by the Archbishop of Canterbury, in disregard of the protests of the Lower House of Convocation, and declared in the House of Commons to be a “bill to put down ritualism” by Mr. Disraeli, then prime-minister, who, in spite of Mr. Gladstone’s impetuous opposition, carried it, amid intense excitement, in an almost unanimous House. This bill swept away all the process in the diocesan courts: it allowed any three aggrieved parishioners to lodge a complaint, which, unless stayed by the bishop’s veto, was carried before an officer nominated normally by the two archbishops to succeed to the post of dean of arches on its next vacancy. From him the appeal would be, as before, to the Privy Council. Thus the scanty fragments of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, which, under existent conditions might be supposed to balance the civil character of the Court of Appeal, were all but wholly abolished. The attempt to enforce this bill by the bishops was met by absolute resistance, ending, after being challenged at every turn by technical objections, in the imprisonment of four priests.

In this collision with the courts, the Ritualists had the steady support of the mass of High-Church clergy, who had held aloof from their more advanced and dubious ritual. This support evidenced itself in the “Declaration” of over four thousand clergy, headed by the Deans of St. Paul’s, York, Durham, Manchester, etc. (1881). The condition of things had become intolerable; and in 1881 a royal commission was issued to consider the whole position of ecclesiastical jurisdiction. A similar mode of relief had been attempted in 1867, when a royal commission on ritual had been appointed, which under the chairmanship of Archbishop Longley,—after taking an immense mass of evidence, and after prolonged discussions,—had issued a report on the crucial point of the Ornaments Rubric, which recommended the “restraint” of the use of vestments, “by providing some effectual process for complaint and redress,” but which, by the use of the word “restrain,” declined to declare their illegality, and then had found itself unable to attain any thing like unanimous agreement on the nature of the legal process which it proposed to recommend. The inner history of the commission will be found in the third volume of Bishop’s Wilberforce’s Life. No legislation on the main subject followed this divided report. But convocation in 1879, and the Pan-Anglican Synod in 1880, had come to resolutions more or less in accord with the commissioners’ report, in the sense of recommending a prohibitory discretion to the bishop in any case where a change of vesture was attempted. Such a recommendation seemed naturally to allow and assume the abstract legality of the change. Yet the courts of law had finally decreed vestments illegal, and the majority of bishops were prepared to accept their interpretation; and, as long as they did so, no terms of peace could be found on the basis of the proposal in convocation. For even though the bishops were willing to abstain, in favorable cases, from pressing the legal decisions, they were forced to set the law in motion by the action of a society called the “Church Association,” which exerted itself to assert and support the rights of any parishioners who might be aggrieved by the ritual used in any church. Thus the exercise of discretion was made all but impossible to a bishop, who could only veto proceedings brought against a clergyman by giving a valid reason, and yet was forbidden to offer as a valid reason the possible legality of the vestments.

The Commission on Ritual, therefore, had left the conflict still severe and unappeased. The Commission on Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction is still sitting. It has relieved excited feelings by allowing that the condition of that jurisdiction is open to question. And the last act of Archbishop Tait, on his death-bed, was to suggest a truce to the fierce legal prosecutions which had imbittered the long controversy, by bringing about an arrangement which would terminate the historic case of Martin vs. Mackonochie, round which the contest had turned for eighteen years. Thus the tension has slackened: the possibility of peace seems to have become conceivable. The question has widened from the consideration of ritual to the problem of the permanent adjustment of Church and State. The days of ritual fever and ritual wilfulness are passing. The chaos which the absence of all reliable law produced had made wilfulness and arbitrary extravagance inevitable. Men indulged their own ritualistic fancies, without consideration and without reality. But they have themselves learned the weariness of disorder and the folly of anarchic revolt. The evangelization of the masses grows more urgently needful; and in face of this need all men are anxious to be relieved from the fret of a war about external details. Still, peace seems only attainable under the condition that the Ritualists can secure for themselves a discretionary concession for the use of that ceremonial which the contested Rubric appears still to prescribe, however much long usage may have negated its prescriptions; for, as things stand, the dilemma announced to the Ritual Commissioners by Bishop Phillpotts of Exeter is as acute as ever: "Enforce the Rubric, and you will produce a rebellion: alter the Rubric, and you will have a shipwreck." RIVET, André, b. at Saint-Maixent in Poitou, Aug. 5, 1573; d. at Breda, Holland, Jan. 7, 1651. He studied theology in the academies of Orthez and La Rochelle; and was appointed minister at Thouars in 1595, and professor at Leyden in 1620. In 1632 he removed to Breda as director of the College of Orange. He was a prolific writer, and of his works — exegetical, polemical, and edificatory — a collected edition appeared at Rotterdam, 1651, 3 vols. folio. ROBERT THE SECOND. Robert II., king of France, and son of Hugh Capet, was b. at Orleans about 970; and d. at Melun, July 20, 1031. He was crowned 988, and became sole king 996 [997]. He married (1) Lieutgarde, or Bosale, widow of Arnoul, Count of Flanders; (2) Bertha, widow of first Count of Chartres and Blois; and (3) Constance, daughter of William, Count of Arles. Bertha being his cousin (four times removed), the Pope, Gregory V. (998), ordered his divorce. Robert resisted, but was forced to submit, and humble himself, before the ban was taken off. In all other particulars Robert is a pattern of conformity, and more a monk than a king. He loved music and poetry, founded four monasteries, built seven churches, and supported three hundred paupers entirely, and a thousand partially. By the help of his ecclesiastical influence he managed to reign thirty-four years. But his true place was in the cloister, and he could ill cope with the affairs of his time. By his third wife, a handsome shrew, he had four sons and two daughters. Robert's natural son, Amauri, was great-great-grandfather (trisaïeul) to Simon de Montfort. The best title Robert has to our regard is from his Veni, Sancte Spiritus (Come, Holy Spirit), which is one of the greatest of Latin hymns.

ROBERTSON, Frederick William, English preacher; b. in London, Feb. 3, 1816; d. at Brighton, Aug. 15, 1853; eldest son of Frederick Robertson, a captain in the royal artillery. His education was begun under the personal superintendence of his father, who instructed him for four years. In 1829 the family removed to Tours, where he studied the classics with an English tutor, and attended a French seminary; but, owing to the Revolution of 1830, his father returned to England, and Frederick was placed at the Edinburgh academy, under Archdeacon Williams. From the academy he passed to the university, where he attended various classes, and whence, at the age of eighteen, he returned to his home with great store of miscellaneous knowledge, and many pleasant memories. In 1833 he was articled to a solicitor in Bury St. Edmunds; but, after a year at the desk, his health broke down, and it was resolved that he should enter the army, for which he had a strong predilection. But, weary with waiting for a commission, he at length determined, on the urgent advice of some wise friends, to study for the ministry; and on May 4, 1837, he was examined and matriculated in Brazenose, Oxford. Five days after, he received the offer of a commission in the Second Dragoons; but the decision had been made, and the offer was declined, although all through his life he retained his martial tastes, and his character had the finest qualities of military heroism. He was known at Oxford "as one who carried the banner of the cross without fear, and was not ashamed of Christ." He took a lively interest in the debates of the Union, but was, perhaps, more influenced by Arnold and Wordsworth than by the studies prescribed in the curriculum. He was ordained by the bishop of Winchester on July 12, 1840, and was for a year curate in that city. He began his ministry with deep earnestness and devout humility, and practised the most rigorous austerities, by which his health was broken down, so that he was compelled to seek rest on the Continent. While there, he married at Geneva, and almost immediately after returned to Cheltenham, where, in the summer of 1842, he accepted the curacy of Christ Church, and performed its duties for nearly five years. In September, 1846, he went again to the Continent; and there, while wandering in the Tyrol, he passed through that spiritual crisis which he has so vividly described in his lecture to working-men. Hitherto he had been ranked among the Evangelicals of the Episcopal Church; but now, after a terrible struggle, in which his faith at one time could hold by nothing but that "it is always right to do right," he came out at length on the side of the Broad School. He therefore resigned his Cheltenham curacy, and accepted the charge of St. Ebbes, Oxford, on which he entered in the beginning of 1847. Thence he went to Trinity Church, Brighton, where he began his work, Aug. 15, 1847, and where he continued till his death, precisely seven years after. In this place he gathered round him a large congregation of intelligent and admiring hearers, and threw himself warmly into special efforts for the welfare of workingmen, for whom he formed an institute, and to whom he delivered some of his ablest lectures. But though he was popular as a preacher while he lived, — so popular, indeed, as to become a target for the shots of the Record, and the party whom that newspaper represented, — yet it was not until he died that his influence was appreciably felt by the great world. After his brief pastorate in Brighton, it was natural that some memorial of his ministry should be desired by his people; and so, though he never wrote his sermons before delivery, a volume of posthumous sermons was made up from the written reports of them which he had sent to a friend after they had been preached. When these were published, they were at once seen to be characterized by great freshness of thought, independence of judgment, and fervor of heart; and the volume ran through many editions. A second collection of discourses was soon called for: this was succeeded by a third, and that again by a fourth, comprising Expository Lectures on the Epistles of the Corinthians. These were followed by a collection of Lectures and Addresses on Literary and Social Topics, and, so late as 1881, by The Human Race and Other Sermons, preached at Cheltenham, Oxford, and Brighton.

Robertson was greatest in the analysis of character and motive. His biographical sermons are among the best of that class which our language contains: those on Jacob, Elijah, David, and John the Baptist, deserve to be ranked beside those of Butler and Newman on Balaam, and are worthy of the deepest study. His experimental discourses are almost equally admirable; and some of his practical, like that on the parable of the Sower, are exceedingly powerful. But his doctrinal discussions are one-sided and unsatisfactory; and in that department he is not to be unqualifiedly commended, or implicitly followed. No thorough account of the occasion of his change of view from almost ultra Evangelicalism to the opinions of the Broad School is furnished by his biographer. His sermons at Winchester contain all the characteristic doctrines against which he afterwards so deliberately protested at Brighton; and in his later days, as his biographer has admitted, he showed but scant justice to the Evangelical party; and, if there was any intolerance in his nature, it oozed out there. It has always seemed to us that some personal difference must have been at the beginning of his estrangement from those with whom he was first identified; but, in the absence of particulars, it is impossible to determine, and, in the presence of his better sermons, it is invidious to inquire. His letters, so many of which are given in his biography, are as suggestive as his discourses; and the memoir, as a whole, is full of stimulus to all, but especially to those who are looking forward to the office of the ministry. In his life he was often tempted to despond, as if he was spending his strength for nought; but his death has multiplied his usefulness, and widened his influence. Had he lived till now, it is questionable if he would have told on men in England and America to any thing like the extent that he is telling to-day.

ROBERTSON, James Craigie, Church of England; b. at Aberdeen, 1813; d. at Canterbury, July 9, 1882. He was graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, 1834; was vicar of Beckesbourne, near Canterbury, from 1846 to 1859, when he was appointed canon of Canterbury. From 1864 to 1874 he was professor of ecclesiastical history, Kings College, London. His historical works take high rank. He wrote, How shall we conform to the Liturgy of the Church of England? London, 1843, 3d ed., 1869; History of the Christian Church to the Reformation, 1853-73, 4 vols., new ed., 1873-75, 8 vols.; Sketches of Church History, 1855-78, 2 parts; Biography of Thomas Becket, 1859; Plain Lectures on the Growth of the Papal Power, 1876; edited HEYLYN'S History of the Reformation, 2 vols., for the Ecclesiastical Society, 1849; BARGRAVE'S Alexander VII. and his Cardinals, 1866; and Materials for the History of Thomas Becket, 8 vols., in the Master of the Rolls series, Chronicles and Memorials of Great Britain, 1875-82.

ROBINSON, Edward, D.D., LL.D., an eminent biblical scholar, and pioneer of modern Palestine exploration; b. at Southington, Conn., April 10, 1794; d. in New-York City, Tuesday, Jan. 27, 1863. He was graduated first in his class at Hamilton College, Clinton, N.Y., 1816, and after studying law at Hudson, N.Y., in 1817 returned there as tutor in mathematics and Greek. He held the position only a year. On Sept. 3, 1818, he married Miss Eliza Kirkland, daughter of the Oneida missionary, who, however, died the next year. From his marriage until 1821 he worked his wife's farm, but also pursued his studies. In the autumn of 1821 he went to Andover to superintend the printing of his edition of part of the Iliad (bks. i.-ix., xviii., xxii.), which appeared in 1822, and while there, under Professor Moses Stuart's influence, began his career as biblical scholar and teacher. From 1823 to 1826 he was instructor in the Hebrew language and literature at Andover Theological Seminary, meanwhile busily occupied with literary labors. He assisted Professor Stuart in the second edition of his Hebrew Grammar (Andover, 1823, 1st ed., 1813), and in his translation of Winer's Grammar of the New-Testament Greek (1825), and alone translated Wahl's Clavis philologica Novi Testamenti (1825). In 1826 he went to Europe, and studied at Göttingen, Halle, and Berlin, making the acquaintance, and winning the praises, of Gesenius, Tholuck, and Rödiger in Halle, and Neander and Ritter in Berlin. On Aug. 7, 1828, he married Therese Albertine Luise, youngest daughter of L. A. von Jacob, professor of philosophy and political science at the university of Halle, a highly gifted woman of thorough culture, well known before her marriage by her pseudonyme of "Talvj" (see list of her works in Allibone, ii. p. 1836). In 1830 he returned home; and from 1830 to 1833 he was professor-extraordinary of biblical literature, and librarian in Andover Theological Seminary. In January, 1831, he founded the Biblical Repository, subsequently (1851) united with the Bibliotheca Sacra, to which he contributed numerous translations and original articles. In 1831 he was made D.D. by Dartmouth College. In 1832 he issued an improved edition of Taylor's translation of Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible, and in 1833 a smaller Dictionary of the Holy Bible (which has been widely circulated) and a translation of Buttmann's Greek Grammar (extensively used as a text-book). In 1833 ill health, induced by his severe labors, compelled him to resign his professorship, and he removed to Boston. Continuing his studies, however, in 1834 he brought out a revised edition of Newcome's Greek Harmony of the Gospels (far superior to the earlier editions); in 1836, a translation of Gesenius' Hebrew Lexicon (5th edition, the last in which Robinson made any changes, 1854) and the independent Greek and English Lexicon of the New Testament (revised ed., 1850). In 1837 he was called to be professor of biblical literature in the (Presbyterian) Union Theological Seminary, New-York City. He accepted, on condition that he be permitted first to spend some years (at his own expense) in studying the geography of the Holy Land on the spot. Permission being given, he sailed July 17, 1837, and in conjunction with Rev. Dr. Eli Smith, an accomplished Arabic scholar, and faithful missionary of the American Board in Syria, thoroughly explored all the important places in Palestine and Syria. In October, 1838, he returned to Berlin; and there for two years he worked upon his Biblical Researches in Palestine, Mount Sinai, and Arabia Petraea. This truly great work, which at once established the author's reputation as a geographer and biblical student of the first rank, appeared simultaneously in London, Boston, and in a German translation carefully revised by Mrs. Robinson, and carried through the press in Halle by Professor Rodiger, 1841, 3 vols. In recognition of his eminent services, he received in 1842 the Patron's Gold Medal from the Royal Geographical Society of London, and the degree of D.D. from the university of Halle, while in 1844 Yale College gave him that of LL.D. In 1852 he visited Palestine again, and published the results of this second visit in 1856, in the second edition of his Biblical Researches, and in a supplemental volume, — Later Biblical Researches in Palestine and the Adjacent Regions: the third edition of the whole work appeared in 1867, 3 vols. Dr. Robinson regarded the work as a mere preparation for a complete physical, historical, and topographical geography of the Holy Land. But repeated attacks of illness undermined his constitution, and an incurable disease of the eyes obliged him in 1862 to lay down his pen. After his death in 1865, the first part, the Physical Geography of the Holy Land, which was all he had prepared, was published in English (London and Boston) and in a German translation by his wife (Berlin).

Meanwhile he had occupied himself with preparing an independent Greek Harmony of the Gospels (1845), which was far superior to any thing of the kind, and in 1846 an English Harmony. He also revised his other works for new editions, wrote numerous articles and essays, and lectured regularly in the seminary.

In May, 1862, he made his fifth and last visit to Europe, saw many old friends, but failed to receive any permanent benefit to his eyesight. In November he returned, and resumed his lectures; but at the Christmas holidays he was forced to cease, and after a brief illness died, Jan. 27, 1863.

Dr. Robinson was a man of athletic form and imposing figure, though somewhat bent in later years; of strong, sound good sense; reserved, though when in congenial company often very entertaining and humorous. He was thorough and indefatigable in his investigations, very sceptical of all monastic legends, very reverent to God's revelation. Outwardly cold, his heart was warm, and his sympathies tender. He is the most distinguished biblical theologian whom America has produced, — indeed, one of the most distinguished of the century. Of all his valuable works his Biblical Researches did most to perpetuate his memory. "The first real impulse, because the first successful impulse, towards the scientific examination of the Holy Land is due to the American traveller, Dr. Robinson." Ritter praised his "union of the acutest observation of topographic and local conditions with much preparatory study, particularly the erudite study of the Bible, and of philological and historical criticism" (Die Erdkunde von Asien, viii., div. ii. 73). Dean Stanley said, "Dr. Robinson was the first person who ever saw Palestine with his eyes open to what he ought to see" (Addresses in the United States, p. 26). The original manuscript of Dr. Robinson's Biblical Researches and a part of his library are in possession of the Union Theological Seminary.

Smith, in Life, Writings, and Character of Edward Robinson, D.D., LL.D., New York, 1863; Dean STANLEY: Addresses in the United States, 1879, pp. 23-34; and the author's arts. in Herzog,<sup>2</sup> xiii. 13-16, and in McCLINTOCK and STRONG, ix. 50-53.

PHILIP SCHAFF.

ROBINSON, John, M.A. It is not certain where the subject of this sketch was born, probably in or near Gainsborough; but whether in Lincolnshire or Nottinghamshire we have no means of deciding: this we learn, however, that the event happened in 1575 or 1576. At the age of seventeen (in 1592) he was admitted to Corpus Christi (Benet's) College, Cambridge, which was then much inclined to Puritanism, where he remained for seven years. Having taken his degrees, he was elected a fellow of his college in 1598-99, and went to Norwich, or some place in its neighborhood, about 1600, where, according to Ainsworth, "the cure and charge of sowles was committed to him," and where he labored as a preacher about four years. Whilst here, those doubts which eventually ripened into convictions agitated his mind, and his Puritan practices led to his suspension from the ministry by the bishop of the diocese; after which, being denied the right of preaching in some leased building, and having failed to secure the mastership of the hospital at Norwich (probably that which Harrison had held some years before), — for which failure Bishop Hall afterwards taunted him, — he left Norwich in 1604, resolved on separation. The resolution was a painful one; and with reference to it he said, "Had not the truth been in my heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones" (Jer. xx. 9), I had never broken those bonds of flesh and blood wherein I was so straitly tied, but had suffered the light of God to have been put out in mine own unthankful heart by other men's darkness." He doubtless knew of the existence of a company of Separatists, under John Smyth at Gainsborough, to whom he went, taking Cambridge on his way, where he consulted with Paul Baynes, Lawrence Chadderton, and others, as to the course he contemplated; and now he resigned his fellowship. When he arrived at Gainsborough, he was welcomed into the company of many who afterwards chose him for their pastor, and who now are known as the "Pilgrim Fathers." This Gainsborough society, for politic reasons, divided, and became two distinct churches. Urged by the persecutions they endured, the original body, under Smyth, emigrated to Amsterdam in 1606: the remainder consolidated at Scrooby, and ordinarily met at Mr. Brewster's house; but, in consequence of continued persecution, these also resolved to emigrate, and went over to Holland in 1607 and 1608. They first went to Amsterdam, but only temporarily; and then (in February, 1609) Robinson and about a hundred of his friends applied to the burgomasters of Leyden, requesting permission to reside in their town. This permission was granted, and here the exiles remained for eleven years before the first Pilgrims left. In 1611 they purchased a building in the Clock-steeg, which they enlarged, and adapted it to their purposes, and made it their headquarters; and here Robinson resided. In 1615 he became a member of the university of Leyden, where he honorably disputed with Episcopius on the points of Arminianism, and where he was greatly respected. The church increased under his ministry, but they still were strangers in a foreign land. They felt this, and longed for a dwelling-place where they might feel themselves at home: and, as their native land refused them a peaceful habitation, they turned their thoughts to America; there they thought they might find a home, and spread the gospel, and thither they resolved to go. Brewster was appointed to lead the first company: and Robinson remained with the rest, intending to follow with them when the way should be prepared; but this service he did not live to render. In 1620, after an affecting parting, the first Pilgrims started. Robinson died in Leyden in 1625, and was buried, March 4, in St. Peter's Church. He married Bridget White, by whom he had several children. When he left England, he was a strict Separatist; but his opinions subsequently were modified. He held it needful to separate from churches whose constitution appeared to him to come short of the New-Testament ideal; but he did not refuse communion with them, and could welcome their godly members to the fellowship of his own church. His life and works were published in England in three volumes by the Rev. R. ASHTON, London, 1851. Further information respecting him and his church was given in Rev. JOSEPH HUNTER's Pilgrim Fathers . . . The Founders of Plymouth, New England, 8vo, London, 1854. The latest and most complete account of him and his opinions is contained in Dr. DEXTER's The Congregationalism of the Last Three Hundred Years, New York, 1880.

JOHN BROWNE.

ROBINSON, Robert, an able and erratic preacher of various opinions, but mostly connected with the Baptists; was b. at Swaffham in Norfolk, Jan. 8, 1735; and d. while on a visit to Dr. Priestley, at Birmingham, June 8, 1790. From 1761 he was pastor of a society at Cambridge. He translated Saurin's Sermons (1775-84, 5 vols.), and published some of his own, besides a History of Baptism, which appeared posthumously 1790, and other works. He wrote two very popular hymns, "Come, thou Fount" (1758), and "Mighty God, while angels bless thee" (1771). F. M. BIRD.

ROBINSON, Stuart, D.D., Presbyterian; b. at Strabane, near Londonderry, Ireland, Nov. 26, 1816; d. at Louisville, Ky., Oct. 5, 1881. He was graduated at Amherst College, Massachusetts, 1836, and studied theology at Union Theological Seminary, Prince Edward, Va.; taught school for two years; was pastor at Kanawha Salines, W. Va., 1841-47; at Frankfort, Ky., till 1852; at Baltimore, Md., till 1856; was professor of ecclesiology in the Presbyterian theological seminary at Danville, Ky., until 1858; and from then until his death was pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church at Louisville, Ky. He was one of the most prominent clergymen of the South. He espoused the Southern side during the civil war. Among his published works are, The Church of God an Essential Element of the Gospel (Philadelphia, 1858), and Discourses of Redemption (New York, 1866, Edinburgh, 1869).

ROCH, St., b. at Montpellier in 1295; d. there in 1327. During an epidemic he went from town to town in Northern Italy, nursing the sick, and curing them in a miraculous way. After his return, however, he was imprisoned in his native place, and he died in the dungeon. But in course of time such a number of fabulous tales gathered around his name, that innumerable churches, chapels, and hospitals were dedicated to him. See Act. Sanct., Aug. 16. ZÖCKLER.

ROCHESTER, a city of Kent, Eng., on the right bank of the Medway, twenty-eight miles south-east of London, with population, 1871, 18,352. In 604 there was a priory there and a bishopric. Its cathedral was founded by Gundulf, 1077; consecrated, 1130. Its restoration was begun in 1871. It is principally Norman and Early English in style.

ROCK, Daniel, D.D., Roman Catholic; b. at Liverpool, 1799; d. at Kensington (London), Nov. 28, 1871. He was educated in the English College, Rome; was domestic chaplain to the Earl of Shrewsbury, 1827-40, then pastor at Buckland, near Farringdon, and on the re-introduction of the Roman-Catholic hierarchy in 1852 canon of Southwark. He was an eminent antiquarian, and wrote Hierurgia, or the Sacrifice of the Mass expounded (London, 1833, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1851, 1 vol.), Did the Early Church in England acknowledge the Pope's Supremacy? (1844,) The Church of our Fathers, as seen in St. Osmond's Rite for the Cathedral of Salisbury (vol. i., ii., 1849, vol. iii., pts. 1, 2, 1853-54).

RODGERS, John, D.D., Presbyterian; b. in Boston, Aug. 5, 1727; d. in New York, May 7, 1811. He was licensed by the presbytery of Newcastle, October, 1747; on March 16, 1749, was settled in Philadelphia as pastor of St. George's. In 1765 he resigned, and came to New York, where he was pastor until his death, except during the Revolutionary War. In 1789 he was elected moderator of the first General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, held at Philadelphia. He was a staunch patriot during the Revolution, and was several times consulted by Washington. He was a prominent character in church and city life. See SAMUEL MILLER's Memoir of John Rodgers, New York, 1809, new ed., Presbyterian Board, Philadelphia; SPRAGUE: Annals, iii. 154.

RÖDIGER, Emil, b. at Sangerhausen, Thuringia, Oct. 13, 1801; d. in Berlin, June 15, 1874.

He studied at Halle, where he became docent, 1826; extraordinary, 1830, and in 1835 ordinary professor of Oriental languages. In 1860 he went to Berlin in the same capacity. He was one of the first editors of the Zeitschrift der Deutschen morgenländischen Gesellschaft. His principal work is his continuation of Gesenius' Novus Thesaurus philologicus criticus lingue hebræe et chaldæe Veteris Testamenti Editio ii., of which he edited the third volume, 3-7 (1842), and appended indexes, additions, and corrections (1858). He also edited Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar (11th to 21st ed.). His independent works embrace De origine et indole arabice librorum V. T. historicorum interpretationis libri duo, Halle, 1829; Chrestom. Syr. c. Gloss., 1838.

ROGATIONS were religious processions, in which prayer was made for some special blessing. Soon after the age of persecution was over, the church manifested a tendency for public and festal processions (Sozomen, viii. 8). The ideas of prayer and penance were associated at an early date with them, and Rufinus (Hist. Eccl., ii. 33) speaks of such a procession passing through the streets, in which the Emperor Theodosius took part, dressed in a penitential garment. These processions, and the prayers themselves, were also called "Litanyes." For further information, see LITANY.

ROGERS, Ebenezer Platt, D.D., Reformed (Dutch); b. in New-York City, Dec. 18, 1817; d. at Montclair, N.J., Oct. 22, 1881. After a partial course at Yale College and Princeton Seminary, he was licensed in 1840, and settled pastor of the Congregational Church of Chicopee Falls, Mass., 1840-43; of the Edwards Congregational Church of Northampton, Mass., 1843-46; of the Presbyterian Church of Augusta, Ga., 1847-53; of the Seventh Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, Penn., 1854-56; of the North Reformed Dutch Church of Albany, N.Y., 1856-62; and of the South Reformed Dutch Church of New-York City, 1862-February, 1881. He was beloved as pastor and friend; a genial man, useful and honored in his different spheres of labor. Of his published writings may be mentioned The Precious Things of Peter, Sermons upon the use of "precious" in Peter's Epistles, N.Y., 1862. See the privately printed In Memoriam, N.Y., 1882.

ROGERS, Henry, English essayist; b. Oct. 18, 1806; d. at Pennal Tower, Machynlleth, North Wales, Aug. 20, 1877. After serving for some time as an Independent minister, he became professor of English language and literature in University College, London, 1839, then professor of philosophy in Spring Hill, Independent College, near Birmingham, until in 1858 he succeeded Dr. Vaughan as principal of the Lancashire Independent College, Manchester, and so remained until a few years of his death. From 1839 to 1859 he was connected with the Edinburgh Review, in whose columns he published much of his best work. He particularly distinguished himself by his opposition to the aims and ultimate results of the Tractarian movement. His reputation mainly rests upon his Eclipse of Faith, or a Visit to a Religious Sceptic, London, 1852, 9th ed., 1858, and Defence, 1854, 3d ed., 1860 (in reply to Professor F. W. Newman). His other writings embrace Essay on the Life and Genius of Jonathan Edwards (prefaced to Edwards's Works, 1834); Life of John Howe, 1836, several editions; Essays from the Edinburgh Review, 1850-55, 3 vols., new ed., 1874-78; Essay on the Life and Genius of Thomas Fuller, 1856, 2 parts; Selections from the Correspondence of R. E. H. Grevson [anagram of Henry Rogers], 1857, 2 vols.; The Superhuman Origin of the Bible inferred from itself (Congregational Lectures), 1873, 5th ed., 1877.

ROGERS, John, English clerical martyr; b. at Birmingham about 1500; burned at Smithfield, Feb. 4, 1555. He was graduated B.A. at Cambridge, 1525; received an invitation to Christ Church, Oxford; about 1534 became chaplain to the Merchant Adventurers at Antwerp, and there made the acquaintance of Tyndale and Coverdale, and became a Protestant. In 1537 he issued (probably at Wittenberg), under the pseudonyme of "Thomas Matthewe," a skilful combination and revision of the Bible translation of Tyndale and Coverdale, which has since been known as Matthew's Bible. (See ENGLISH BIBLE VERSIONS.) He married at Antwerp; removed to Wittenberg, where he was pastor until the accession of Edward VI. (1547), when he returned to England. He was in 1550 provided by Bishop Ridley with settlements in London, and in 1551 made prebendary of St. Paul's. On the succession of Queen Mary (1553) he was arrested for his vigorous denunciation of Romanism, and after months of imprisonment was burnt,—the first Marian martyr. On Oct. 20, 1883, his bust was unveiled at Birmingham, Eng., by the mayor. See CHESTER; Life of Rogers, London, 1861.

RÖHR, Johann Friedrich, b. at Rossbach, July 30, 1777; d. at Weimar, June 15, 1848. He studied theology at Leipzig, and was appointed preacher at the university church there in 1802, pastor of Ostrau in 1804, and court-preacher at Weimar in 1820. He is one of the most prominent representatives of the so-called rationalismus vulgaris, and gave a full exposition of his views in his Briefe über den Rationalismus, Aix-la-Chapelle, 1813. Afterwards he maintained a continuous opposition, both against orthodoxy and against the speculative ideas, in his periodicals, Predigerliteratur (1810-14), Neue und Neueste Predigerliteratur (1815-19), and Kritische Prediger-Bibliothek (1820-48). But his controversy with Hase (Antihisiana), and his attack on Schleiermacher immediately after the death of the latter, made it apparent that he was unable to understand the higher forms of religious life. Among his other works are Palästina (1816, 8th ed., 1845), Luthers Leben und Wirken (1818, 2d ed., 1828), Die gute Sache des Protestantismus (1842), and a great number of sermons. G. FRANK.

ROKYCANA, John, a Bohemian priest, who was the central figure in the ecclesiastical history of Bohemia, 1430-70. He first became prominent in 1427 by denouncing, in a sermon, the policy of Sigismund Korybut, who was attempting to bring about a reconciliation between Bohemia and the Pope. Rokycana's denunciations led to the expulsion of Korybut, and the downfall of the moderate party for a time. Bohemia again resisted the arms of Europe with success; but the success was bought by exhaustion, which led it to listen to the overtures of the Council of Basel. In the conferences held at Basel, Rokycana was the chief controversialist on the Hussite side, and showed a conciliatory spirit. In the negotiations which followed, and which ended in the acceptance of the Compacts by the Bohemians, Rokycana took a chief part. His policy was that Bohemia should accept re-union with Rome on the basis of the Compacts, but, by a national organization of its church, should secure its religious liberties. Before the Compacts were signed (1435), the Bohemians secretly elected Rokycana archbishop of Prag, with two suffragans. After the signing of the Compacts, Sigismund was received as king of Bohemia; but he did not recognize Rokycana as archbishop without the consent of the Council of Basel. The Catholic re-action in Bohemia was so strong, that in 1437 Rokycana was driven to flee from Prag, but resumed his office of archbishop when the influence of George Podiebrad became supreme, in 1444. From that time till his death he was closely associated with the policy of Podiebrad. He died in 1471, — two months before his master, King George, — at the age of seventy-four. The character and motives of Rokycana were much disputed during his lifetime, and have been so since. Like all men who try a policy of moderation, he encountered the hostility of the extreme parties. His plan of organizing a national church in Bohemia led to his own elevation to the office of archbishop, and the question of his confirmation in his office was the question that stood foremost in the disputes with the Pope. Really Rokycana summed up in his own personal position the aspirations of the more sagacious of the Bohemian statesmen. It is easy to accuse such a man of vanity, obstinacy, and self-seeking. His policy was proved by events to be impossible, and his position was scarcely tenable. He was driven to alternate between cowardice and rashness. He and King George failed, but their success would have been momentous for the future of Europe. They played a difficult game, but they played it against overwhelming odds with prudence and moderation.

ROMAINE, William, a noted English divine of the evangelical class; b. at Hartlepool, Durham, Sept. 25, 1711; d. rector of St. Ann's, Blackfriars, London, July 26, 1795. He was ordained in 1736, and as early as 1739 was bold enough to attack Warburton's Divine Legation in a sermon preached before the university of Oxford, where he had received his education. He was scarcely a match for so redoubtable an antagonist, though he was not wanting in scholarship. A Hutchinsonian in science and learning, he was, nevertheless, chosen professor of astronomy in Gresham College; but an Oxford sermon on The Lord our Righteousness, of an extremely Calvinistic type, excluded him forever afterwards from the university pulpit. However, popularity with the London citizens made up for his ejection in the midland seat of learning; and for many years he gathered crowded congregations at St. Andrew's Wardrobe, as well as St. Ann's, Blackfriars. He stood forth as the main pillar of Evangelization, which, in the last half of the eighteenth century, was reviving in the Church of England after the re-action against Puritanism consequent upon the Restoration a hundred years before. His place, therefore, in the history of theological literature in England, is important. He wrote a number of books of minor interests and repute; but three books proceeding from his pen became exceedingly popular in his lifetime, and continued to be read long afterwards; i.e., The Life of Faith (1763), The Walk of Faith (1771), and The Triumph of Faith (1794). They have been repeatedly published in one volume, and are highly commended for their spiritual tone by such men as Edward Bickersteth, Dr. Williams, and Dr. Chalmers. The Hon. and Rev. W. B. Cadogan wrote a life of this excellent man, which was prefixed to an edition of his works, in eight volumes, published in 1796. JOHN STOUGHTON.

ROMAN-CATHOLIC CHURCH. It is the largest of the three grand divisions of Christendom (Greek, Latin, and Protestant), and in its own estimation the only church founded by Christ on earth. Bellarmin, one of her standard divines, defines the church as consisting of all who, (1) profess the true faith, (2) partake of the true sacraments, and (3) are subject to the rule of the Pope of Rome as the head of the church. The first mark excludes all heretics, as well as Jews, Gentiles, and Mohammedans; the second excludes the catechumens and the excommunicated; the third, the schismatics (i.e., the Greeks, or Oriental Christians, who hold substantially the true faith and the seven sacraments, but refuse obedience to the Pope). The Protestants, without distinction, are excluded as being both heretical and schismatical. But all who hold those three points belong to the church militant on earth, without regard to their moral character (etiamsi reprobi, scelesti et impii sint), though only the good members will be saved. Thus defined, the church, says Bellarmin, is as visible and palpable as the (quondam) republic of Venice or the (quondam) kingdom of France. He denies the distinction between the visible and invisible church altogether.<sup>1</sup> The full name of the Roman communion is the "Holy, Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman Church." She numbers over two hundred millions of souls, or about one-half of the entire Christian population of the globe.<sup>2</sup> She is found in all continents and among all nations, but is strongest in southern countries, and among the Latin and Celtic races in Italy, Spain, France, Austria, Ireland, and South America. She agrees in all essential doctrines and usages with the Greek Church (except the Papacy), but has more vitality and energy; while she is far behind the Protestant communions in general culture, intelligence, and freedom. The Roman Church has a rich and most remarkable history, and still exercises a greater power over the masses of the people than any other

Roman Catholics . . .	215,938,500
Protestants . . .	130,329,000
Greeks . . .	84,007,000 body of Christians. She stretches in unbroken succession back to the palmy days of heathen Rome, has outlived all the governments of Europe, and is likely to live when Macaulay's New-Zealander, "in the midst of a vast solitude, shall take his stand on a broken arch of London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's."

I. DOCTRINE. — The Roman-Catholic system of doctrine is contained in the œcumenical creeds (the Apostles', the Nicene with the Filioque, and the Athanasian), in the dogmatic decisions of the œcumenical councils (twenty in number, from 325 to 1870), the bulls of the popes, and especially in the Tridentine and Vatican standards. The principal authorities are the canons and decrees of the Council of Trent (1563), the Profession of the Tridentine Faith, commonly called the "Creed of Pius IV." (1564), the Roman Catechism (1566), the decree of the immaculate conception (1854), and the Vatican decrees on the Catholic faith and the infallibility of the Pope (1870). The best summary of the leading articles of the Roman faith is contained in the Creed of Pope Pius IV., which is binding upon all priests and public teachers, and which must be confessed by all converts. It consists of the Nicene Creed and eleven articles. To these must now be added the two additional Vatican dogmas of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary and the infallibility of the Pope. The Roman-Catholic system of doctrine was prepared as to matter by the Fathers (especially Irenæus, Cyprian, Augustine, Jerome, Leo I., Gregory I.), logically analyzed and defined and defended by the mediæval schoolmen (Anselm, Thomas Aquinas, Duns Scotus), vindicated, in opposition to Protestantism, by Bellarmine, Bossuet, and Mohler, and completed in the Vatican dogma of papal infallibility, which excludes all possibility of doctrinal reformation. A question once settled by infallible authority is settled forever, and cannot be reopened. But the same authority may add new dogmas, such as the assumption of the Virgin Mary, which heretofore has been only a "pious opinion" of a large number of Catholics, as the immaculate conception was before 1854. See TRIDENTINE PROFESSION OF FAITH.

II. GOVERNMENT AND DISCIPLINE. — The Roman Church has reared up the grandest governmental fabric known in history. It is an absolute spiritual monarchy, culminating in the Pope, who claims to be the successor of Peter, and the vicar of Christ on earth, and hence the supreme and infallible head of the church. The people are excluded from all participation even in temporal matters: they must obey the priest; the priests must obey the bishop; and the bishops, the Pope, to whom they are bound by the most solemn oath. This system is the growth of ages, and has only reached its maturity in the Vatican Council (1870). The claim of the Bishop of Rome to universal dominion over the Christian Church, and even over the temporal kingdoms professing the Catholic faith, goes back to the days of Leo I. (440-461), and was renewed from time to time by Nicholas I., Gregory VII., Innocent III., and Boniface VIII. But this claim was always resisted by the Greek Church, which claimed equal rights for the Eastern patriarchs, and by the German emperors and other princes, who were jealous of their sovereignty. The conflict between the Pope and the Emperor, between priestcraft and statecraft, runs through the whole middle age, and has been recently revived under a new aspect by the Papal Syllabus of 1864, which re-asserted the most extravagant claims of the mediæval Papacy, and provoked the so-called Culturkampf in Germany and France. But the stream of history cannot be turned backward.

The Pope is aided in the exercise of his functions by a college of cardinals (mostly Italians), whose number varies. At present it includes six cardinal-bishops, forty-five cardinal-priests, and fourteen cardinal-deacons. Archbishop McCloskey of New York is the first American cardinal, elected in 1875. The Pope was at first chosen by the Roman clergy and people; but since the time of Gregory VII. he is elected by the cardinals, who meet in conclave on the eleventh day of the vacancy, and elect either by quasi-inspiration unanimously, or by compromise, or by scrutinium, two-thirds of the votes being required. The Pope with the cardinals together form the consistory. The various departments of administration are assigned to Congregations, under the presidency of a cardinal; as the Congregation of the Index librorum prohib., the Congregation of Sacred Rites, the Congregation of Indulgences, the Congregation de propaganda fide, etc. The Pope has a nuncio in all the principal Catholic countries. The whole Roman hierarchy consists of over 700 bishops, 169 Latin and 27 Oriental archbishops, 7 Latin and 5 Oriental patriarchs. The greatest public display of the Roman hierarchy was made in the Lateran Council of 1214 under Innocent III., and in the Vatican Council of 1870 under Pius IX. On the papal government, see the works quoted sub PAPACY on p. 1737.

III. WORSHIP AND CEREMONIES. — They are embodied in the Roman Missal, the Roman Breviary, and other liturgical books for public and private devotion. The Roman Church accompanies its members from the cradle to the grave, receiving them into life by baptism, dismissing them into the other world by extreme unction, and consecrating all their important acts by the sacramental mysteries and blessings. The worship is a most elaborate system of ritualism, which addresses itself chiefly to the eye and the ear, and draws all the fine arts into its service. Gothic cathedrals, altars, crucifixes, Madonnas, pictures, statues, and relics of saints, rich decorations, solemn processions, operatic music, combine to lend it great attractions for the common people and for cultured persons of prevailing æsthetic tastes, especially among the Latin races. But while the external splendor dazzles the senses, and pleases the imagination, the mind and heart, which crave more substantial spiritual food, are often left to starve. Converts from Rome usually swing to the opposite extreme of utmost simplicity. Every day of the calendar is devoted to the memory of one or more saints. The greatest festivals are Christmas, Easter, Pentecost, the feast of the Immaculate Conception, the Annunciation (March 25), Purification (Feb. 2), Assumption of the Virgin Mary. But the weekly sabbath is not near as well observed in Roman-Catholic countries as in Great Britain and the United States. Catholic worship is the same all over the world, even in language; the Latin being its sacred organ, and the vernacular being only used for sermons, which are subordinate. Its throne is the altar, not the pulpit (which usually stands away off in a corner). It centres in the mass, and this is regarded as a real though unbloody repetition or continuation of the atoning sacrifice of Christ on the cross. At the moment when the officiating priest pronounces the words, "This is my body," the elements of bread and wine are believed to be changed into the very substance of the body and blood of our Saviour; and these are offered to God the Father for the sins of the living and the dead in purgatory. The Reformers saw in the mass a relapse into Judaism, a refined form of idolatry, and a virtual denial of the one sacrifice of Christ, who, "by one offering hath perfected forever them that are sanctified" (Heb. x. 14). But Catholics deny the charge, and reverently regard the mass as a dramatic commemoration and renewed application of the great mystery of redemption, and the daily food of the devout believer. On the Roman-Catholic worship, see the standard editions of the Missale Romanum, the Breviarium Romanum, and the Pontificale Romanum, also GEORGE LEWIS: The Bible, the Missal, and the Breviary, or Ritualism Self-illustrated in the Liturgical Books of Rome (Edinburgh, 1853, 2 vols.); and JOHN, MARQUESS OF BUTE: The Roman Breviary translated out of Latin into English (Edinburgh, 1879, 2 vols.).

IV. HISTORY.—The earliest record of a Christian Church in Rome we have in Paul's Epistle to the Romans (A.D. 58). Though not founded by Peter or Paul, who came to Rome after the year 60, it may possibly be traced to those "strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes," who witnessed the Pentecostal miracle on the birthday of the Christian Church (Acts ii. 10). At all events, it is the oldest church in the West, and acquired great distinction by the martyrdom of St. Peter and Paul. The Vatican Hill, where the chief of the apostles was crucified, became the Calvary, and Rome the Jerusalem, of Latin Christendom. The Roman martyrdom of Paul is universally conceded. The sojourn of Peter in Rome has been doubted by eminent Protestant scholars, and it can certainly not be proven from the New Testament (unless "Babylon" in 1 Pet. v. 13 be understood figuratively of Rome); but it is so generally attested by the early Fathers, Greek as well as Latin, that it must be admitted as a historical fact, though he probably did not reach Rome before A.D. 63, as there is no mention made of him in the Epistle to the Romans, nor in Paul's Epistles of the Roman captivity, written between 61 and 63. The metropolitan position of the city, whose very name means "power," and which for so many centuries had been the mistress of the world, together with the widespread belief that Christ (Matt. xvi. 18) had instituted a perpetual primacy of the Church in the person of Peter and his successors in office, supposed to be the bishops of Rome, are the chief causes of the rapid growth of that congregation to the highest influence. It inherited the ambition and prestige of empire, and simply substituted the cross for the sword as the symbol of power. For fifteen centuries the fortunes of Western Christendom were bound up with the Roman Church; and even now, in her old age, she is full of activity everywhere, but especially in Protestant countries, where she is stimulated by opposition, and invigorated by fresh blood. We may distinguish three stages in the development of Roman Catholicism.

(1) The age of ancient Græco-Latin Catholicism, from the second to the eighth century, before the final rupture of the Greek and Latin communions. This is the common inheritance of all churches. It is the age of the Fathers, of œcumenical creeds and councils, and of Christian emperors. Many of the leading features of Roman Catholicism, as distinct from Protestantism, are already found in the second and third centuries, and have their roots in the Judaizing tendencies combated by St. Paul. The spirit of traditionalism, sacerdotalism, prelacy, ceremonialism, asceticism, monasticism, was powerfully at work in the East and the West, in the Nicene and post-Nicene ages, and produced most of those doctrines, rites, and institutions which are to this day held in common by the Greek and Roman churches. There are few dogmas and usages of Romanism which may not be traced in embryo to the Greek and Latin Fathers: hence the close resemblance of the Greek and Roman churches, notwithstanding their rivalry and antagonism. But, alongside with these Romanizing tendencies, we find also, in the school of St. Augustine, the evangelical doctrines of sin and grace, which were, next to the Bible, the chief propelling force of the Reformation.

(2) The age of Medieval Latin Catholicism, as distinct and separated from the Greek, extends from Gregory I., or from Charlemagne, to the Reformation of the sixteenth century. It is the missionary age of Catholicism among the Latin and Teutonic races in Europe. Here we have the conversion of the barbarians in the north and west of Europe, under the fostering care of the bishops of Rome; here the growth of the Papal hierarchy, though in constant conflict with the secular power, especially the German Empire; here the scholastic theology, but, in opposition to it, also the various forms of mysticism, and a more liberal biblical theology; here an imposing theocracy, binding all the nations of Europe together, yet with strong elements of opposition in its own communion, urging forward toward a reformation in head and members. The middle ages cradled the Protestant Reformation as well as the Papal counter-Reformation. Wiclif in England, Hus in Bohemia, Wessel in Germany, Savonarola in Italy, the Waldenses, the Bohemian Brethren, the Councils of Pisa, Constance, and Basle, and the revival of letters, prepared the way for the great movement of the sixteenth century, which emancipated Christendom from the spiritual bondage of Rome.

(3) The age of modern Romanism, dating from the Reformation, or, rather, from the Council of Trent (1563). This is Roman Catholicism, in opposition, not only to the Greek Church, but also to evangelical Protestantism. In some respects it was an advance upon the middle ages, and experienced great benefit from the Reformation. No Alexander VI., who was a monster of wickedness, nor Julius II., who preferred the sword to the staff, nor Leo X., who had more faith in classical literature and art than in the fabula de Christo, could now be elected to the chair of St. Peter. No such scandal as the Papal schism, with two or three rival popes cursing and excommunicating each other, has disgraced the church since the sixteenth century. On the other hand, the Papacy has given formal sanction to those scholastic theories and ecclesiastical traditions against which the Reformers protested. It expressly condemned their doctrines; and, by claiming to be infallible, it made itself doctrinally irreformable.

In modern Romanism we must again distinguish two periods, which are divided by the reign of Pope Pius IX.

(a) Tridentine Romanism is directed against the principles of the Protestant Reformation, and fixed the dogmas of the rule of faith (scripture and tradition), original sin, justification by faith and works, the seven sacraments, the sacrifice of the mass, purgatory, invocation of saints, the veneration of relics, and indulgences. The "Old Catholics," who seceded in 1870, and were excommunicated, took their stand first on the Council of Trent, in opposition to the Council of the Vatican, and charged the latter with apostasy and corruption; although in fact, and as viewed from the Protestant stand-point, the one is only a legitimate, logical development of the other.

(b) Vatican Romanism is directed against modern infidelity (rationalism), and against liberal Catholicism (Gallicanism) within the Roman Church itself. It created, or rather brought to full maturity and exclusive authority, two new dogmas and two corresponding heresies, — concerning the Virgin Mary, and the power and infallibility of the Roman pontiff. These questions were left unsettled by the Council of Trent, and a considerable difference of opinion continued to prevail in the Roman communion. Gallicanism flourished in France during the golden age of its literature, and was formulated by Bossuet in the famous articles of Gallican liberties; but, since the restoration of the order of Jesuits, the Ultramontane school, which defends papal absolutism, gradually gained the ascendancy, and accomplished a complete triumph, — first in 1854, when Pius IX. proclaimed the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary to be a divinely revealed dogma of faith; and in the Vatican Council in 1870, which declared the Pope to be the infallible bishop of bishops. The same Pope, in 1864, issued the "Syllabus of Errors," which must be considered by Romanists as an infallible official document, and which arrays the Papacy in open war against modern civilization and civil and religious freedom.

The reign of Pius IX. was very eventful in the history of the Papacy: it marked the height of its pretensions and the logical completion of its doctrinal system, but also the loss of its temporal power. On the very day after the passage of the Papal infallibility dogma (July 18, 1870), Napoleon III., the chief political and military supporter of the Pope, declared war against Protestant Prussia (July 19), withdrew his troops from Rome, and occasioned the utter defeat of Imperial France, the rise of the new German Empire with a Protestant head, and the downfall of the temporal power of the Papacy. Victor Emmanuel, supported by the vote of the people, marched into Rome, made it the capital of free and united Italy, and confined the Pope to the Vatican and to a purely ecclesiastical jurisdiction (Sept. 20, 1870). History has never seen a more sudden and remarkable revulsion.

Pope Pius IX. involved himself in difficulties with Italy, Spain, Germany, France, and Russia, and excited the sympathies of the masses, first as an exile, and then as a prisoner in the Vatican. Yet his reign was longer than that of any Pope, and exceeded the traditional twenty-five years of Peter. The policy of his successor, Leo XIII., is wiser and more conciliatory.

The history of the Roman Church during the present century shows the remarkable fact, that she has lost on her own ground, especially in Italy and Spain, but gained large accessions on foreign soil, especially in England, by the secession of Cardinal Newman, Cardinal Manning, and several hundred Anglican clergymen and noblemen, since 1843, who sought rest in absolute submission to an infallible authority. On the other hand, this gain has been more than neutralized by the Old-Catholic secession in Germany and Switzerland, under the lead of Drs. Dollinger, Reinkens, and von Schulte, and other eminent Catholic scholars, whose learning and conscience did not permit them to submit to the Vatican decrees of 1870.

LIT. — The standard writers in explanation and defence of the doctrinal system of Romanism are BELLARMIN (Disputationes de Controversiis Christiane fidei advers. huius temporis hæreticos, 1590, 3 vols. folio, and often since), BOSSUET (Exposition de la doctrine de l'église catholique, 1671), MÜLLER (Symbolik, 8th ed., 1872), PERRONE (Prælectiones theologice, 36th ed., 1881), KLEE, DIERINGER, FRIEDHOF, WISEMAN. The chief historical works by Roman Catholics are the Annals of BARONIUS, the Church Histories of ROHRBACHER, MÜHLER (edited by Gams), ALZOG, KRAUS, HEFLE (Conciliengeschichte, down to the Council of Constance, a very valuable work), DÖLLINGER (before his secession in 1870), Cardinal HERGENRÖTHER (Kirchengeschichte, in 3 vols., 2d ed., 1880). Of Spanish works, the able defence of Romanism by BALMES is made known to English readers by a translation, Protestantism and Catholicity compared in their Effects on Civilization, 1851. In recent times the Roman Church has found its most zealous advocates among converts such as Dr. Hurter (the historian of Innocent III.), Cardinal Newman, Cardinal Manning, Dr. Orestes Brownson (1811-76), who carried the weapons of Protestant learning and culture with them. The fullest repository of Roman-Catholic theological learning may be found in Abbé MIGNE: Nouvelle Encyclopédie Théologique, Paris, 1850 sqq., 52 vols. (a series of dictionaries on all branches of sacred literature), and in WETZER and WELTE: Kirchenlexikon oder Encykl. der kathol. Theologie, in 12 vols. (Freiburg, 1847-58), which is now coming out in a revised form, begun by Cardinal HERGENRÖTHER, and continued by Dr. KAULEN, Freiburg-im-B., 1882 sqq. ROMAN-CATHOLIC CHURCH IN THE UNITED STATES. This church is in its government divided into dioceses, under archbishops and bishops appointed by the Pope, and deriving apostolic succession from consecration by other lawfully constituted bishops. In its origin it was formed by the extension of the dioceses and authority of Seville and Rouen and the vicariates apostolic of England and London. The early Spanish colonial and mission efforts were subject to the archbishops of Seville till the creation of the suffragan sees of Santo Domingo (1513) and Tlascala (1519). When permanent settlements were formed in Florida, they, with Spanish Louisiana, were under the bishops of Santiago de Cuba till the erection of the see of Havana, in 1787. The French in Canada were subject to the archbishops of Rouen till Canada was made a vicariate apostolic, under Bishop Laval, who became, in 1674, first bishop of Quebec. The jurisdiction of this see extended over the French settlements and posts from Maine to Louisiana till 1789. The English Catholics in Maryland and other British Colonies were subject to the English vicars apostolic till Dr. Carroll was made Prefect Apostolic of the United States, 1784. When the see of Baltimore was erected (1789), its jurisdiction was extended to the whole territory of the republic, and that of Quebec in some parts ceased. Louisiana and the Floridas were placed under a separate bishop in 1793. Texas, New Mexico, and California were subject to Mexican sees. As Catholics increased in the United States by natural growth and immigration, sees were erected in 1808 at New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Bardstown. After the cession of Louisiana to the United States, sees were established at St. Louis and New Orleans; and, while Oregon was a disputed territory, a vicariate apostolic, and, soon after, an episcopal see, was founded (1846), dependent on Canada. In the territory subsequently acquired from Mexico, a bishopric existed, that of the two Californias, the bishop residing in Northern California. The other portions were soon placed under American bishops. These original dioceses have been, as the growth of the country required, subdivided, till there were in 1883 twelve archbishoprics, fifty-two bishoprics, nine vicariates apostolic, and one prefecture apostolic.

Each archbishopric, with the dioceses of the suffragan bishops, forms an ecclesiastical province. On the vacancy of a see by death, resignation, or removal, the archbishop and bishops of the province select three priests, whose names are sent to Rome; and from this list the Pope generally chooses one, who is appointed to the vacant see. His bulls are then issued, and despatched to the bishop-elect, who is consecrated and installed.

The Clergy, and Mode of Recruiting.—There were in the United States, in 1883, 6,546 priests. For the training of candidates for the priesthood, there were thirty-one seminaries under the direction of the bishops, and also several similar institutions connected with the religious orders, in which members of those bodies pursued their theological course. The most important seminaries are, St. Mary's, Baltimore, founded in 1791, and directed by the Sulpitians; Mount St. Mary's Theological Seminary, Emmitsburg, Md.; St. Joseph's Seminary, Troy, N.Y.; the Seminary of St. Francis of Sales, near Milwaukee; St. Vincent's Theological Seminary, Cape Girardeau, Mo.; and the Seminary of Our Lady of the Angels, Niagara Falls, N.Y., directed by the Lazarists. Of those connected with the regular orders, the most important are the House of Studies at Woodstock, Md., for scholastics of the Society of Jesus; the House of Studies at Ilchester, Md., for the Redemptorists; St. Vincent's Abbey, Westmoreland County, Penn., for the Benedictines; and St. Bonaventure's Seminary, Allegany, N.Y., for the Franciscans. There are also in Europe the American College at Rome, and the American College at Louvain, where candidates for the priesthood are prepared for duty in this country. The Missionary College of All Hallows, Drumcondra, Ireland, prepares young men for the priesthood to serve in other countries, and among them many are accepted by bishops in the United States. Besides these, many priests of different nationalities come with the general emigration, and are incorporated into the body of the clergy.

The Regular Orders.—Besides the secular priests, subject directly to the bishops, and constituting most of the parochial clergy, there are many religious orders. The oldest of these is the Society of Jesus, which began its labors in Maryland in 1633, and down to the Revolution supplied almost exclusively the priests who labored among the Catholics in the then British Colonies. Members of the same order from Canada established Indian missions, and attended the white settlements along the northern frontier and in the valley of the Mississippi. The Jesuit fathers at present conduct colleges at Georgetown (D.C.), Baltimore, New-York City, Fordham (N.Y.), Jersey City, Worcester (Mass.), Cincinnati, Detroit, St. Louis, Mobile, New Orleans, Las Vegas (N.M.), Omaha (Neb.), Santa Clara (Cal.), and some others, and have churches in many cities and towns. The Dominicans have had convents and churches doing parochial work in Ohio and Kentucky since the beginning of the century, and more recently in California, New York, and New Jersey; the Augustinians, in Pennsylvania, New York, and Massachusetts. Several orders have come in to labor principally among the Germans,—the Redemptorists (who have parish-churches, and also give missions to German and English speaking congregations), branches of the Franciscan order, Reformed Franciscans, Conventuals, Capuchins, engaged mainly in parochial work. The Passionists are devoted more especially to the giving of missions. The Lazarists, or Priests of the Mission, are engaged chiefly in the direction of seminaries and colleges; Priests of the Holy Cross, in directing colleges, schools, and in parochial work; the Benedictines, who have several abbeys, with colleges, schools, and churches in all parts of the country.

Churches and their Tenure.—The churches are in some cases held by the bishop or archbishop as trustee; in other States, by a board of trustees. As there is no membership in the Catholic churches, in the sense that the term is used in Protestant bodies, the application of the general laws made for the latter threw the choice of trustees into the hands of those who contributed least to the maintenance of the churches, and who seldom joined in the ordinances of the church. This led to vesting the title in the bishop as trustee, but the plan created other difficulties. In many parts the title to the church is now vested in a board consisting of the bishop, the pastor of the church, and two lay-trustees. The churches, colleges, abbeys, and houses of the religious orders, are generally held by them under acts of incorporation.

The churches have been built almost exclusively by voluntary contributions, and are, as a rule, encumbered by mortgage-debts; the congregations being unable to meet the whole cost, and none of the churches possessing funded property. Large bequests, devises, and donations to churches or church-work, are as rare among Catholics in the United States as they are common among Protestants. A system grew up in churches, of accepting deposits, and paying interest, as a means of avoiding mortgages; but, as matters were rarely managed with the judgment of business-men, the result has often been financial ruin, as at St. Peter's Church, New York, Cincinnati, and Lawrence, Mass.

Education.—Prior to the Revolution, any distinctively Catholic schools were almost impossible; an academy for boys in Maryland, which was covertly maintained for several years, being almost the only example. Schools in connection with the churches were established as soon as Catholics were free; and, until public schools began to be established by State authority, the schools maintained by the different denominations were almost the only schools accessible to the children of the poorer classes. The Catholics have since been compelled to retain and extend their parochial system, as the State schools, in their general tone, influence, and text-books, are so decidedly Protestant as to make them a powerful means in alienating the young from Catholicity. The number of Catholic parochial schools in the United States is estimated at 2,500, and the number of pupils at nearly half a million. In these, religious instruction is given, with the usual branches taught in schools; and text-books are used free from matter offensive to Catholics. These books, in their educational form and mechanical execution, have been greatly improved within the last twenty years. Parish schools are, to a great extent, taught by members of religious orders and communities which make instruction their special work. Of these the chief are the Brothers of the Christian Schools, Brothers of the Holy Cross, Brothers of Mary, Xaverian Brothers, Franciscan Brothers, for boys' schools; Ursulines, Benedictine, Presentation Nuns, Sisters of Charity, School Sisters of Notre Dame, Sisters of Notre Dame, Sisters of the Holy Cross, Sisters of St. Joseph, Sisters of St. Francis, Sisters of St. Dominic, Sisters of Mercy, Sisters of the Immaculate Heart, for girls. For higher education, there are academies under some of the orders of Brothers; and, for young ladies, under the Ladies of the Sacred Heart, Ursuline Nuns, Sisters of Notre Dame, of the Holy Child, St. Dominic, St. Joseph, etc. The number of these academies was given in 1853 as 579. The colleges and universities for young men numbered 81; that at Georgetown, D.C., being the oldest. None of these institutions are endowed, or possess founded professorships. They are, with a few exceptions, owned and directed by religious orders,—Jesuits, Benedictines, Augustinians, Franciscans, Lazarists, Priests of the Holy Cross, Brothers of the Christian Schools. There is no Catholic college in the United States with a lay faculty, and only a few with a faculty of secular priests. Sunday schools are generally maintained in the cities, and in other places where there is a resident pastor; but, as religious instruction is given in the parochial and other schools during the week, the Sunday-school system does not hold the same importance as among Protestant bodies.

The Catholic Press.—The necessity of diffusing religious intelligence among Catholics, and of meeting charges against the church, led to the establishment of Catholic newspapers. Of these the United-States Catholic Miscellany, founded by Bishop England of Charleston, was one of the first and ablest. There are in 1853 many published in various parts of the country, in English, German, French, Spanish, and Portuguese; the Freeman's Journal, published in New York, under the editorship of J. A. McMaster, being the most able and influential. There are several monthly publications of a literary and devotional character, such as the Catholic World, the Ave Maria, and one review, The American Catholic Quarterly, which fills the place long occupied by Brownson's Quarterly Review. For the diffusion of books among Catholics, attempts were twice made to establish publishing societies; but the Metropolitan Press and the Catholic Publication Society both failed to maintain themselves, and fell into private hands. The publication of Catholic books is left to individual publishers. The sale of Bibles among Catholics is very large, Protestant houses as well as Catholic being engaged in publishing them.

Charitable Institutions. — The relief of the poor and afflicted calls for the services of a number of religious communities of women, devoted to general or special work. The Sisters of Charity meet almost all wants, directing orphan and foundling asylums, homes for neglected children, reformatories for the vicious, industrial and parochial schools, general hospitals, insane-asylums, homes for the aged, and visiting the sick; the Sisters of Mercy visit the sick and prisons, and have houses for unemployed servant-girls; the Little Sisters of the Poor are devoted to the care of the aged; the Sisters of the Poor of St. Francis, to hospital-work; the Bon Secours Sisters, to the nursing of the sick at their homes. The total number of charitable institutions reported for 1883 was 460. Almost without exception, these depend on voluntary contributions; none being endowed, and bequests of the wealthy being comparatively rare. Asylums for the treatment of insanity and the care of deaf-mutes have been established by sisterhoods in several places.

Liturgy. — The Liturgy in use in the Catholic Church in the United States is the Roman, the Roman missal, breviary, pontifical and ritual, being exclusively used; and none of those which acquired local tolerance in parts of Europe have ever obtained at any time in any district of this country. The regular orders have also in most cases a Proper, containing offices of saints belonging to their rule, which the Holy See permits in the churches and houses of the order. As the emigration has brought over few if any Catholics belonging to the Oriental rites, Latin alone has been used in the Catholic churches of the United States, except where a United Greek or Syriac priest visiting the country has celebrated mass according to his own rite. The discipline of the Western Patriarchate in regard to communion under one kind, and the celibacy of the clergy, are universal.

Government. — The canon law of the church, as modified by special grants or customs in France, was established in the churches under the French rule in New York, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, and Wisconsin, and, as modified in Spain, was established in Florida and Louisiana and the former Mexican territory, with the regulations adopted by synods at Quebec and Santiago de Cuba, and by provincial councils at Santo Domingo and Mexico; but as, in all parts except New Mexico, the old population merged in the expansion of Catholics from the original territory of the republic, the early ecclesiastical law is virtually unknown at present. The United States is regarded as a missionary country, and the affairs of the Catholic Church here are conducted at Rome through the Congregation de Propaganda Fide. No parishes have been canonically instituted, as in Canada and Mexico; and consequently there are, except in a few instances, actually no parish priests properly so called. The priests are ordained sub titulo missionis, and bound to obedience to their bishop, and have, when assigned to quasi parishes, no canonical immobility. The church here tends to the establishment of canon law and the complete system under it, so far as it is possible in this country and at this time. At present, however, the position of the priest is not so clearly defined as to prevent frequent appeals to Rome, and occasional suits in the State courts. An instruction issued at Rome a few years since led to the establishment of a committee of clergymen in each diocese, who are to investigate all charges against a priest, and whose report is to some extent a necessary step in withdrawing a priest's faculties, or removing him from a pastoral charge.

The first legislation in the Catholic Church in the United States was the synod of Baltimore, held by Bishop Carroll in 1791; and its regulations, with rules adopted by the bishops in 1810, were the only specific laws till the assembling of the first Provincial Council of Baltimore, convened in 1829, under the sanction of Pope Leo XII., by Archbishop Whitfield. The decrees of this council and of others held at Baltimore in 1833, 1837, 1840, 1843, and 1849, were approved by the popes, and became law in the church east of the Mississippi, and were accepted generally west of the river. In 1846 Oregon City was made a metropolitan see with two suffragans; and in 1847 St. Louis became the head of a province embracing the dioceses of Dubuque, Nashville, St. Paul, Chicago, and Milwaukee. In 1850 New York was made an archiepiscopal see, and the bishops of Boston, Hartford, Albany, and Buffalo, were made suffragans to it; Cincinnati was also made a metropolitan see, having Louisville, Detroit, Vincennes, and Cleveland as suffragans. In 1853 San Francisco became a metropolitan, with Monterey as a suffragan see; and in 1875 Boston was made an archiepiscopal see, with the bishops of Portland, Burlington, Springfield, Providence, and Hartford as suffragans; Philadelphia, with Pittsburg, Harrisburg, Erie, Scranton, and Wilmington as suffragans; Milwaukee, with Green Bay, La Crosse, Marquette, and St. Paul as suffragans; Santa Fé was also made an archiepiscopal see in 1875; and in 1880 Chicago, with Alton and Peoria as suffragans. In most of these new provinces, councils were also held by authority of the Holy See, — in Oregon in 1848; in New York, 1854, 1861, 1883;<sup>1</sup> in Cincinnati in 1855, 1858,

<sup>1</sup> The fourth council of the Province of New York was held in New-York City, from Sept. 23 (Sunday) to Sept. 30, 1883. The opening and closing ceremonies in the cathedral were impressive. The language of the council was Latin, and in this language on the last day the decrees of the council were read (the bishops severally assenting). They were placed on the gospel side of the altar, signed by the cardinal, all the bishops (in the order of seniority), by Monsignor Preston and by Father Farley, and then sent to Rome. The decrees related to morals and discipline, especially to marriage, in protest to lax views and practices, and to godless education; but the proceedings leading to them were secret. After the decrees were signed, an address was read, the kiss of peace given, and the council dismissed with the solemn Papal benediction from the cardinal. The following "Acclamations" were sung at the conclusion of the services: —

ARCHIDIACONUS. — Sanctissimæ ac Individuæ Trinitati, sempiterna laus ac gratiarum actio!

CHORUS. — Gloria Tibi, Trinitas æqualis, una Deitas, et ante omnia sæcula, et nunc, et in perpetuum!

ARCH. — Beatæ Mariæ, Virgini Deiparæ, sine labe conceptæ, honor æternus, filiis veneratio!

ARCH. — Beatissimo Leoni, Papæ XIII., fidei doctori infalibili, multi anni, perennis felicitas!

1861, and 1882; in St. Louis in 1855, 1858; in New Orleans in 1856, 1860; in San Francisco in 1871 and 1882, in all of which, decrees were passed binding in those provinces, as those of Baltimore, continued in 1855, 1858, and 1869, were in that reduced province. To insure general action, however, throughout the United States on some important points, and to express clearly the faith and discipline of the whole church in this country, plenary councils were held at Baltimore in 1852 and 1866, in which many decrees were adopted by the archbishops and bishops of the whole country. The decrees of these councils conform in their dogmatic part with the established doctrines of the church, and in matters of discipline are gradually bringing the economy of the church in this country into harmony with the discipline in other and older portions of the church.

The oldest Catholic body of population in the United States is the population of New Mexico, of Spanish and Indian origin. The white population is essentially descended from the first settlers, who occupied the country about 1580, and who, though expelled about a century after, soon returned. The original Spanish population of Florida all retired in the last century when the Colony passed into the hands of England. During the British sway, a number of Minorcans and Greeks were introduced by Mr. Turnbull, whose descendants form the nucleus of the present Catholic population of that State.

The French settlements at Vincennes, Kaskaskia, Cahokia, influenced by Rev. Mr. Gibault, welcomed Gen. Clark during the Revolutionary War; and their descendants form part of the Catholic population of the West and South. Detroit was long retained by England; and its French population underwent few changes, and their descendants still form a considerable part of the Catholic population.

The nucleus in the English Colonies was the body of colonists who came over in 1633 with Leonard Calvert. Many of the settlers were Protestants, and Calvert at once put up a church for their use; but the leading settlers who took up lands in their own name were mainly Catholics. As no Protestant minister came to attend those of that faith, most of the settlers in a few years were Catholics, and so continued, till, under William III., Lord Baltimore conformed to the Established Church in order to recover the province. This body of Catholics received few accessions from Europe, as from the time of Cromwell penal laws made the life of Catholics as intolerable as in England. The public services of the church were forbidden, double taxes imposed, the possession of arms denied. At one time these persecuted Catholics sought to obtain of the French Government lands in Louisiana. A few crossed into Virginia; but laws were as severe in that Colony, and in the last century the testimony of a Catholic could not be used in court.

In New York a few Catholics settled during the proprietorship of James II. as Duke of York, and king; but under the subsequent rulers they disappeared, penal laws preventing the entrance of priests. Pennsylvania was more liberal, and Catholics were among the earliest settlers; and clergy came over, who not only attended the Catholics, but won over some Protestants. From 1732 these Pennsylvania Catholics came under the ministrations of the English Jesuits in Maryland, who had been the pastors of the Catholics there from the foundation of the Colony, and had attended those in New York in the seventeenth century. When a German emigration to Pennsylvania began, many of the new-comers were Catholics; and, to minister to them, some German Jesuits came over, who visited Catholic mining-colonies at the iron-mines in New Jersey, and under Father Ferdinand Steinmeyer, or Farmer, extended their missionary excursions to New York not long before the Revolution.

These Catholics had no churches, except in Philadelphia, Lancaster, Conewago, and Goshenhoppen; no churches being permitted in Maryland, where only small chapels, under the same roof as the residence of the priest, were allowed. In 1755 seven thousand Catholic Acadians were, for refusing to take the oath of supremacy, seized, and scattered in poverty through the thirteen Colonies. Most of them who survived the hardships of their terrible transportation straggled to Canada or Louisiana, only Maryland retaining any permanently.

During the Revolution the Canadians were friendly, and might easily have been won. A number espoused the American cause, and settled in Northern New York. Two Canadian regiments were formed, which fought in the Continental Army to the close of the war, and had a Catholic chaplain commissioned by Congress.

After the Revolution, a new emigration set in, bringing in Catholics, who settled in New York and New England. The Maryland ex-Jesuits were the only clergy, their society having been dissolved by Clement XIV., and the Vicar Apostolic of London having virtually abandoned them on account of their adhesion to the American cause. Priests, not always of the highest character, straggled over with the emigrants; and some chaplains of the French and Spanish naval and military forces remained to do mission-work here.

After the Rev. John Carroll was appointed Prefect Apostolic, some order was established; and from the erection of the see of Baltimore the growth was steady. Churches were begun in New York and Boston, and then at other cities near the coast, from Boston to Savannah. In consequence of the troubles caused by the outbreak of the Revolution in France, a community of Carmelite nuns came to Maryland; the English Dominicans, expelled from Bornheim, sent a part of their community to Kentucky; the Sulpitians began a seminary; and a number of learned and zealous French priests came to the United States, who did much to maintain a spirit of religion among the older and more recently arrived Catholics. Conversions to the Catholic religion became more frequent. Gov. Lee of Maryland, Rev. John Thayer of Boston, Rev. Mr. Kewley of New York, the Rev. Mr. Barber and his family, Ironsides, Richards, Holmes, and others, showed the influence of the liberty given to Catholics. This freedom was not absolute. In some States they were still disfranchised. In New York they could not sit in the Legislature. In Massachusetts the highest court in 1800 decided that a Catholic must pay for the support of the Protestant minister; and a priest was indicted for marrying a couple out of the limits of the city where he resided, although within the district assigned to him by the bishop.

Kentucky was settled largely by Catholics from Maryland, and had priests laboring there soon after the Revolution. The church there took form under the labors of Rev. Mr. Badin, Nerinckx, and Bishop Flaget, with the English Dominicans. The French priests of Kentucky visited the old French settlements in Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan; the Rev. Gabriel Richard becoming the chief missionary in the last State. In the East the French priests Matignon and Cheverus attended the Catholics of Boston and those scattered throughout New England.

Bishop Carroll had sought a division of his diocese at the very commencement of the century; but it was not till 1810 that bishops were appointed to Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Bardstown, Ky. Increasing emigration soon led to a growth of the Catholic body in the other dioceses. When the agitation for Catholic emancipation began in England and Ireland, a counter-movement led to the publication of many works attacking the Catholic doctrines, discipline, and institutions. This brought increased controversies. Many of the works were reprinted in the United States; and the controversial literature begun by Carroll, Thayer, and Fleming, was continued, and reached its height about 1836, when works like the Aufsil Disclosures of Maria Monk were issued. The falsity of that book was shown by William L. Stone, editor of the Commercial Advertiser, and was established in a chancery suit; but a similar work led to the burning of an Ursuline Convent at Charlestown, Mass. After this period, the opposition to Catholics became political, rather than theological, as was apparent in the Native American riots in Philadelphia in 1844, in which two churches and many residences were destroyed. Since that time, political parties and associations hostile to Catholics appear from time to time.

These have not, however, affected sensibly the growth of the Catholic body, or the establishment of churches, colleges, convents, schools, asylums, hospitals, and the like. The earlier Catholic emigration was mainly Irish; but for the last forty years the German-Catholic element has been increasing steadily; so that, especially in the West, the Germans and their immediate descendants form a large part of the Catholic body. They are said to have about one-third of the priests in the United States, and they have a large number of bishops. They maintain several Catholic papers, and have many thoroughly organized societies. In New England and Illinois there are large bodies of Canadian French.

The most eminent members of the Catholic Church in the United States have been Archbishops Carroll and Spalding of Baltimore, Hughes of New York, Cardinal McCloskey, Archbishop Henmi of Milwaukee, Bishop England of Charleston, Bruté of Vincennes, Archbishop Kenrick of Baltimore, Bishop Flaget of Bardstown and Louisville, Bishop Cheverus of Boston, Prince Galitzin, Rev. Dr. Corcoran, Rev. Felix Varela, Rev. I. T. Hecker, Chief-Justice Taney, Judge Gaston of North Carolina, Commodore Barry, Gen. Rosecrans, Orestes A. Brownson, Robert Walsh, James A. McMaster, Dr. Levi Silliman Ives, the Redemptorist Father Müller.

The first Catholic churches erected in this country, except in Spanish parts, were generally plain and inexpensive; but with the growth of the body, churches and institutions of great solidity and beauty were erected, often beyond the means of the community, and involving loads of debt under which many churches are struggling. Of the churches, the finest is St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York, one of the most striking ecclesiastical buildings in America.

Catholic Population.—There are no accurate data for estimating the Catholic population in the United States. As there is no system of membership in the Catholic Church such as obtains in many Protestant denominations, every one baptized and brought up in the Catholic faith, attending divine worship more or less regularly, and from time to time approaching the sacraments, is regarded as a Catholic, unless he distinctly disavows it by formally connecting himself with some other church. A Catholic Directory is published annually, made up of reports from the different archbishops and bishops, with estimates of population; but these are not always based on a census, or on the number of baptisms, which may be taken as that of live births. The population given for 1883 by this periodical is 6,832,954. The system adopted in the United States census gives a much smaller population; but the census figures are based on the seating-capacity of the churches, and in the Catholic churches in the cities and large towns this gives a number much below the real one. In these churches there are on Sundays three or four successive masses, each attended by a different congregation; so that a church with a seating-capacity of 1,500 will and often does accommodate 6,000. Thus in Hartford, in April, 1881, an actual count showed 12,431 attending five Catholic churches, and 12,000 attending forty Protestant churches on the same day. Similar enumerations elsewhere gave similar results, showing that a Catholic congregation in a city numbers at least four times the seating-capacity of the church.

The Catholic population is mainly in the Northern and newly settled Western States, and is comparatively small in the States which till recent times retained slavery, excepting Louisiana, where the original population was exclusively Catholic. Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Louisiana have about one-third of the population Catholic, according to Catholic estimates; New York, Wisconsin, and California, one-fourth; Maryland, Minnesota, Colorado, and Dakota, one-fifth; Illinois, New Jersey, Idaho, and Washington Territory, one-sixth; Pennsylvania, one-seventh; Michigan and Kentucky, one-eighth; Ohio and Nebraska, one-ninth; Maine and New Hampshire, one-tenth; but in Virginia the Catholics are one in forty to the population; in Georgia, one to sixty; in Tennessee, one to fifty; in Alabama and Mississippi, one to eighty; in South Carolina and Arkansas, one to one hundred; and in North Carolina, where there is the smallest proportion of Catholics, one to nine hundred.

The Catholic body includes many of foreign nationality. The German and Irish Catholics, with their immediate families born here, each constitutes probably about one-fourth of the whole; most of the other half being American-born, with a smaller proportion of other nationalities.

Missions.—No missionary society exists among the Catholics of the United States for home or foreign missions; nor is there any tract society or Sunday-school union, or similar means of diffusing religious knowledge among old or young. Missions among the Indians have existed from the earliest period, and nearly one hundred Catholic priests lost their lives in efforts to convert Indian tribes. A few Indians of the old conversion remained at Indian Oldtown in Maine, St. Regis in New York, with others in Canada, belonging to the Abenaki and Iroquois families. There are Catholic Chippewas in Michigan, Wisconsin, and neighboring States. In recent times mission-work among the Indians was revived by the Jesuit fathers, who had missions among the Pottawatamies, Osages, and Kansas; and, under Father De Smet, missions were founded among the Flatheads, Kalispels, and Cœurs d'Alène in the Rocky Mountains, which are still maintained. In Oregon, missions of secular priests and of Oblate Fathers are established among the Chinook, Yakamas, Warm Springs, Umatilla, Grand Rond, and Malheur Reservation Indians, with the Colville and Attanum missions in Washington Territory. The Pueblo Indians of New Mexico were converted by the Spanish Franciscans before 1626; and their descendants are still Catholics, although, during Mexican republican rule, the breaking up of the missions left them for more than a generation without religious guides. The Franciscans had extensive missions in California, which were also broken up by the Mexicans, and most of the Indians perished: the few survivors known as Mission Indians are still Catholics. The Benedictines under Bishop Marty are attempting work among the Sioux in Dakota, and under Abbot Robot among the tribes in Indian Territory. No organized effort has been made to reach the negroes of the South. There are many colored Catholics in Maryland and Louisiana; and the Sisters of Providence, a community of colored women, have long been in charge of Catholic schools. The Benedictines have made some efforts in Savannah, on Skidaway Island, Ga.; and some fathers of St. Joseph, and secular priests, have charge of colored churches in several places; but the work has not attained any great development. All these missions to Indians and negroes are under the bishops of the dioceses in which they are situated.

ROMAN EMPIRE AND CHRISTIANITY, The.

A view of the relations of Christianity to the Roman Empire would embrace a consideration of three distinct epochs in Roman history: (1) That period (about three hundred years) when Christianity was brought into conflict with the old religious beliefs and policy of the empire, and was gradually converting the Roman world to the faith; (2) The period during which Christianity became the state and official religion of the empire, from the reign of Constantine to that of Charlemagne, about five hundred years; (3) That long period, commonly called the "middle age," when Western Christendom was ruled under a system called the "Holy Roman Empire," formed by a close alliance of the Popes with Charlemagne and his successors.

The religion of the Romans had its origin in the worship by each family of its own household and tutelary divinities, in whom the souls of their ancestors were supposed to be enshrined. The religion of the civitas consisted in honoring, under the name of numina, those physical forces of nature, which, unpropitiated, might, it was feared, prove dangerous to the safety of the State. The Romans were regarded by the ancients as a most religious people. The forms of family and of state religion were carefully observed by them in every event of life. The safety and protection of the State was the great object of all Roman policy, and it had for its basis religious beliefs. The cultus was entirely under the control of the civil authority. There was no priestly caste at Rome, after the manner of the Orientals. Pontiffs, augurs, and priests performed certain special functions in ascertaining the will of the gods; but they did so only under the direction of the lay authorities. Devotion, accompanied by enthusiasm or demonstrative feeling, was considered wholly out of place in the worship of the Roman divinities. Calmness, moderation, self-possession, on the part of the worshippers, were essential qualities when the favor of the gods was to be invoked. The most important peculiarity in their ritual was the exact observance of those forms, which, it was supposed, their ancestors had employed successfully in their worship. In the most religious of the Romans these forms constituted the very substance and essence, not merely of religious worship, but of religious faith also. Thus, while the best characteristics of Roman life were gradually developed, religion presented itself to the minds of the people as having one sole object in view; namely, the safety and prosperity of the State, and as providing, as the only method of reaching that object, the maintenance and exact observance of the ancestral ritual.

When Rome became mistress of the world, this intensely national religious system had been a good deal weakened by two principal causes: (1) The introduction of the worship of foreign deities, chiefly from Egypt and the East, such as Isis, Serapis, and, later, the Mithraic ritual; (2) The destructive criticism of the basis of the popular religion by philosophers and poets, who followed the example given them by the Greeks. To meet these assaults, it was said that any one was free to believe what he chose, provided he punctually observed the ancient prescribed ritual of worship. And such, strange to say, was the belief and practice of the Romans when their power was greatest, and when patriotic virtue was strongest amongst them. The fitting types of the religion they professed are Cicero, who has, of all the ancient authors, written most fully in its praise, and who believed in no gods whatever; and the supreme pontiff, Julius Cæsar, who, notwithstanding he was the official head of the Roman religion, stoutly denied the immortality of the soul in the Senate House.

The new gods and the new philosophy worked a great change towards the close of the republic; and Augustus found, when he became emperor, that the practice of the old religious rites had been almost given up. Incredulity and materialism had driven the worshippers of the old gods from their temples, so many of which had fallen into ruin, that Augustus rebuilt no less than eighty-two of them in Rome alone. His policy was to found his empire upon a conservative basis. It would appear that there was still left some faith in the old forms, and he selected the religious sentiment of the people as most convenient for his purpose. At the same time the conquests of Rome had impressed him, in common with many statesmen of the time, with the belief that the religions of all countries had a similar basis, and that their diverse gods were really manifestations of the same divine power under different names. On this principle, foreign religions were tolerated in Rome and throughout the empire, always, however, under the condition, express or implied, that they did not interfere with that of the state. The apotheosis, or deification of the emperors, which began under Augustus, is, perhaps, the truest expression of the actual religious sentiment of the time. It formed the empire religion, which, in imitation of the narrow worship of the civitas, made the supremacy of the empire the great object of religious interest, devotion, and worship. Still, the observance of the rites of the old national worship was carefully kept up. Foreign religions asked for no exclusive privileges; and the only restriction which was placed on their votaries was, that they should do no act which was inconsistent with the preservation of the safety and supremacy of the Roman Empire.

Christianity had thus at the outset to meet, (1) the old Roman popular religion; (2) the devotion to foreign deities, chiefly Egyptian and Oriental, which had become fashionable among the higher classes; (3) the religion which was based upon the deification of the emperors. Of course, the hostility between its system and these forms of religion was irreconcilable. The point at which the conflict was first to take place is accurately shown in the book of Acts. The Romans did not persecute the early Christians for mere opinion's sake. On the contrary, we learn, that, when the Jews were exciting popular clamor against St. Paul and his companions in the cities of Greece and Asia Minor, the Roman officials were wholly unwilling to see in the conduct of the apostle an offence against Roman law, while they contemptuously declined to consider questions concerning the Jewish religion, as beyond their jurisdiction.

It would appear that neither the belief nor the worship of the early Christians, as long as they were so obscure as not to attract public notice, subjected them to the penalties of Roman law. The cruel sufferings which they endured at Rome, under Nero (A.D. 64), seem to have been due to a desire on the part of that tyrant to make the Jews odious by attributing the burning of Rome to one of the parties or sects of that people, as the Christians were then popularly supposed to be. At any rate, it is very certain that the Christians had nothing to do with burning the city; and the persecution of Nero, so called, was a local one, not extending beyond the limits of Rome itself. The letter of Pliny to the Emperor Trajan (A.D. 103), asking his advice as to the treatment of the Christians in Bithynia, shows that both parties seem to be dealing with a new problem, at any rate, with one which had not yet been settled by imperial legislation. Doubtless, Pliny had, by virtue of the imperium confided to him, punished severely those who had been guilty of overt acts of impiety by refusing to pay divine honors to the emperor; but he is evidently puzzled to know what he is to do with those persons, who, while their belief and worship are not in accord with the national rites, have been guilty of no outward act of disobedience to the government. Heresy was a crime the punishment for which had not then been provided for in the Roman code; and hence these two men, certainly among the most enlightened of their age, agree, while having absolute power, upon a policy of moderation and conciliation towards those whose religious opinions differed from those of the old Roman faith.

While the government thus forbore persecuting the Christians for heresy, still the populace in the large cities in the East, where the Christians were numerous, became, for various reasons, intensely imbittered against the new religion. The Christians naturally kept themselves more and more aloof from their fellow-subjects. They regarded the order to throw a few grains of incense upon the altar of the gods or of the emperor, not as a test of loyalty, but as an invitation to commit an act, in their eyes, of horrible impiety. They absented themselves, for conscience' sake, from the cruel sports of the amphitheatre, especially when great religious festivals in honor of the heathen gods were held there; they refused to be soldiers, yet they courted martyrdom; and finally they preached a doctrine which taught that the world would soon be consumed by fire, and that all who did not worship the Christian God were doomed to eternal punishment. Under these circumstances, the mob in these large towns, frenzied by the open neglect of their own religious rites, and attributing every calamity they suffered to the wrath of their offended gods, frequently shouted, "The Christians to the lions!" And the complaisant procurator, willing to do them a pleasure, too often yielded to their demands.

It is observable, that the first Roman legislation bearing directly on the position of the Christians in the empire is found in the edicts of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius, by which Christianity was not protected, but its disciples were rescued from the fury of the mob, and handed over for trial, for their offences against the Roman religion and Roman law, to the regular tribunals. It is also to be observed, that although the open profession of the Christian faith, and especially its propagation by means of proselytism, necessarily violated the Roman law, the offence was not an ecclesiastical crime in the modern sense. The Roman gods were guarded from insult by the Roman law, because their favor was considered essential to the safety of the State. Their claims to reverence were defended, not by the Pontifex Maximus, but by the emperor.

Under this jurisprudence, many Christians were tried, and condemned to death, under the Antonines. The martyrs of this age included some of the most illustrious early Christian confessors, — Polycarp at Smyrna, for instance; St. Justin, the Christian apologist at Rome; and a large number of disciples at Lyons, including the celebrated St. Blandina. For nearly a hundred years after the Antonines, the hand of persecution was measurably stayed. The emperors who ruled during that period knew, and cared as little for the old Roman gods as they did for the Roman Senate and people. They were mostly ignorant but successful soldiers, who had risen from the ranks, and were wholly imbued with Oriental superstitions.

In the beginning of the third century, there was a renewal, under two emperors, of the persecution of the Christians, from different motives. Severus, in order to avenge the neglected Serapis, the god of his predilection, condemned many Christian worshippers in Egypt and in Northern Africa; while Decius, hoping to propitiate the old gods, to whose neglect he ascribed the decay of the Roman power, caused many Christians at Rome, including their bishop, to be put to death. The last serious effort which was made by the government to arrest the triumphant progress of Christianity was the adoption of a new form of Paganism as the official religion, — a system in which some rude notions of the unity of God were mingled with the recognition of the power of the old gods as that of subordinate divinities, and with certain forms of sun-worship. Christianity, under this new Paganism, was, so to speak, outlawed. By the edict of Diocletian and Galerius, its churches were destroyed, and its property confiscated; and in one sense the Church suffered from this persecution to a greater degree than from all the rest. But either the number of the Christians was too great, or their faith was too strong, to be overcome by the new enemy. The dying Galerius, in 311, while he justified the measures of Diocletian and himself as undertaken to secure the public welfare and the unity of the State, revoked the edict of persecution as not adapted to secure its ends, and thus gave to the Christians permission for the free and public exercise of their religion. The Edict of Milan (312), issued in the joint names of Constantine and Licinius, has been called the "great charter of the liberties of Christianity;" but it was no more than an edict of unlimited toleration. Still, it withdrew official recognition and protection from Paganism; and under its operation the old Roman religion gradually and slowly died out. Christianity was not recognized as the official religion until the reign of Theodosius, 380. Whether Constantine was a Christian is an historical problem not easy to solve. He purposely delayed baptism until he was in articulo mortis. But, whether Christian or not, vast changes took place during his reign, caused not merely by the unrestricted progress of Christianity, but by the relations which the emperor held towards its organized form, the Church. No one can read the account of the proceedings of the Council of Nicæa (325), which formulated the creed which from that period to this has been regarded as the basis of the faith of the universal church, without being convinced that the emperor was regarded as something more than the honorary president of that body, that he considered himself at least as Pontifex Maximus in the new religion, as his predecessors had been in the old; and thus at the very outset was forced upon the infant Church that unholy alliance with the State, which, among other things, has helped to make Christianity so conspicuous an element in all subsequent history. The modern conception of the union of Church and State had its origin under Constantine. His successors, Theodosius and Gratian, define or ratify the definition of doctrines, and condemn heretics. Justinian evidently thought himself Pope and emperor combined; and Charlemagne, in his Capitularies, is at once the legislator of the Church and of the State.

The Christian Church received from Constantine another distinguishing mark, which it retained for nearly fifteen hundred years; namely, the principle and the practice of punishing heretics by civil penalties. It is an humiliating confession to make, that heresy—which is defined to be a persistent advocacy of opinions which have been condemned by the church—is an offence which has never been punished as a crime by the civil magistrate under any ecclesiastical system save the Christian. But Constantine provided by an edict that the Donatist heretics should be so punished in 316, and his example was followed by Theodosius and others; so that before the close of the fourth century no less than seventeen edicts had been promulgated, directing the magistrates to punish Christian dissenters. By these edicts they were deprived of their property, and made incapable of holding office, and they were liable to be scourged and banished. The first blood judicially shed for religious opinion is said to have been that of certain Manicheans in 385; but it is alleged that their condemnation was extorted from an usurping emperor, and that the infliction of death as a punishment was highly disapproved by such saints as Martin of Tours and Ambrose of Milan.

During the fourth century the pretensions of the Christian hierarchy to power were greatly increased, and the primitive simplicity of the conduct of Christians no longer existed. The church had vast possessions; its clergy formed the larger portion of the educated classes, and held conspicuous positions at the imperial court. Christian beneficence was not only recognized as a duty, but it became the fashion, or, rather, a passion among people of rank and wealth, to lavish gifts on the church: the magistrates in the town worked generally harmoniously with the bishop in the administration; the bishop, indeed, becoming the most conspicuous officer in the municipia. In short, society during the fourth century, both in the East and the West, became Christianized. A revolution had begun which not only destroyed the outward forms of Paganism, but which gradually worked out its spirit from the minds of the people. Nowhere can we find a better illustration of the recognized power of the clergy than where Ambrose, archbishop of Milan, has the courage to forbid the Emperor Theodosius (A. D. 390) even to enter the church, much less to receive therein the sacraments, until he had undergone penance for the crime of the massacre at Thessalonica, of which he had been guilty.

To this new condition of society a good deal of the legislation of Constantine and his successors corresponds. Much of that legislation is characterized by its humane spirit, and is in such striking contrast with the old Roman ideas, that we can hardly mistake in tracing in it the direct influence of Christian doctrine and moral example: such, for instance, are the edicts forbidding the exposition of infants, and restraining excessive cruelty towards slaves, as well as those concerning adultery, divorce, unnatural crimes, etc. How much of all this was due to what may be called the "reflex action" of Christianity, and how much to the humane principles of stoicism, it is not easy to say.

As the fourth century witnessed a succession of Christian emperors, and the firm establishment of the dogmatic creed of Christianity in the empire, so the fall of Pagan and imperial Rome, and the building-up of a new and Christian Rome upon its ruins, occurred during the fifth. The siege and capture of Rome by Alaric and his Goths, in 409, opens, therefore, a new era in history. Rome then ceased to be the conqueror of the world in the old sense; but, as soon as she became Christian, she prepared to wield a far greater power over mankind than she had ever yet done. As the imperial power declined through corruption, weakness, and the assaults of the Barbarians, that of the Church, which availed herself freely of the imperial methods and organization, constantly increased. The power of civil government, especially in the West, fell into her hands naturally and necessarily, simply because the rulers, in the general confusion, were incapable of affording protection to those whom they governed. The capture of Rome by Alaric, therefore, was one of the great steps by which the popes, bishops of Rome, rose to power. The Pope at that time was doubtless the most important man in Rome: he alone, had any real power,—not merely the attributes of supremacy, but authority very extensive in practice, although undefined. To him the panic-stricken Senate and people turned for help in time of danger; and he (Leo I.) justified their confidence by striving, first to mitigate the anger of Alaric, and, secondly, to induce the cowardly Honorius, safe amidst the morasses of Ravenna, to send succor to the sorely pressed people of Rome. From that time the real government of that city was in the hands of its bishop. No emperor ever afterwards resided there. Meantime, in the East the union between Christianity and the imperial government became more thoroughly consolidated. The provisions of the Code of Justinian (529-565) are the best illustration how far this process had been carried; this code being a revised edition, so to speak, of the existing imperial law. It begins with a profession of belief in the Nicene Creed and in the authority of the first four General Councils. It acknowledges the supremacy of the Roman Church, commanding all the churches to be united with her. Justinian legislates, therefore, in this code, for Rome as well as for the East. The theory that the emperor is the religious as well as the civil head of the empire is maintained throughout his legislation. The church officials are as much under his jurisdiction as the civil magistrates. There are no exemptions, whatever, of the clergy from the ordinary operation of the civil law. The hierarchy in the Church, as in the State, is regulated by the provisions of this code; and the bishop is made an imperial officer for certain temporal affairs. There are also minute regulations in this code concerning the discipline of the monasteries. These provisions in regard to the relations of the Roman Government to Christianity in the sixth century form, of course, but a small portion of the great Code of Justinian; but they seem to show very clearly, either that the hierarchical and sacerdotal pretensions of later ages were not then put forward, or that the imperial government wholly ignored them. Religion and civil law, Church and State, appear in the legislation of Justinian to be practically identified under the common supremacy of the emperor; and church law throughout the world is based on Roman ideas and methods, which were all the outgrowth of the theory of the absolute unity of the State.

As far as we can say that the progress of Christianity was thenceforth dependent upon human agencies, we may affirm that its special course and direction, so different in the eastern and in the western portions of the empire, was determined by the different relations it held to the government at Constantinople and at Rome.

The strength of Christianity as organized by the emperors of the East was very much wasted in perpetual controversies in regard to the nature of Christ. The emperors participated actively in these discussions, which were regarded as matters of the highest State concern. They resulted in rending asunder the Christian organization of the East; and the Oriental sects of the Nestorians, Jacobites, Maronites, etc., were not only heretics in religion in the eyes of the authorities at Constantinople, but they became thoroughly disaffected to the imperial government because it did not maintain what they regarded as the orthodox creed. These religious dissensions were, no doubt, a main cause of the increasing weakness of the Byzantine government in its control of the lands forming the basin of the Mediterranean, and contributed largely to the ease with which they were overrun and subdued by the followers of Mohammed.

In the West, although the church in Rome may be called a Greek missionary church, the curious and subtle metaphysical discussions concerning the divine nature, so dear to the Greek mind, were avoided, and a more practical spirit prevailed. Rome, as has been said, became a Christian city in 410; and the separate government of an emperor of the West was given up in 476. While, however, the Cæsar at Constantinople thus became again nominally the world-emperor, the real power, in Italy at least, was thenceforth in the hands, first of the Goths, and then of the Lombards and the Pope.

By the close of the fifth century all the provinces of the West were permanently occupied by Barbarian invaders. But the Roman Church, with the Pope at its head, not only survived the wreck of the Roman Empire, but it seems to have snatched from its dying hands the gift of governing mankind, which enabled it to conquer the world anew. From the day the Pope felt himself secure in his supremacy in the church in the West, and free from any likelihood of interference by the emperor at Constantinople, measures were begun by him to revive the old Roman Empire, or rather to establish in its place a new one with the old methods and pretensions, of which the Pope was to be the spiritual director and guide. This scheme was carried out in the midst of the confusion and ruin caused by the invasion of the Barbarians; and they themselves were made the agents, in the midst of their triumph over the old empire, of establishing a new one on a far grander scale, called the "Holy Roman Empire."

This scheme was begun by sending missionaries from the Pope into heathen Germany to propagate there the Roman-Catholic faith, and by forming a close alliance with the Frankish chiefs who ruled over tribes, who alone, of all the Barbarians, were Catholic as opposed to Arian. The Pope added much to the power of Pepin in the eyes of his tribesmen by crowning and anointing him king; and, in turn, the king aided and protected the Catholic missionaries in Germany. The result was, that Frankish conquests and the triumph of orthodoxy went hand in hand in that country. The obligation of the Pope to the king was reciprocal, and it was to their mutual advantage to maintain it. This was seen particularly, on a much larger scale, in the reign of the successor of Pepin, Charlemagne, who had, as king of the Franks, become by his conquests the ruler of a far larger territory than the Roman Empire had ever occupied in Europe. He was called upon by the Pope to drive out the Lombards, who were encroaching upon the territories of the church, and to free the Pope from the jurisdiction of the emperor at Constantinople, who was striving to impose upon the Western Church the observance of decrees abolishing the worship of images in churches which were considered heretical at Rome.

This work, which was begun by his father Pepin, was completed by Charlemagne; and on Christmas Day, A.D. 800, Charlemagne was crowned at Rome, by the Pope, emperor of the new or revived Roman Western Empire, or, as it was called, the "Holy Roman Empire." The significance of this transaction is, that it was intended by the parties to it to divide the government of the world between them. To the new emperor and his successors, kings of the Franks, duly crowned by the Pope, was assigned universal rule in temporal affairs, as also the duty of defending the church, and of maintaining the true or Catholic faith throughout the world. To the Pope was given not only a supreme dominion in matters ecclesiastical, but a certain great but undefined power in civil affairs. It was supposed, that, under this dual system, no collision between the Christian emperor and the Christian pontiff was possible, each being necessarily moved by the same impulse. This scheme was a strange mixture of the Roman idea of universal dominion and absolute unity of government with St. Augustine's theory, that it was the chief purpose of God in creating man that there should be a visible society on earth, called "the church," by means of which the city of man should become in due time the city of God.

Under this new or revived Roman Empire the relations of the Popes with the kings of the Franks or of Germany — "Roman Emperors," as they were styled — were maintained during the middle age and up to the time of the Reformation. Practically it was a great failure; because it was found impossible for the parties to it to agree upon what special powers were reserved by it to the emperor, and what belonged to the Pope. Disputes on this subject were kept alive during the reigns of the kings of Germany of the three dynasties, the Saxon, the Franconian, and the Hohenstauffen, founded upon claims made by them by virtue of their office as emperors, as opposed to those of the Popes; and yet the system of the Holy Roman Empire, unsuited as it proved itself to be to the feudal society which had succeeded the imperial system of Charlemagne, was maintained legally and nominally in the public law of Europe until long after the Reformation. It held its place notwithstanding the long quarrel of "the Investitures," in which the real question at issue was whether the Pope or the emperor should control the bishops (then as a class by far the largest landholders in Europe) by conferring upon them with their office the estates belonging to their sees. Even the humiliating scene of the world's titular master, Henry IV., imploring in abject penitence the forgiveness of the Pope, Gregory VII., because he had previously disavowed the Pope's authority, did not disabuse men's minds of the belief that a Roman empire with an emperor and a pope at its head was part of the eternal order. Nor did the haughty sacerdotal pretensions of the popes during the middle age; nor the enforced payment of tribute to the court of Rome; nor the constant interference of the popes in purely civil questions within the empire, such as wars of succession and the like; nor even the purely secular ambition which led many of the popes to maintain their pretensions in Italy as against the emperor by all the weapons of the spiritual armory, and which in the end forced the emperors to abandon Italy, — none of these things seemed to interrupt the legal relations at least which had been established between the popes and Charlemagne and Otto the Great.

But the Reformation destroyed in the end this strange mediæval creation. More than half of Germany was Protestant in 1648, when the Peace of Westphalia closed the wars of religion by providing for the direct sovereignty of the different princes, and abolishing that of the emperor, and granting "equal and exact" toleration to Catholics and Protestants. This really made the former empire a federation; for its affairs were ruled by a diet representing the different states, and it was inconceivable that an empire in the mediæval sense could exist where the jurisdiction of the Pope was disavowed. Still, the lawyers in Germany clung obstinately to the old forms of the Roman law; and when a vacancy occurred the elections were held, and the Roman emperor duly installed in the Römer Saal at Frankfort. This mockery was kept up until 1806, when Napoleon, having become Protector of the Confederation of the Rhine, and refusing to recognize any longer the existence of the Holy Roman Empire, Francis II., then emperor, voluntarily gave up the title, and took that of "Emperor of Austria;" and thus the Holy Roman Empire came to an end a thousand and six years after the coronation of Charlemagne, and eighteen hundred and fifty-eight years after Caesar had conquered at Pharsalia.

ROMANS, Epistle to the. See PAUL.

ROMANUS ascended the papal throne in 897, after the assassination of Stephen VII., but reigned only four months. See JAFFÉ: Regesta Pont. Rom., p. 303.

ROME has been more closely interwoven with the history of the civilization of the human race than any other city on the globe. In some single point other cities may excel it. It has no Golgotha, and it has no Acropolis; but all the single threads of ancient history were gathered in Rome, and from Rome issued all the single threads of modern history.

More especially Rome may be said to have been the centre of the history of the Christian Church. From the third to the sixteenth century it was, in spite of the schism of the Eastern Church, and in spite of a never fully suppressed opposition in the Western, the pivot on which the Christian Church rested; and from the Reformation down to our times it has still continued to be the head of the largest section of the Christian Church. It owes this its prominent position in the Christian world to the circumstance of its being the residence of the popes. It was the popes who with great courage and tact, and sometimes, also, with great sacrifices, saved the city from utter destruction by the hands of the Barbarians; and it was a simple and natural consequence of the course which events took, that in time it became not only the residence, but the possession, of the popes. By degrees, however, as the papal idea of transforming Christianity into a kind of Tibetan Lamaism developed, imperial Rome, with its temples, palaces, theatres, and baths, disappeared, and on its ruins, and from its materials, papal Rome was constructed, with its churches and monasteries. The connection between the city and its rulers became as intimate as that between body and soul: nevertheless, it must not be overlooked, that the city actually sank lowest at the very moment when the Papacy rose highest. When the popes removed to Avignon, Rome was nothing more than a number of short stretches of grass, brushwood, and ruins, in which the robbers lay in ambush for the pilgrims who wandered from church to church, or from monastery to monastery; and it was not so much the return of the popes as the revival of letters which this time saved the city, and once more made it the centre of civilization. During the whole period of the Renaissance, Rome was indeed the true hearth of science and art, of learning and taste, until in the eighteenth century it met with a rival, which finally outshone it, namely, Paris. In the middle of the nineteenth century the city again changed character. It became a political centre, and, after some convulsions, the capital of the kingdom of Italy; and by degrees, as royal Rome unfolds itself with its schools, factories, hotels, and commodious citizens' dwellings, papal Rome is pressed into the shadow, and becomes a memory.

On Sept. 16, 1870, the French troops were withdrawn from Civita Vecchia; and on Sept. 20, Rome surrendered to the king of Italy, after a short resistance by the papal mercenaries. A provisional government was established, and a popular vote was decreed on the question of annexation to the kingdom of Italy. As 40,785 votes were in the affirmative, and only 46 in the negative, — an eloquent characterization of the papal government, — a royal decree of Oct. 9 formally annexed the Roman territory, and on July 2, 1871, the king of Italy took up his residence in the city. Meanwhile the Italian Parliament had passed the so-called "law of guaranty" (May 13, 1871), allowing the Pope to live in the Vatican as a sovereign, not subject to the laws of the land, and granting him an annual appanage of 3,225,000 livres. The Pope protested against all these proceedings, excommunicated every one who had taken part in the establishment of the kingdom of Italy, refused to accept the appanage granted, and complained loudly that he was kept a prisoner in the Vatican. But his protests had no effect, and his complaints found no sympathy. The syllabus and the decrees of the Vatican Council proved utterly unable to prevent the floods of modern civilization from pushing their waves against the very walls of the Vatican. A new police-force, a new board of health, a better illumination of the streets, a new press-law, a new school-law, etc., transformed the city in an incredibly short time, as if it had been touched with a magic wand. Out of a population of between 200,000 and 300,000 inhabitants there were 113,89 pupils in 1873 in the new elementary schools established under the control of the State. In the same year the new Protestant Church of St. Paul-within-the-Walls was dedicated, and the first female seminary was opened. There are now about twelve Protestant congregations and chapels in the city, representing the leading denominations, but mostly supported by English and American friends.

In spite of these changes, and many others of the same tendency, Rome has not as yet lost its character of being a pre-eminently ecclesiastical city. Of its hundred and thirty conventual institutions, some have been suppressed by the Italian Government, and their buildings employed for other purposes. But its three hundred and sixty churches are still standing; and they are by no means deserted, or in any way bereft of their splendors. Besides the churches of St. Peter, St. John Lateran, and St. Maria Rotonda (Panthéon), which are separately spoken of in this work, we may mention the Church of St. Paul, situated outside the city, on the road to Ostia, and on the spot, where, according to tradition, the apostle suffered martyrdom. The original building was one of the oldest and most magnificent churches in Rome, but was burned down on July 17, 1823. The falling roof, which was of wood, completely spoiled the columns and walls, with their costly mosaics and pictures. The new building, however, for whose construction the viceroy of Egypt presented the Pope with several shiploads of the finest alabaster, is a grand and no less magnificent structure. The Church of Sta. Maria Maggiore, situated on the Esquiline Hill, is one of the five patriarchal churches of Rome. It was built by Pope Liberius (352-366), and is probably the oldest Mary-church in Christendom. It is a basilica; and its flat wooden ceiling, excellently carved, and profusely gilded, is supported by forty-two magnificent columns. From the balcony on its front the Pope blesses the multitude on Aug. 15, the feast of the Ascension of Mary. The Church of St. Laurentius, situated outside the gate of the Tiburtine Road, was originally built by Constantine the Great, and consists really of two structures, connected with each other by a chapel over the tomb of the saint. The Church of St. Peter in Montorio, situated in the Trastevere, was built by Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain, on the spot, where, according to tradition, St. Peter suffered martyrdom. The Church of Sta. Maria in Araceli, situated on the Capitoline Hill, was built before the tenth century, and occupies the site of the ancient temple of Juno Moneta. It is, however, not so much the great number of churches in Rome which give the city its specifically ecclesiastical character as the life which is developed in the churches, and which, so to speak, is continued in the streets and in the houses.

ROOS, Magnus Friedrich, b. at Sulz-on-the-Neckar, Sept. 6, 1727; d. at Anhausen, March 19, 1803. He studied theology at Tübingen, and was appointed vicar in Stuttgart 1755, diakonus at Göppingen 1757, and at Bebenhausen 1767, and prälat of Anhausen 1784. A pupil of Bengel, and inclining towards pietism, he exercised a great influence, not only by his writings, but also by his powerful and impressive personality. His principal works are, Einleitung in die biblischen Geschichten, 1774 (last edition, 1876); Christliche Glaubenslehre, a popular representation of the system of Christian doctrines, 1786 (last edition, 1860); Christliches Hausbuch, Kreuzschule, 1799 (last edition, 1864); Soldatengespräche, Etwas für Seefahrer, etc. H. ROSA OF LIMA, the principal saint of Peru; b. at Lima in 1586; d. there in 1617, in consequence of the ascetic practices she performed in imitation of Catharine of Siena. She was canonized in 1671. See Act. Sanct., Aug. 26.

ROSA OF VITERBO, d. in her native city of Viterbo in 1252, about eighteen years old; preached repentance in the streets with the cross in her hand. See Act. Sanct., Sept. 1.

ROSALIA, St., the principal saint of Sicily, lived in the twelfth century as a hermit on Mount Quisquina, where her remains were found in a cave in 1621. She died between 1160 and 1180. See Act. Sanct., Sept. 4.

ROSARY, The, consists of a string of larger and smaller beads, and is used by the Roman Catholics when they say their Pater-nosters and Ave-Marias, in order to ascertain the number done. The custom of repeating the Lord's Prayer over and over again a great number of times in succession arose among the first Christian hermits and monks. (See SOZOMEN: Hist. Eccl., vi. 29.) But the origin of the rosary is, nevertheless, of a much later date. It was first used by the Dominican monks, though it is not certain that it was introduced by St. Dominic himself. As it is used both by the Mohammedans and the Brahmans, it is generally believed to have been brought to Europe by the crusaders. There are various forms of rosaries: that generally used has fifty-five beads; namely, five decades of Ave-Maria beads, and five Pater-noster beads. The meaning of the name rosarium, properly a "garden of roses," is variously explained by Roman-Catholic writers, but most properly from the phrase rosa mystica, often applied as a predicate to the Virgin.

The Confraternity of the Rosary — Confraternitas de Rosario, B. M. V. — was founded at Cologne in 1175, by Jacob Sprenger, grand-inquisitor of Germany, and received from Sixtus IV. absolution for a hundred days, and from Innocent VIII. absolution for three hundred and sixty thousand years. The victory of Lepanto, Oct. 7, 1571, was generally ascribed to the prayers of the order, and solemn festivals were established in its commemoration. It is the duty of each member to count his beads at least once a day. [See J. F. MAYER: De Rosario, Greifswald, 1720; EDWIN ARNOLD: Pearls of the Faith (poems on the Mohammedan's rosary, the hundred names of Allah), London, 1882.] G. E. STEITZ.

ROSCELIN (ROZELIN, or RUCELIN), often spoken of in the history of Christian doctrines as tritheist, and in the history of philosophy as nominalist, but nevertheless very imperfectly known. He seems to have been born in the diocese of Soissons, and to have been educated at Rheims. He was a canon at Compiègne, where his peculiar conception of the Holy Trinity first startled his pupils, and attracted public attention. In harmony with his philosophic nominalism, he could conceive of God as existing only under the form of an individual, and consequently the Trinity became to him three gods. One of his pupils, Johannes, afterwards cardinal-bishop of Fueseil, addressed himself to Anselm, at that time abbot of Bec; and Anselm answered, promising to write a complete refutation. (See BALUZIUS: Miscell., iv. p. 178, and Ep. Anselm., ii. 35.) A synod was convened at Soissons in 1092; and as Roscelin used to quote both Lanfranc and Anselm in favor of his views, the latter sent an exposition of his ideas to the synod, and Roscelin was compelled to recant. Anselm then finished his De fide trinitatis, which is a refutation of Roscelin; and the latter, as he, in spite of his recantation, continued to teach his old views, was deposed. He went to England, and attacked Anselm, now archbishop of Canterbury, for his views of the incarnation. A controversy had just sprung up between the archbishop and the king; but, as they shortly after were reconciled, Roscelin's attack had no effect, and he left England. (See ROSCELIN: Epist., p. 197.) He settled at Tours; and, shortly after, his controversy with Abelard began. Abelard had been his pupil; but, in his book De trinitate (afterwards called Introductio in theologiam), Abelard, evidently with an eye to the decisions of the synod of Soissons, very strongly emphasized the unity in the Trinity. Roscelin denounced him to Gisbert, bishop of Paris, for other heresies, and Abelard answered with a violent attack on Roscelin. (See ABELARD: Ep. xxi.) But from that time the latter disappears from history. See the several works on the history of philosophy by RITTER, PRANTL, and HAURÉAU; Histoire littéraire de la France, ix. p. 358; J. ROSE, Henry John, Church of England; b. at Uckfield, 1801; d. at Bedford, Jan. 31, 1873. He was graduated at St. John's College, Cambridge, 1821; fellow, 1824; Hulsean lecturer, 1833 ("The Law of Moses viewed in connection with the History and Character of the Jews"); rector of Houghton Conquest, Bedfordshire, 1837; archdeacon of Bedford, 1866. He edited the Encyclopædia Metropolitana (London, 1817-45, 2d ed. of part, 1819-58) from 1839, from which he reprinted, with additions, his History of the Christian Church from 1700 to 1853, 1858. He also edited the first volume of the New Biographical Dictionary (1839-47, 12 vols.), wrote in part the comments upon Daniel for the Bible (Speaker's) Commentary (London and New York, 1876), and was a member of the English Old Testament company of revisers.

ROSE, Hugh James, brother of the preceding; b. at Uckfield, 1795; d. in Florence, Italy, Dec. 22, 1838. He was graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, 1817; vicar of Horsham, 1822-30; prebendary of Chichester, 1827-33; Christian Advocate in the university of Cambridge, 1829-33; rector of Hadley, Suffolk, 1830; incumbent of Fairstead, Essex, and of St. Thomas, 1831; and principal of King's College, London, 1836. He was a very learned man, and a High-Churchman of the most pronounced type. He is considered, indeed, the actual founder of the Tractarian movement. (See TRACTARIANISM.) He edited the Encyclopædia Metropolitana (1836-38), and projected the New Biographical Dictionary (see above). For list of his publications, mostly pamphlets, see Allibone in loco.

ROSENBACH, Johann Georg, a native of Heilbronn, a spar-maker by trade; was seized with religious enthusiasm by reading the writings of Johann Adam Rabe of Erlangen; gave up his trade, and wandered through Germany, from Tübingen to Hamburg, 1703-06, preaching, and holding prayer-meetings, but generally persecuted by the clergy and the police. From Germany he went to Holland, and there the track of him has become lost. He published Glaubens-Bekennniß, 1703, Wunder-Führung Gottes, etc. L. HELLER.

ROSENMÜLLER, Ernst Friedrich Karl, b. at Hessberg, near Hildburghausen, Dec. 10, 1768; d. at Leipzig, Sept. 17, 1835. He studied Oriental languages and archaeology at Königsberg, Gießen, and Leipzig, and was in 1792 made professor at the last-mentioned university. For the study of the Arabic language and literature, his Institutiones ad fund. ling. Arab. (Leip., 1818) and Analecta Arabica (Leip., 1824-27, 3 vols.) were of great importance; and he exercised considerable influence on the development of evangelical theology by furnishing exact information of the state of the East, modern and ancient (Das alte und neue Morgenland, Leip., 1816-20, 6 vols.), and by his linguistic and archaeological explanations of the Old Testament, Scholia in V. T. (Leip., 1785-1817, 16 vols., abridged into 5 vols., Leip., 1828-35), Handbuch für bibl. Kritik und Exegese (Göttingen, 1797-1800, 4 vols.), and Handb. d. bibl. Alterthumskunde (Leip., 1823-31, 4 vols.). ALBRECHT VOGEL.

ROSICRUCIANS. In 1614 there appeared at Cassel an anonymous pamphlet under the title Fama Fraternitatis des löblichen Ordens des Rosenkreuzes. It gave a full report of the foundation of the secret society of the Rosicrucians two hundred years before, and an elaborate account of the life of the founder, Christian Rosenkreutz. He was a German by birth, of a distinguished family, and made as a monk a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Having studied physics and mathematics among the Arabs, and mastered the whole science of magic, he returned to Germany, and founded the order. The members, who were in the possession of all the deepest secrets of science, and absolutely exempted from sickness or suffering, should devote themselves to the curing and nursing of the sick; but they should wear no peculiar dress, and the existence of the society should be kept a secret for a hundred years. The rebuilding of a house, the book goes on, divulged the secret to the world; and people are now invited to enter the society. In 1615 appeared Confession oder Bekandtnuß der Societät und Bruderschaft R. C., and in 1616 Chymische Hochzeit Christian Rosenkreutz. The sensation which these publications produced was immense; and vehement controversies arose, both among theologians and physicians. Andreas Libavius protested that the whole purpose of the society was to destroy the authority of Galen, and put Theophrastus Paracelsus in his place. Others—as, for instance, the English alchemist, Robert Fludd, and the body-physician of the Emperor Rudolph II., Michael Maier—defended the society with enthusiasm. Various mystic philosophers and theologians, as also the Jesuits, tried to take advantage of the movement; while others saw in it a perfidious attempt against Lutheranism. Singularly enough, it proved absolutely impossible to discover the least trace of the actual existence of the original society. New societies appropriated the name, but the old seemed entirely to have disappeared. People began to consider the whole affair as a mystification; and it has been established with tolerable certainty, that the author of the Fama was Johann Valentin Andreae, the noted Württemberg theologian.

ROSWITHA lived in the latter part of the tenth century as nun in Gandersheim, and wrote, at the instance of her abbess (Gerberga, 959-1001, a daughter of Duke Henry of Bavaria), an epic in praise of Otho I. (Roswitha carmen de gestis Othonis I. imperatoris), and another on the history of her monastery (De primordiis cœnobii Gandersheimensis). She became still more famous by her comedies, written after the model of Terence, and for the purpose of weaning people from reading the slippery but charming plays of that writer. Her collected works were edited by K. A. Barack, Nuremberg, 1858. Her two epics have not come down to us complete, but have some value as historical sources. German trans. by THOMAS G. PRUND, in Geschichtsschreibern d. Deutsch. Vorzeit, vol. 5. JULIUS WEIZSÄCKER.

ROTA. See CURIA.

ROTHER, Richard, b. at Posen, Jan. 28, 1799; d. at Heidelberg, Aug. 20, 1867. He was educated at Breslau, the headquarters of the opposition to Napoleon; but he nevertheless began his theological studies in 1817 at Heidelberg, "the Prussian temper being repugnant to him." In 1819 he went to Berlin, but neither Schleiermacher nor Neander made any great impression on him. By Baron von Kottwitz he was introduced to the Berlin circle of pietists; and that influence continued predominant with him, even during his stay at Wittenberg (1820-22), where he finished his studies. He was also intimately associated with Tholuck. In 1823 he was appointed chaplain to the Prussian embassy in Rome. There he became intimate with Chevalier de Bunsen, and the somewhat narrow bounds of his pietism began to give way to the free development of his own speculative genius. In 1828 he returned to Wittenberg as director of the theological seminary. He lectured chiefly on church history, and his lectures have been published by Weingarten (Wittenberg, 1875-76, 2 vols.); but he was thirty-eight years old when he published his first independent work, a commentary on Rom. v. 12-21 (Wittenberg, 1837), a masterpiece of acute and penetrating exegesis. In 1839 he was made professor of theology at Heidelberg; and there he spent the rest of his life, with the exception of a short period (1849-54), during which he lectured at Bonn. At Heidelberg he lived in a quiet and almost retired fashion; though he took an active, and at times even a decisive, part in the development of the somewhat entangled church affairs of Baden, and though he exercised a profound and wide-spreading influence, both as professor and as author. Personally he was distinguished by purity, simplicity, and modesty, and by the completeness and perfect harmony of his character: no element, moral, intellectual, or æsthetical, was lacking; and none was unduly developed. His authorship bears the same stamp. No Christian idea, no phase of Christian life, is forgotten in the theological system he elaborated; and none is made a party question. His two principal works are, Anfänge der christlichen Kirche und ihrer Verfassung (1837), and Theologische Ethik (1845-48, 3 vols., 2d ed., thoroughly revised, 1867-72, in 5 vols.). They supplement one another. The first is based on the idea that the Church is destined to be wholly absorbed by the State as soon as it has reached its merely pedagogical goal, — to make religion penetrate into every fibre of human life; the second, on the idea that religion and morals are absolutely identical, so that no Christian dogma is fully realized until it finds its way out in human action, and no act of man is really moral, unless illuminated from within by the light of the Christian dogma. The development of these ideas is often very bold, and sometimes a little singular; but through the whole wafts the spirit of true Christian humility and love. The following noble confession of his humble belief is worth quoting: "The ground of all my thinking, I can truly say, is the simple faith of Christ, not yet a dogma, much less a theology, which for eighteen hundred years has overcome the world. It is my highest joy to oppose constantly and determinedly every other pretended knowledge which asserts itself against this faith. I know no other firm ground on which I could anchor my whole being, and particularly my speculations, except that historical phenomenon, Jesus Christ. He is to me the unimpeachable Holy of Holies of Humanity, the highest Being known to man, and a sun-rising in history whence has come the light by which we see the world" (1st ed. Ethik, pref., p. xvi.). His Ethik is the greatest work of German speculative theology next to Schleiermacher's Der Christliche Glaube. Next in importance is his Zur Dogmatik, 1863, and his lectures on Dogmatik, imperfectly edited from his manuscripts by Schenkel, Heidelberg, 1870, 2 vols. Rothe also published some sermons and minor treatises. His Sermons for the Christian Year appeared in an English translation, Edinburgh, 1877. His life was written by Nippold, Wittenb., 1873, 75, 2 vols.

ROUMANIA comprises 4,598,219 inhabitants belonging to the Greek Church, 115,420 to the Church of Rome, 8,803 to the Armenian Church, and 7,790 to the Evangelical Church, also 401,051 Jews, and 25,033 Mohammedans. The Greek Church is the State Church, organized on strictly hierarchical principles. The higher clergy, from the archbishops of Bucharest and Jassy to the protopopes, are paid by the State. The lower clergy — the popes, or priests — are paid by the congregations, or support themselves by agriculture. They are educated in eight State seminaries; but nothing more is demanded from them than reading the formularies, and performing the ceremonies. Evangelical congregations have been formed in Jassy, Bucharest, Galatz, etc., in connection with, and under the protection of, the Prussian State Church. J. SAMUELSON: Roumania, Past and Present, London, 1882. G. DÖRSCHLAG.

ROUS, Francis, b. at Halton, Cornwall, 1579; d. 1658; was educated at Oxford; member of Parliament during the reign of Charles I., and provost of Eton, 1643. He published various theological and other works, which were collected in a folio volume, 1657. His Psalms translated into English Metre were recommended by the House of Commons to the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, Nov. 20, 1643, and published 1646. As revised by its appointment, then in Scotland by J. Adamson, T. Crawford, T. Row, and J. Nevey, it was "allowed by the authority of the General Assembly of the Kirk of Scotland, and appointed to be sung in congregations and families" (1649), and has ever since been so used. It is a curious fact, that what was for a century the entire, and is still the main, metrical provision of the Scottish Church, was made mainly by one whose whole life was spent in Southern England. In the Reformed and United Presbyterian communions it is even now regarded as the only legitimate vehicle for God's praise in song; the argument being that the Book of Psalms is "a complete manual of praise," and has alone "the seal of divine appointment;" that there is "no warrant for making or using any other hymns in the worship of God;" and that this version is "more plain, smooth, and agreeable to the text than any heretofore." (See The True Psalmody, Philadelphia, 1858, reprinted at Belfast, 1861-67.) Critics have usually regarded it as beneath contempt; and readers for whom it has no charm of association find it, with rare exceptions (eminently Ps. xxiii.), rough, dry, tasteless, and profitless to the last degree. Yet Rufus Choate said, "An uncommon pith and gnarled vigor of sentiment lie in that old version: I prefer it to Watts's." And Sir Walter Scott found it, "though homely, plain, forcible, and intelligible, and very often possessing a rude sort of majesty, which perhaps would be ill exchanged for mere elegance." F. M. BIRD.

ROUSSEAU, Jean Jacques, b. at Geneva, June 28, 1712; d. at Ermenonville, near Paris, June 3, 1778. He grew up in an unhappy home. His mother died at his birth. His father, a watchmaker by trade, was a fool; and the son passed his time in idleness, reading romances. But there were powers in him which early showed themselves. When nine years old, the reading of Plutarch filled his soul with enthusiasm. Apprenticed to an engraver on copper, he was ill treated, and found no better consolation than idle day-dreams in the woods. At last he ran away. He sought refuge with a Roman-Catholic priest in Confignon, in the neighborhood of Geneva; and the priest brought him to Madame de Warens at Annecy, a recent convert to Romanism, and a lady of disgusting immorality covered over with a thin film of external respectability. By them he was placed in a monastery in Turin, where he was converted from Calvinism to Romanism, and then let loose. Sixteen years old, he became valet in one house, where he stole, and then in another, whence he was dismissed for laziness. He returned to Madame de Warens, and was placed in a seminary, where he learned some music, and then for many years he was cast about in a rather adventurous manner, chiefly living as the lover of Madame de Warens. But at the same time he studied mathematics, Latin, music, etc. He read Locke, Leibnitz, Malebranche, Descartes, etc.; and when in his twenty-ninth year, in 1741, he found himself superseded by somebody else in the service of Madame de Warens, and went to Paris, he was not altogether unprepared for a literary career.

In Paris he formed a connection with Thérèse Levasseur, a bar-maid from Orléans, a woman who never could learn the names of the months, nor distinguish between the common coins. He afterwards, near the close of his life, made her his wife; but the five children she had borne to him he carried to the foundling-hospital. He made his living by copying music,—he also wrote two operas (Les Muses galantes, 1742, and Le devin de village, 1752) which were successfully brought on the stage, and some letters on French music, which, though they gave much offence, have some critical value,—and he continued the business even after he had become a famous author. He did so as a speculation, and the speculation succeeded. Everybody wanted to see him, and to have some music copied by him; and high persons did not fail to leave some golden present in the hands of Madame Levasseur. In 1750 he published his first essay, Le progrès des sciences et des arts, a-t-il contribué à corrompre ou à épurer les mœurs, by which he won the prize of the academy of Dijon. Concerning the principles, the fundamental relation between nature and civilization, he was in utter confusion; but the passion with which he threw himself on the side of nature, the vigor of his argumentation, the keenness of his observations, and the inexhaustible wealth of his eloquence, made his book irresistible, and the more so because it struck a latent but powerful current of sympathy in the public. For a century, people's knowledge of nature had been increasing almost day by day; for a century the artificiality of society had been growing almost beyond endurance: hence the success of Defoe's Robinson Crusoe, of Thomson's The Seasons, of Gessner's Idyllen, etc.; and hence the success of Rousseau. In 1753 followed his Discours sur l'origine et les fondemens de l'inégalité parmi les hommes, which set another shrill string vibrating,—the difference between rich and poor; and shortly after he returned to Geneva, re-entered the Reformed Church, and recovered his lost citizenship.

In 1760 appeared La nouvelle Heloise, and in 1762, Le contrat social, and Emile,—the three principal works of Rousseau. In the history of fiction La nouvelle Heloise denotes a turning-point. It is the dawn of the romantic school: it inaugurates a new kind of characters, of which the unspoiled child of nature, "the beautiful soul" Julie, is the chief type. If Le contrat social and Emile, which followed rapidly one upon the other, are put in relation to each other, and considered under one view, they form an open self-contradiction. In Emile, the State, the Church, every institution the history of the race has developed, is sacrificed in order to produce the perfect man such as nature meant him to be: in Le contrat social, every element of true humanity, even religious freedom, is sacrificed in order to produce the perfect citizen such as the State demands him. But each by itself exercised a tremendous influence. Le contrat social, with its false premise, that the State rests upon a contract between the ruler and the ruled, became one of the watch-words of the French Revolution, and made all the thrones of Europe tremble. Still deeper and more immediate was the effect of Emile, ou de l'Éducation. The education it advocates culminates in deism. Of a divine revelation, of Christianity, the author knows nothing; but the opposition which he offers to the surrounding atheism and materialism is vigorous; the conviction with which he preaches the three great fundamental truths—the existence of God, the freedom of the will, and the immortality of the soul—is impressive; and the system of education which he places over against the training in use, with its dead scholasticism and merely mechanical methods, denotes a decisive progress. The book was burned, however, both in Paris and Geneva.

As his genius developed, his character broke down. The sensitiveness which formed part of Rousseau's nature grew into a disease, and the vanity and suspicion which necessarily resulted from the unprincipled life he led made it at last impossible for him to converse in a free and noble way with his fellowmen. He was seized by melancholy and misanthropy. He fancied that he was the victim of a widespread conspiracy. He left Geneva in 1756, driven away by Voltaire, who had settled at Ferney, and who hated him cordially. He went back to Paris, and lived for six years in the solitudes of Montmorency. But in 1762 the Parliament of Paris condemned Emile as a "godless" book, and an order of arrest was issued against the author. Rousseau fled, he did not know exactly whither. On an invitation from Hume, he went to England; but he soon fancied he had found out that Hume was one of his worst enemies. In 1767 he returned to Paris, not sane any more. He died very suddenly, suspected of having taken poison. But, in spite of the mental disturbances from which he suffered, he wrote in the last years of his life his Confessions,—one of his most brilliant achievements. It involuntarily reminds the reader of Augustine's Confessiones, though there is one very striking difference. Rousseau is as candid as Augustine in acknowledging his faults, and confessing his shortcomings; he does not spare himself; he goes into the most disgusting details: but his candor does not make the same impression of truth and uprightness that Augustine's does. Somehow his confessions of faults and crimes always end in a kind of self-glorification. To the last years of his life belongs also a treatise on the origin of religion, which was found in 1858. When compared with the Profession de Foi du Vicaire Saoyard, in Emile, it shows a decided approach towards Christianity.

LIT. — The editions of Rousseau's works are very numerous. The most noticeable are those of Geneva, 1782-90, 17 vols. quarto, or 35 vols. octavo, and Paris, 1793-1800, 18 vols. quarto. Interesting surveys of his character, life, and influence, are found in the works of VILLEMAM, VINET, HETTNER, DEMOGÉOT, and others. His life was written by V. D. MÜSSET-PATHAY, Paris, 1825, 2 vols., [and by JOHN MORLEY, London, 1873, 2 vols. See also ST. MARC-GIRARDIN: J. J. Rousseau, sa vie et ses ouvrages, Paris, 1875, 2 vols.; C. ROGEAUD: *J. J. ROUSSEL, Gérard (Gerardus Rufus), the confessor of Marguerite of Navarre; was b. at Vaquezie, near Amiens, and joined, while studying theology in Paris, that circle of young reformers which formed around Lefèvre d'Étaples. When the persecution began in 1521, he fled to Meaux, where he found refuge with Bishop Briçonnet. Soon, however, he was driven away from Meaux too; and he then staid for some time in Strassburg, in the house of Capito. In 1526 he was allowed to return to France, and was made confessor to the Queen of Navarre, who in 1530 made him abbot of Clairac, and in 1536 bishop of Orléon. He belonged to the kind of reformers who tried to find a middle course between the church of the Pope and the church of Calvin. He continued to work for the Reformation, but without separating from the Church of Rome. He used the French language in the mass he administered the Lord's Supper under both species, and he wrote for his clergy an exposition of the Apostles' Creed, the Decalogue, and the Lord's Prayer, in which he adopted all the essential ideas of the Reformation. The exposition was condemned by the Sorbonne as heretic in 1550; but Roussel died before the verdict was formally issued. See, further, C. SCHMIDT: Gérard Roussel, Strassburg, 1815. C. SCHMIDT.

ROUTH, Martin Joseph, D.D., Church of England; b. at South Elmham, Suffolk, Sept. 15, 1755; d. at Oxford, Dec. 22, 1854. He was elected fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, July, 1776, and president, April 11, 1791. He published the valuable Reliquiæ sacre (fragments of the lost Christian authors of the second and third centuries, one of the most important and useful works upon patristic literature, revealing the finest English scholarship), Oxford, 1811-18, 4 vols., 2d ed., 1846, supplementary vol., 1848, and Scriptorum ecclesiasticorum opuscula, 1832, 2 vols., 3d ed., 1858; and edited Burnet's History of his Own Time, 1823, 6 vols.

ROW, Thomas, minister at Hadleigh, Suffolk, is the most voluminous English hymnist after C. Wesley. His two volumes, published in 1817 and 1822, contain no less than 1,072 effusions, notable only for their number. F. M. BIRD.

ROWE, Mrs. Elizabeth, born Singer, a poetess highly esteemed in her day; was b. at Ilchester, 1674, and d. 1737. She was a friend of Bishop Ken, and sought in marriage by Dr. Watts. Her works, including some ornate hymns formerly in occasional use, appeared 1739, in 2 vols. F. M. BIRD.

ROWLANDS, Daniel, a powerful Welsh preacher; was b. at Pant-y-beudy, near Llangeitho, Wales, about 1713; d. at Llangeitho, Oct. 16, 1790. Of his youth and early manhood nothing is known, except that he studied at the grammar-school of Hereford. Ordained at London, 1733, whither he travelled on foot, he became curate to his brother at Llangeitho, holding that position till his brother's death, 1760. The Bishop of St. Davids refused to induct him into the office of rector, but inducted his son in his stead. In 1763 the bishop revoked his licensure on account of his "irregularities." Thus was lost to the Church of England one of the most powerful preachers of the century. Lady Huntingdon, a good judge, spoke of him as having no superior in the pulpit, except Whitefield; and Bishop Ryle calls him "one of the spiritual giants of the last century." He preached to immense audiences in the church and in the fields. Once in his history a revival began with his reading of the Litany of the Church of England. At the words, "By thine agony and bloody sweat, good Lord, deliver us," the congregation began to weep loudly. Eight of Rowland's Sermons were translated into English in 1774. See the Biographies by JOHN OWEN (London, 1840) and E. MORGAN; and RYLE: Christian Leaders of the Last Century, London, 1869.

ROYAARDS, Hermann Jan, b. at Utrecht, Oct. 3, 1791; d. there Jan. 2, 1854. He studied theology in his native city, and was appointed professor in 1823. He devoted himself chiefly to church history and canon law; and his works, Geschiedenis van het Christendom in Nederland (Utrecht, 1819-53, 2 vols.) and Hedendaagsch kerkrecht in Nederland (Utrecht, 1831-37, 2 vols.), exercised considerable influence on the study of those departments. J. J. VAN OOSTERZEE.

RUBRICS (Latin rubrica, from rubra, "red," because they were originally written in red ink) are in the ecclesiastical sense the directions in service-books which show how the various parts of the Liturgy should be performed. It is no longer customary to print or write them in red ink, but such directions are distinguished by different type from the body of the text. The word was borrowed by the church from the law, in which it was applied to the titles or headings of chapters in certain law-books.

RUCHAT, Abraham, b. at Grandcour in the canton of Vaud, Sept. 15, 1678; d. at Lausanne, Sept. 29, 1750. He studied at Bern, Berlin, and Leyden, and was appointed professor of belles-lettres in 1721, and of theology in 1733, at Lausanne. His fame rests upon his excellent Abbrégé de l'histoire ecclésiastique du Pays-de-Vaud (1707) and Histoire de la réform. de la Suisse (1727-28, 6 vols.). The seventh volume was not printed until a hundred years later, in the edition by Vulliemin, 1835, which contains Ruchat's biography and a complete list of his writings. HAGENBACH.

RÜCKERT, Leopold Immanuel, b. at Grosshennersdorf, near Herrnhut, in Upper Lusatia, 1797; d. at Jena, April 9, 1871. He was, like Schleiermacher, educated by the Moravians in the school of Niesky, and studied theology and philology at Leipzig. In 1825 he was appointed teacher at the gymnasium of Zittau, and in 1844 professor of theology at Jena. From early youth the great goal of his life was to become a university teacher; and his first book, Der akademische Lehrer (Leipzig, 1824), followed in 1829 by his Offene Mittheilungen an Studierende, is a representation of his ideas of university-teaching. But he had to fight hard, and to achieve a considerable literary fame, before he reached his goal. In 1825 he published his Christliche Philosophie; in 1831, his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, 2d ed., 1839, in 2 vols.; and then his commentaries on Galatians (1833), Ephesians (1834), and Corinthians (1836, 1837, 2 vols.), all characterized by a certain naïve boldness, but distinguished by scholarship and piety. As a professor at Jena, he published his second great systematic work, Theologie (Leipzig, 1851, 2 vols.), a peculiar combination of dogmatics and ethics, also Das Abendmahl (Leipzig, 1856), Der Rationalismus (1859), and several minor treatises and devotional tracts.

G. FRANK.

RUDELBACH, Andreas Gottlob, b. in Copenhagen, Sept. 29, 1792; d. at Slagelse, in the Danish Island of Sealand, March 3, 1862. He studied theology at the university of his native city, and was in 1829 appointed superintendent at Glauchau-in-Saxony; which position he resigned in 1845. From 1846 to 1848 he lectured in the university of Copenhagen, and in 1848 he was appointed pastor at Slagelse. His literary activity was chiefly in German. Besides several collections of sermons and devotional tracts, he published Hieronymus Sædonarola, Hamburg, 1835; Reformation, Lutherthum, und Union (his principal work), Leipzig, 1839; Einführung in die Augsburgische Konfession, Leipzig, 1841; Über die Bedeutung des apostolischen Symbolums, Leipzig, 1844. Together with Guericke he founded in 1839 the Zeitschrift für lutherische Theologie und Kirche, which he continued to edit till his death. He was one of the most prominent champions of strict Lutheranism against the Prussian union of the two confessions. He also left an unfinished autobiography.

RÜDINGER (RÜDIGER), Esrom, b. at Bamberg, May 19, 1523; d. at Nuremberg, Dec. 2, 1591. He studied at Leipzig, and was appointed rector of the gymnasium of Zwickau in 1549, and professor at Wittenberg in 1557. But in 1574 he was compelled to leave Wittenberg; it having become known that he rejected the bodily presence of Christ in the Lord's Supper, and otherwise deviated from Lutheran orthodoxy. He fled to Berlin, and finally settled at Nuremberg, where his heterodoxy seems to have given no offence. He was a prolific writer. His most interesting works are Libri psalmsorum paraphrasis Latina, De origine ubiquitatis, etc.

HERZOG.

RUET, Francisco de Paula, b. in Barcelona, Oct. 28, 1826; d. in Madrid, Nov. 18, 1878; one of the most prominent evangelical missionaries in Spain in the present century. As a young man he went on the stage, and was a singer at Turin, where he was converted by a sermon of Luigi de Sanctis, and entered the Church of the Waldenses. In 1855 he returned to Spain, and began to preach in Barcelona. Repeatedly thrown into prison, he escaped by the aid of the military authority; but finally he was summoned before the episcopal court, convicted of heresy, and condemned to death at the stake, which punishment was commuted into exile for life. He went to Gibraltar, and formed an evangelical congregation there. Afterwards he preached, also, with great success, to his countrymen in Algeria; and after the revolution of 1868 he was able to open a chapel in Madrid, and celebrate evangelical service in the very capital.

FRITZ FLIEDNER.

RUFINUS, Tyrranius (Turranus, Toranus), b. at Aquileja; entered, while still a young man, a monastery in his native city, where he became acquainted with Jerome, and received baptism in 370 or 371. In the following year he went to Egypt, where he lived for six years, and visited the most famous hermits of the Nitrian mountains and the deserts. In 378 or 379 he went to Jerusalem, and built his cell on the Mount of Olives. Though leading a life of severe asceticism, he was a man of means, and entertained friendly relations both with Melania, who had founded a monastery in Jerusalem, and Jerome, who lived at Bethlehem. The Origenistic controversy, however, brought him into conflict with Jerome. They were reconciled; but when Rufinus, after his return to Rome in 397, began to translate the works of Origen into Latin, the estrangement was renewed. The latter part of his life Rufinus spent in his native city. He died in Sicily in 410, flying before the hordes of Alaric.

His principal importance Rufinus has as interpreter of Greek theology. He translated many of Origen's exegetical works, and we owe to him our knowledge of the important work, De principiis. He also translated the church history of Eusebius (leaving out the tenth book, and adding two books of his own, thus carrying the narrative down to the death of Theodosius the Great), the Recognitiones Clementis, the Instituta Monachorum of Basil, the Sententie of Sixtus, an unknown Pagan philosopher, whom he mistook for the Roman bishop and martyr, Sixtus (Xystus). Whether he wrote the famous Hist. Monachorum sive de vitis patrum, or whether he simply translated it from a Greek original, is doubtful: the latter, however, seems the more probable. Finally, he wrote an Expositio Symboli Apostolici, of historical rather than doctrinal interest, and two books, De benedictionibus duodecim patriarcharum. Collected editions of his works have been given out by De la Barre (Paris, 1580), Vallarsi (Verona, 1775), and Migne: Patr. Lat., xxi.

W. MÖLLER.

RUINART, Thierry, b. at Rheims, June 10, 1657; d. in the monastery of Hautvillers, in the vicinity of his native city, Sept. 27, 1709. In 1674 he entered the Congregation of St. Maur, and in 1682 he settled at St. Germain-des-Prés as the pupil, and soon as the friend and co-worker, of Mabillon. His first great work was the Acta primorum Martyrum, Paris, 1689 (2d ed., Amsterdam, 1713; 3d, with his biography, Verona, 1731); then followed his Historia persecutionis Vandalicæ (Paris, 1694, of great importance for the history of the African Church), and his excellent edition of the works of Gregory of Tours. Together with Mabillon, he edited the eighth and ninth volumes of the Act.

Sanct. Ord. S. Bened. Among his other writings are Ecclesia Parisiensis vindicata, 1706, in defence of Mabillon's De re diplomatica; Abrégé de la vie de D. Jean Mabillon, 1709; and several treatises in the Ouvrages posthumes de Mabillon et Ruinart, Paris, 1721.

G. LAUBMANN.

RULE OF FAITH. See REGULA FIDEI.

RULMAN MERSWIN, b. at Strassburg, 1307; d. in the Island Der grüne Wört, July 18, 1382. He was a wealthy merchant and banker, when in 1347 he gave up business, joined the Friends of God, and led a life of severe asceticism, under the guidance of Tauler. In 1366 he acquired the Island of Der grüne Wört, in the Ill, near Strassburg, and retired thither. His principal writings are Das Bannerbüchlein, edited by Jundt, 1879, and Von den 9 Felsen, edited by Schmidt, 1859. See C. SCHMIDT: Rulman Merswin, in Revue d'Alsace, 1886; and JUNDT: Les amis de Dieu, Paris, 1879.

PREGER.

RUPERT, St., the apostle of Bavaria: was a descendant of the Merovingian house, and bishop of Worms, when by Duke Theodo II. he was invited to Bavaria, which at that time was only nominally a Christian country. He came, and worked with great success, building many churches, and founding many ecclesiastical institutions, among which was Salzburg, where he died in 696. His life is described in Gesta S. Hrodberti, ed. by F. M. Mayer, in Archiv für österreich. Geschichte, vol. 63. See also Acta Sanctorum Boll. (March 3, p. 702), and FRIEDRICH: Das wahre Zeitalter des hl. R., 1866.

HAUCK.

RUPERT OF DEUTZ, one of the most prolific theological writers of the twelfth century; a contemporary of St. Bernhard, and, like him, a mystic. The date and place of his birth are unknown; but he was educated in the monastery of St. Laurentius at Liège, and ordained a priest there in 1101 or 1102. In 1113 he removed to the monastery of Siegburg, in the diocese of Cologne; and in 1120 he was elected abbot of Deutz, where he died, March 4, 1135. His first writings—De divinis officiis, and a commentary on Job, merely an extract from the Moralia in Jobum by Gregory the Great—did not find much favor. The doctores et magistri felt indignant that a mere monk, who had not sat at the feet of any great teacher, should undertake to write books. It came to an actual conflict between Rupert and the pupils of William of Chalons and Anselm of Laon. They accused him of holding heretical views concerning the relation between the omnipotence of God and the existence of evil; but he defended himself valiantly in his De voluntate Dei (1113) and De omnipotentia Dei (1117); and he was protected both by his abbots and by Archbishop Friedrich of Cologne. His chief works, however, are not polemical, but exegetical,—Tractatus in Evangelium Johannis, Commentarius de operibus sanctæ Trinitatis (his principal work, in forty-two books), Commentaries on the Revelation, Canticles, the minor prophets, etc. In Deutz he wrote De regula Sancti Benedicti, Annulus, with a view to the conversion of the Jews; Liber aureus de incendio Tuitiensi, a description of a frightful conflagration which destroyed the larger part of Deutz, Sept. 1, 1128, etc. The first collected edition of his works is that by Cochläus, Cologne, 1526-28, 2 vols. folio: the last appeared in Venice, 1751, 4 vols. folio.

MANGOLD.

RUSSELL, Charles William, D.D., Roman-Catholic theologian, and one of the papal domestic chaplains; b. at Killough, County Down, Ireland 1802; d. at Maynooth, Feb. 26, 1880. He was educated at Maynooth, where he became professor of humanity in 1825, in 1845 professor of ecclesiastical history, and in 1857 president. Although personally unknown to the leaders of the Oxford movement, he was in correspondence with them; and Dr. Newman says that Dr. Russell had more to do with his conversion to Romanism than anybody else. Dr. Russell joined Wiseman in editing the Dublin Review. He was a member of the Historical Manuscripts Commission (1869), and published a translation of Leibnitz's System of Theology (London, 1850), and Life of Cardinal Mezzofanti (1858, new ed., 1863). See COOPER: New Biographical Dictionary (Supplement, 1883).

RUSSIA. The vast empire of Russia is about equal in territorial extent to the British Empire, and twice as large as any other country in the world. In 1878 it had an estimated area of 8,500,000 square miles, and a population of 87,000,000 souls. The territory and population in Asia are constantly increasing. Its government is an autocracy, there being no constitutional limits to the power of the Czar.

The prevailing religion of the Russian Empire is the Orthodox Oriental, or Greek Church. More than three-fourths of the entire population belong to it, and it is established by law in the following terms: "The ruling faith in the Russian Empire is the Christian Orthodox Eastern Catholic declaration of belief. Religious liberty is not only assured to Christians of other denominations, but also to Jews, Mohammedans, and Pagans; so that all people living in Russia may worship God according to the laws and faith of their ancestors." This religious liberty, however, is qualified by the following conditions. No Christian can change his religion for any other than the Russian Church; nor can a non-Christian embrace any other form of Christianity; and any apostasy from the State Church is punished by severe penalties, such as banishment from the empire.

Next to the Christian inhabitants of Russia, the Mohammedans are the most numerous, and their numbers are constantly increasing by territorial extension in Central Asia. They number at present no less than 7,500,000, of whom 2,361,000 are in European Russia, 3,000,000 in Central Asia, 2,000,000 in the Caucasus, 61,000 in Siberia, and 126 in Poland. Their clergy consists of about 20,000 muftis, mollahs, and teachers. The number of Russian Jews in 1878 was stated to be 1,941,378; in Poland, 815,433; in Caucasia, 22,732; in Siberia, 11,941; in Central Asia, 3,396; but this number has been since decreased by emigration to America. The number of pagans in European Russia is 258,125; in Siberia, 286,016; in Central Asia, 14,470; in Caucasia, 4,683; and in Poland, 245.

Second in point of numbers to the Established Church of the empire, which includes within its pale between 60,000,000 and 70,000,000 souls come Christians who adhere to the Roman-Catholic Church. Prior to the partition of Poland, this church had no settled organization in the Russian Empire; but since 1818 there has been an ecclesiastical organization, confirmed by a papal bull

Out of a total population of 5,210,000 in Russian Poland, no less than 4,597,000 are Roman Catholics, while only 31,135 are Orthodox Russians. Outside of Poland, Russia in Europe had (in 1878) a Roman-Catholic population of 2,898,000; in Caucasus, 25,916; in Siberia, 21,316; in Central Asia, 1,316. The Polish provinces had formerly a large population belonging to the United Greek Church, but nearly all of these have now been reconciled to the Russian Church. The United Armenians number about 33,000.

As the acquisition of Poland added a large Roman-Catholic population to Russia, so the annexation of the Baltic provinces and Finland gave many Lutherans to the empire of the Czar. They enjoy entire liberty of ecclesiastical government, and worship under the superintendence of the minister of the interior, but are not allowed to interfere in any way with the national church. The total number of Lutherans is 2,400,000 in Russia proper, 300,000 in Poland, and 12,000 in Asia.

The Reformed Church numbers about 200,000, one-half of whom reside in Lithuania. The Moravians have about 250 chapels, and a membership of 60,000. In 1876 there were about 15,000 Mennonites, but many have since emigrated to the United States. There are also some German Baptist missions.

The catholics of Etchmiadzin, the head of the ancient Gregorian-Armenian Church, has been since 1828 a subject of Russia. The Armenian Church and its clergy enjoy all the privileges conceded to foreign creeds. The subjects of the catholics number 38,720 in European Russia, 595,310 in Caucasus, 15 in Siberia, and 1 in Central Asia.

The condition of the State Church demands our careful consideration. Its origin dates back to the tenth century of the Christian era. According to an ancient tradition, the gospel was first preached in Scythia by Andrew the apostle; but no record has been left by which this tradition can be verified. But in the year 988 the Grand Duke Wladimir, with all his court and many of the Russian people, received baptism in the river Dnieper. The administration of the newly established church was for a long time in the hands of the Patriarch of Constantinople; but after the conquest of that city by the Turks, in 1453, the Grand Duke Theodore applied to the Patriarch of Constantinople for the establishment of a patriarchal see in Moscow. The request was granted, and the patriarchate of Moscow founded in 1588. The most eminent of these Russian patriarchs was Nikon (1652-57), who introduced many reforms into the service-books. But these reforms encountered much opposition, and led to the separation of sects, called Staroveri, or "Old Believers," which continue to exist to the present day. (See RUSSIAN SECTS).

Peter the Great, about the year 1700, effected other changes, the most important of which was the abolition of the patriarchate of Moscow, and the substitution for it of what is called the Holy Governing Synod as the supreme authority, subject only to the will of the Czar. This body consists of twelve members.

The Russian Church is divided into fifty-eight eparchies, or dioceses, each of which is under a bishop. The bishops are of three classes. Those of the first class are called metropolitans, of whom there are but three in Russia, viz., Kiev, Moscow, and Petersburg. The second class are called archbishops, and the third are simply bishops. Besides these, there are some vicars, or suffragan bishops, who are assistants. The inferior clergy are divided into the white or secular priests, and into the black clergy, or monks. The number of the secular clergy, including all grades, is estimated at nearly 100,000. In 1878 the number of monks was 10,512, and of nuns, 14,574 in 147 nunneries.

The creed of the Russian Church is that of the œcumenical Council of Nicæa (325), with the additions made to it by the First Council of Constantinople (381). In common with all branches of the Greek Church, the Russians reject the Filioque, and teach that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father alone, and not from the Father and the Son. They also receive as binding on the consciences all the decrees of seven œcumenical councils (from 325 to 787). This erects a barrier of separation between the Russian Church on the one side, and Protestants on the other.

The Russians acknowledge seven sacraments (or mysteries, as they term them); viz., baptism, chrism, the eucharist, confession, orders, matrimony, and the unction of the sick. As soon as a child is born, the clergyman is sent for to say a prayer over the mother, and give a name to the child; which is usually (but not always) the name of the saint for the day of its birth or baptism. The sacrament of baptism is usually administered in the house; and the child is baptized by trine immersion, dipping it three times into the font. The Russian Church, however, acknowledges the validity of baptism by pouring water, in which respect it differs from the church in Greece. Forty days after the birth of the child, it is brought to the church with its mother, for the purification of the mother, and reception of the child. The sacrament of the holy chrism (or confirmation, as it is called in the West) is administered by priests, with fragrant oils consecrated by the bishops. It is usually administered soon after the baptism, sometimes immediately after. The priest anoints the child or adult convert with the oil above referred to, saying at the same time the words of the appointed service for chrism.

The Holy Eucharist is called in the Oriental Church the Divine Liturgy. Leavened bread is used, and wine mingled with water; and communion is given in both kinds. The priest receives each element separately; but the other communicants receive the consecrated bread dipped in the wine, administered with a golden spoon. The adult communicants receive the sacraments standing, but even young children and infants are communicated. It is customary in Russia to receive the communion once a year, — in the season of Lent, immediately before Easter.

Auricular confession and absolution are administered, as in the Roman-Catholic Church; but the confessions are somewhat more publicly made in the church, — in the sight, but not the hearing, of others; and the penitents are questioned more generally on the Ten Commandments.

The Russian Church recognizes three orders in the clergy as of divine appointment, viz., bishops, priests, and deacons; but it has other ecclesiastical grades above and below these, as metropolitans, archbishops, proto-presbyters, archimandrites, proto-deacons, sub-deacons, psalmists, singers, and sextons. Ordinations are administered by bishops only.

Matrimony is attended by great festivity, and some curious and interesting ceremonies, the most important of which is the coronation of the newly wedded pair. During the service, two crowns, which are often made of silver or of gold, are held over the heads of the bridegroom and the bride, by friends appointed for that purpose. The crown being a symbol of triumph and joy, this custom is intended to signify the triumph of Christian virtue, and joy at the entrance of a new life. Bishops and monks are forbidden to marry; and marriage is allowed but once to secular priests and deacons before their ordination. The laity are allowed, when deprived by death of their partners, to marry thrice; but fourth marriages are strictly forbidden. It must be added that divorces are not infrequent in Russia.

The unction of the sick differs from the extreme unction of the Roman Catholics in that it is not administered to a person at the point of death, but to a sick person, with prayers for his recovery. It is a very long service, and in its full form is administered by seven priests; but it can be administered by a single one.

The services connected with the celebration of the Easter festival, and with the burial of the dead, are quite interesting and peculiar.

Peter the Great was the first to establish schools in the capitals of the eparchies, where boys, and especially the sons of priests, could be educated for the priesthood. These schools for more than a century have been supported and controlled by the Holy Governing Synod. The country is divided into four school-districts, — Petersburg, Kiev, Moscow, and Kazan. At the head of each district is a church academy, and each academy has a faculty consisting of a rector, archimandrite (abbot), one hieromonach (monk-priest), two secular priests, and several professors. The metropolitan superintends all, acting under the decrees of the synod. The Petersburg academy is the centre of all, since the decrees of the synod pass through it to all the other academies. Under these chief academies are the eparchial seminaries, with many circuit and parish schools. Pupils first enter the parish school, and remain there two years; then they attend the circuit school, the eparchial seminary, and the academy, remaining at each about three or four years.

The Russian Church derives her theology from the Sacred Scriptures (the reading of which is allowed to the laity), the writings of the Church Fathers before the division between east and west, and of the Oriental Fathers subsequent to that, of whom the most eminent is John of Damascus.

The most celebrated theologians of the Russian Church proper are Peter Mogila, who published the Orthodox Confession in 1643; Adam Zoernikav, who published an important treatise, On the Procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father only, in 1682; Theophanes Procopovich in 1715, who draws largely from Zoernikav; Demetrius of Rostoff (1709), and Stephen Javorsky (about the same date), both of whom are somewhat inclined to Roman-Catholic views; and Tichon of Zadonsk, who is not unfavorable to Protestantism.

The historical and doctrinal works of Mouravieff, the metropolitans Platon and Philaret, the Abbé Guettée, and the arch-priest Basaroff, are also worthy of an attentive perusal.

RUSSIAN SECTS, comprehended under the general name Raskolnik. This word is from the Russian word raskol, "cleft," and means separatist, schismatic, and dissenter. It designates all the dissenters from the Established Church of Russia, i.e., from the Greek-Eastern Church. The Bible was translated from the Greek into the Slavonian in the ninth century by Cyril (d. 869) and Methodius (d. 855), the Slavonian apostles (both canonized: see CYRIL and METHODIUS), and the ritual books somewhat later. Owing to a lack of knowledge on the part of translators and transcribers, the Slavonian church-books were full of mistakes, and needed revision. Again: up to the seventeenth century the parishioners usually elected their priests, and the people had much influence on the church administration. Patriarch Nikon (1652-58), a man of great knowledge and of autocratic tendencies, undertook to revise the ritual books, and to secure the power of appointment of priests and the church administration in general, exclusively to the bishops. Being supported by the Czar, Nikon succeeded in his reforms. But many priests and parishes refused either to accept the revised books, or to submit to the supreme authority of the bishops and patriarch. Thus the great schism, or raskol, took place in the Church of Russia.

Originally the Raskolniks differed from the Established Church rather in rites than in principles. They called themselves "Staroveri," or the "Old Believers," in opposition to the "New Believers," or "Nikonians." They held sacred certain points modified by the revision; namely they used only the unrevised service-books; they crossed themselves with two fingers and not with three; they repeated hallelujah only twice; they used seven and not five altar-breads in the Eucharistic service; they used only an eight-pointed cross; during divine services they turned from left to right, "according to the sun," and not from right to left; they attended only their own churches, and regarded the outsiders as impure; they said Isoos (Jesus) instead of Iisoos; they never shaved their beard, being afraid of spoiling God's image; they never used tobacco, or practised vaccination. In the course of time the Raskolniks have been subdivided into numerous sects, and their religious views have been greatly modified. To-day, while some sects do not differ from the Russian Church in regard to principles, others keep pace with the most advanced sects of the American and European Protestants.

The Raskolniks are divided into two classes; namely, Porovrtzi, or those who have priests (popes), and Bezporovrtzi (without popes), who have no regular and constant priests. Popovrtzi as yet hold those views characteristic of the Old Belief. However, a large number of them have realized that there is no dogmatic difference between them and the New Believers; therefore they treat both the State and the Church of Russia in a friendly spirit. These are known under the name of Edinovertzi (those of one belief, that is, of the same belief). The late Czar, Alexander II., granted them liberty of religious service. Their old churches were opened, and new ones built. The archbishop of the Edinovertzi resides at Moscow. The Popovrtzi recognize the priestly hierarchy: they have priests and bishops of their own. Some of them fanatically denounce both the Czar and the Church, and for that reason are regarded as dangerous, and treated as such; for instance, the Dositheans (the followers of Dosithey).

The Bezpopovrtzi hold that every Christian is a priest, and therefore there is no need of a special priestly order. In support of their view they cite Rev. i. 6: "And [Christ] hath made us kings and priests unto God." However, in their religious meetings they appoint some one from among themselves, one more learned in Holy Scriptures, to act as a spiritual teacher; but such a person has no special authority, and does not need to be ordained. They believe that we are living in the reign of Antichrist: but they explain that under "Antichrist" must be understood the impious spirit of our time; under "wife," the present society; and under "birth," digression from the Christian truth. They believe that the authorities of to-day are the Antichrist's servants, and therefore they consider it a great sin to pray for them. They affirm that the churches are unnecessary to Christians; for St. Paul said, "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" (1 Cor. iii. 16). They have abolished almost the entire ritual of the Greek-Eastern Church, partly by command of the Bible (as they understand it), and partly in accordance with their own idea of the Antichrist's reign.

Among the Bezpopovrtzi, there are sects holding very radical views. Thus some (E. Blokhin) do not recognize the authority of the Bible, but yet believe they are guided simply by "inspiration from above:" they do not adore the holy images, nor keep any religious meetings. Others (M. Herasimoff) say that they do not believe in that Bible which is printed with ink, but in that one which is laid down in their heart and conscience. Among the Bezpopovrtzi the following sects are particularly known:—

The PHILIPPINES (the proselytes of Philipp Pustosviat) observe only two sacraments, — baptism and the Lord's Supper: they refuse to take the oath of allegiance to the Czar, do not pray for the Czar, and decline to enter the military service.

The NIMOLIAKI ("those not praying") are an extreme type of the Bezpopovrtzi. Their creed is reduced to these three points, — the study of the New Testament, spiritual prayer, and a pure life. Cossak Zimin was the founder of this sect. He taught that there are "four ages." From the creation of the world to Moses was spring, or the age of ancestors; from Moses to Christ's birth was summer, or the age of fathers; from Christ's birth to 1666 (when a council of Russian bishops anathematized the Raskolniks) was autumn, or the age of sons; from 1666 down to our time is winter, or the age of the Holy Ghost. "No external rites are needed in our time," they say.

The VOZDYKHANTZI ("the Sighers") hold, that, in the time of the Old Testament, there was the reign of God the Father; in that of the New Testament, the reign of God the Son; with the completion of the seventh thousandth year from the creation of the world began the reign of the Holy Ghost. Now the true believers must serve the Holy Ghost by spiritual prayers and by sighing.

Both the Nemoliaki and the Vozdykhantzi adapt their Bible to their views by explaining it allegorically. Some of them go so far as to affirm that there is no need even of spiritual prayer, for "God knows what we need without our prayers." Evidently these come to pure deism.

The STRANNIKI ("the Travellers") or BEGOONI ("the Runners") do not stay in one place more than a few days. They do not revere the cross, but call it simply a piece of wood. They affirm that all God's promises concerning the church are already fulfilled; that now we are living in "the future age" and in the "new heaven;" that the resurrection of the dead has already taken place, or rather that it takes place each time that one leaves the sinful life, and begins to walk in the ways of truth and piety.

There are many Bezpopovrtzi who object to being called the "Old Believers." "Only Hebrews are old believers," they say; "and we are the Spiritual Christians." To this group belong the Dookhoborzi, the Molokane, the Obschie, the Stundists, the Khlisti, and the Skoptzi.

The DOOKHOBORZI are those denying the existence of spirit, or rather spiritual beings and spiritual life. They hold that there is no personal God, that he is inseparable from the society of pious men. "God is the good man:" that is their maxim. They do not believe in a life after death: therefore they deny the existence both of paradise and hell. They do not recognize the authority of the Bible, but believe they are guided by a "living book," which is traditions of their own. However, those traditions are nothing else but different Bible-passages which sustain their own views. They consider Christ to be only equal to any good man of our day. They often quote, and explain in their own way, this verse: "God is a Spirit: and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and truth" (John iv. 24). "Spirit is in us," they say: "therefore we are gods, and therefore we have to adore living good men."

They reverently bow before each other, be it man, woman, or child. They discard all the rites of the Greek Church. They deny the authority of the Czar on the ground, that, being God's people, they do not belong to this world, and therefore they are not subject to the rule of worldly authorities. They oppose war, evade military service, and do not pray for the Czar.

The MOLOKANEH ("Milk-eaters") call themselves "the truly spiritual Christians." They believe only in the New Testament, but explain it in their own way. They affirm that baptism with water is invalid: purification from sins by pure life and good deeds, that is a true baptism. They object to all external rites, crossing, prayers, temples, etc. They consider themselves free from all state laws, on the ground, that, "where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty" (2 Cor. iii. 17).

The OBSCHE ("Communists") are a branch of the Molokaneh, and differ from them only in holding property in common. In each commune there are twelve elected apostles, who direct works and the distribution of goods.

The sect of STUNDISTS is of recent origin: it became known only in 1860. The Stundists strive to get rid of the authority both of the State and the Church. They hold that everybody is free to understand the Bible in his or her way. So far they have come to these conclusions, — the priestly hierarchy is invalid; there is no sense in adoration of the cross and holy images; of the seven sacraments, only baptism and communion are to be retained.

Of all the sects of the Raskolniks, only Khlisti and Skoptzi are despised by Russian people at large. The KHLISTI ("Self-lashers"), though they do not recognize the church-rites, practise many rites of their own kind. They are ascetics, and the married life is regarded by them as the greatest sin. They wage a constant war against human nature; and for that reason they continually lash themselves, both in private and in religious meetings. They believe that among them sometimes appears the Lord Sabaoth in the person of one of their brothers, and that Christ and the Virgin have appeared among them many times. They blindly obey their prophets and prophetesses, who are guided by their own inspiration. For whole nights they lash themselves, and turn around a sacred basin of water, and in their state of excitement they believe they see Christ or the Holy Ghost.

The SKOPTZI ("Self-mutilators") are an extreme branch of the Khlisti. They act literally according to the words, "If thy right hand causeth thee to stumble," etc. (Matt. v. 30).

The number of the Raskolniks is constantly increasing in spite of all efforts both of the State and the Church to thwart their propaganda. There are about fifteen millions of them all told, or over six per cent of the whole population of Russia. The Bezpopovtzi count nine millions; the Popovtzi, three millions; the Spiritual Christians, two millions; the Khlisti and the Skoptzi, sixty-five thousand: the rest belong to undetermined sects. The Bezpopovtzi increase on account of the Popovtzi, and the Spiritual Christians embrace the most advanced of the Bezpopovtzi.

The Raskolniks in general have been always regarded by the State and the Church authorities as a dangerous element, and were treated with utmost severity. The death-penalty, mutilations, tortures, chains, exile to Siberia, and other punishments, have been freely resorted to against them. In the last century many Raskolniks used to hide themselves in the forests of Siberia; and on being discovered by the officials, they often preferred to burn themselves alive rather than to submit to various penalties at the hands of the Antichrist, as they styled the Czar. According to the Russian law now in force, the Popovtzi are tolerated, and the Bezpopovtzi are deprived of many civil rights; the Khlisti and the Skoptzi are treated as criminals; they are transported either to Siberia or to the Caucasus. Propagation of the views of the Raskolniks is punished by imprisonment for from one to six years (Art. 207, vol. xiv.). The Dookhoborzi, Molokaneh, Khlisti, Skoptzi, and others who do not pray for the Czar, are regarded as very dangerous (Art. 82); and even in Siberia and the Caucasus they are forbidden to live among Orthodox people.

By the Czar's ukase, June 2, 1883, the Raskolniks are granted some civil rights and a certain freedom of religious service. The minister of the interior is empowered, in agreement with the Chief Procurator of the Holy Synod, to give permission to the Raskolniks to open, or to repair, or to renew, or even to build, new chapels or houses of prayer. In giving his permission, the minister shall be guided by local circumstances, and particularly by the character of the teaching of the different sects. The Raskolniks are allowed to perform the religious service according to their own rites in their chapels, and also in private houses. It is forbidden to open their convents, and all religious processions in public are also forbidden. The chapels of the Raskolniks must not have the shape of the Orthodox churches, and must not have bells outside. The propagation of the Raskolnik teaching among the Orthodox is strictly forbidden. The Raskolnik religious teachers have no special rights which are granted to the Orthodox clergymen.

The literature on the Raskolniks is very voluminous. The best works on the subject are as follows: SCHAPOFF: Russian Raskol of the Old Belief; KOSTOMAROFF: series of the articles in The Vestnik Evrope; Metropolitan MAKARY: History of Russian Church, vol. xiii. (Patriarch Nikon); KELSIEFF: Official Investigation of the Raskol; P. RUTH. This book relates an episode among the Israelites in the days of the Judges,—the story of the marriage of Ruth the Moabitess to her kinsman, Boaz, and so, how another heathen ancestor was introduced into the pedigree of David and of Jesus Christ. The grace and beauty of the story are universally praised. By it we get a glimpse into the domestic life of the period. The very simplicity of the book, which constitutes its charm, is also the best proof of its truthfulness. What forger would invent such a tale, in which, to the royal house of David, a foreign and idolatrous ancestor was attributed? Numerous attempts have been made to rob the book of its historical character. It has been considered as written in advocacy of Levirate marriage, so that the cleft between Israel and the Gentiles might be bridged (Bertholdt and Benary): but Boaz was not Mahlon's brother, but only his kinsman; hence his action was purely voluntary. Reuss considers it as invented by a North-Palestinian, after the fall of Ephraim under Assyria, as a political romance, prophesying the re-union of Ephraim to Judah, because Naomi the Ephraimite recognized the child of Ruth, the progenitor of Judah's royal line, as her heir. But there is really no reason for considering it as other than an old, true, but long-time unwritten, traditional history of the Davidic family. At what time in the Judges period the incidents occurred cannot be definitely determined, but at least a hundred years before David (Ruth iv. 18). The book itself, as its Aramaisms and late grammatical forms show, was written many years afterwards, probably not until after the exile. The late date is therefore the reason why the book appears in the Jewish Hagiographa. It is true the LXX. put it with Judges; and Josephus testifies to the Jewish custom of his day, of reckoning these two books as one (Contra Apion, i. 8). But the supposition that Ruth was originally a part of Judges, and, as some say, constituted its third appendix (Berthelau, Auberlen), lacks evidence, and is rendered improbable by the independence of the story. It is complete in itself.

RUTHERFURD, Samuel, a distinguished Scotch divine and Covenanter; was b. about 1600, at Nisbet, Roxburghshire; d. at St. Andrews, March 20, 1661. In 1617 we find him studying at Edinburgh, where he received the degree of M.A. in 1621, and was soon after appointed to the professorship of humanity. He demitted this office in 1625, and after studying theology was settled at Anworth in 1627. He was regarded as an able and impressive preacher. In 1634 he attended the death-bed of Lord Kenmure, and gave an account of the death-bed scene, fifteen years later, in the work, The Last Heavenly Speeches and Glorious Departure of John, Viscount Kenmure. In 1636 he issued Exercitationes de Gratia, a work in defence of the doctrines of grace against the Arminians. It established his reputation on the Continent, and brought him a call to the chair of theology at Utrecht, and one to Hardewyk. On July 27, 1636, he was cited before the High Commission Court to answer for his nonconformity to the Acts of Episcopacy, and his work against the Arminians. Deprived of his living at Anworth, he was banished to Aberdeen. When the Covenant was again triumphant, in 1638, he returned to Anworth, and in 1639 was made professor at St. Andrews. In 1613 he was chosen one of the Scotch commissioners to the Westminster Assembly; and during his four years of service in that capacity wrote The Due Right of Presbytery, Lex Rex, and The Trial and Triumph of Faith. The Lex Rex was burned under the author's windows at St. Andrews in 1660. He was soon afterwards deprived of his offices, and cited to appear before the next Parliament on the charge of high treason, but death prevented him from going. He replied to the citation, referring to his condition, "I am summoned before a higher Judge and judicatory: that first summons I beleave to answer; and ere a few days arrive, I shall be where few kings and great folks come." Among his other works are Covenant of Life (1655), Civil Policy (1657), Life of Grace (1659). Stanley calls him "the true saint of the covenant." Rutherford's letters are particularly interesting and edifying. See A. A. BONAR: Letters of Rev. Samuel Rutherford, with a Sketch of his Life, N.Y., 1851, new edition carefully revised, Lond., 1881; Manna Crumbs . . . being Excerpts from the Letters of Samuel Rutherford, gathered by Rev. W. RUYSBROECK, or RUSBROEK, doctor ecstaticus, the most prominent of the Dutch mystics; b. in the village of Ruysbroeck, between Brussels and Hall, in 1293; was educated in Brussels, but never learned so much Latin that he could write it, though he seems to have been acquainted with the writings of the Areopagite, as also with the earlier German mystics. He was for a long time vicar of the Church of St. Gudula in Brussels, but retired in 1353 to the Augustine monastery Grootendal, in the forest of Soigny, near Brussels, and died there in 1381. His four principal works are Die Zierde der geistlichen Hochheit, Der Spiegel der Seligkeit, Von dem funckelnden Stein, and Samuel: his other writings are only more or less interesting repetitions. They were originally written in Dutch, but soon translated into Latin (Rusbrochii Opera, Cologne, 1552 and oftener), German (by G. Arnold, Offenbach, 1701), and French. There is no collected edition of Ruysbroeck's works; but the above-mentioned four books have been very carefully edited by Arnswaldt, Hanover, 1848. In opposition to Hugo and Richard of St. Victor, but in agreement with the German mystics, the mystic speculation of Ruysbroeck describes a movement from God to man, and then back to God, not always clearing the banks of pantheism. The details are often very acute, subtle, and charming by their beauty and freshness, but often also very obscure and overloaded. ULLMANN: [Reformers before the Reformation]; BÖHRINGER: Die deutschen Mystiker, pp. 462 sqq. C. SCHMIDT.

RYERSON, Adolphus Egerton, D.D., LL.D., Methodist; b. in Charlottetown, Norfolk County, Canada, March 24, 1803; d. in Toronto, Feb. 19, 1882. His father was a native of New Jersey. His parents were in easy circumstances, yet Egerton spent his early years in healthful labor on the farm. He was endowed with a healthy, vigorous constitution, and great intellectual power. His thirst for knowledge was most intense, and his reading was extensive and varied. In early life he connected himself with the Methodist Church; and on Easter Sunday, 1826, he began his work as a preacher in that body. He soon became famous as one of the most eloquent, effective, and promising preachers in the connection. He early began to write for the periodicals of the day; and some of his articles having attracted attention, and provoked discussion, he was chosen editor of the Christian Guardian by the Conference in 1829,—an office which he filled with eminent ability and fearlessness during a period of great interest in Canadian history. In 1833 he was sent by the Conference as a delegate to the Wesleyan body in England, where his rare gifts and persuasive eloquence were at once recognized. He was repeatedly intrusted with similar missions; and so ably and skilfully did he conduct the matters committed to him, that he secured the confidence and approval of the leading men on both sides of the Atlantic. In 1841 he was elected the first president of Victoria University; where for three years, both as principal and professor, he won the confidence and affection of the students, and did much to establish the rising institution. In 1844 he was appointed by the governor-general, Sir Charles Metcalfe, chief superintendent of education for Upper Canada. Into this new arena he entered with a resolute determination to succeed; and he spared no pains, effort, or sacrifice to fit himself thoroughly for the onerous duties to which he had been appointed.

He steadfastly prosecuted his work with a firm, inflexible will, unrelaxing tenacity of purpose, an amazing fertility of expedient, an exhaustless amount of information, a most wonderful skill in adaptation, a matchless ability in unfolding and vindicating his plans, a rare adroitness in meeting and removing difficulties, great moderation in success, and indomitable perseverance under discouragement, calm patience when misapprehended, unflinching courage when opposed, until he achieved the consummation of his wishes,—the establishment of a system of education second to none in its efficiency, and adaptation to the circumstances of the people. He proved to be just the man for the place, and the work he accomplished is his enduring monument.

He was frequently elected secretary of the conference, and in 1874 was its president. His brethren conferred on him every honor at their disposal. In 1841 he received the degree of D.D., and in 1861 that of LL.D. He wrote extensively on all subjects connected with public affairs, specially on questions relating to civil and religious liberty and education. He was an able, vigorous, and successful controversialist. He issued numerous pamphlets, wrote many elaborate reports, and published several works,—a treatise on moral science, Epochs of Canadian Methodism, and in 1880 The History of the United Empire Loyalists, in two large volumes. RYLAND, John, D.D., a distinguished Baptist minister; was b. at Warwick, Jan. 29, 1753; d. at Bristol, May 25, 1825; pastor at Northampton, 1781; pastor at Bristol, and president of the Baptist college there, from 1794 to his death. He published some sermons, and one or two other books. His Hymns and Verses, numbering nearly a hundred, were collected by D. Sedgwick, 1862. Some of them have been extensively used, and at least two retain a place in most of the collections. A Memoir by Dr. Hoby is prefixed to Sedgwick's edition. F. M. BIRD.

SAADIA HA GAON, Ben Joseph, Jewish rabbi; b. at Fayûm, Upper Egypt, 892; d. at Sura, Babylonia, 941 or 942. He was educated by the Karaites, yet he became their vigorous opponent. He is distinguished for his Arabic translation of the Pentateuch, Job, Psalms, Canticles, and other books (each of which he accompanied by brief annotations), his grammatical and lexical works, and, above all, for his treatise in defence of Judaism, Religion and Doctrines, written in Arabic, but now known only by the Hebrew translation of Judah ben-Tibbon, German translations by Fürst (Die jüdischen Religionsphilosophen des Mittelalters, i. Bd., Emunot We-Deot oder Glaubenslehre und Philosophie von Saadia Fajjumi, Leipzig, 1845) and by Ph. Bloch, in Jüdisches Literaturblatt, Magdeburg, 1878. By his translations, made between 915 and 928, he acquired such fame that in the latter year he was called to Sura in Babylon to be gaon (head teacher) of the famous Jewish school there, and held the office until his death, with the exception of four years (933-937), when he was kept from his office, and lived in Bagdad. It was in this period that he wrote his Religion and Doctrines. His position in the history of exegesis is thus indicated by Professor C. A. Briggs: "The Peshat, or literal interpretation, is used in the Targum of Onkelos and the Greek version of Aquila, with reference to the law, but found little expression among the ancient Jews. The Qarites [Karaites] were the first to emphasize it in the eighth century. Before this time there is no trace of Hebrew grammar or Hebrew dictionary. The Qarites threw off the yoke of rabbinical Halacha, and devoted themselves to the literal sense, and became extreme literalists. Influenced by them, Saadia introduced the literal method into the rabbinical schools, and used it as the most potent weapon to overcome the Qarites. He became the father of Jewish exegesis in the middle ages, and was followed by a large number of distinguished scholars, who have left monuments of Jewish learning." — Biblical Study, New York, 1883, pp. 303, 304. SAALSCHÜTZ, Joseph Levin, German rabbi; b. at Königsberg, March 15, 1801; d. there Aug. 23, 1863. He studied in the university of Königsberg; became Ph.D. in 1824, and in 1819 privat-docent in philosophy, and afterwards professor extraordinary, — the first Jew who ever received the appointment. From 1825 to 1829 he taught in the Berlin Jewish public school; from 1829 to 1835 was rabbi in Vienna; from 1835 to his death was rabbi in Königsberg. His principal works are Das Mosaische Recht (1846-48, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1863), and Archäologie der Hebräer (1856, 2 vols.).

SABA'OTH [סבאֹוֹת, סבאֹוֹת, "hosts": the translation occurs in the English Version only in Rom. ix. 29, cited from Isa. i. 9, and Jas. v. 4; elsewhere the translation is used]. The designation of God as "Jehovah Sabaoth" is not found in all the Old Testament. It is lacking in the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Judges; is used first in First and Second Samuel (1 Sam. i. 3, 11, iv. 4, xv. 2, xvii. 45; 2 Sam. v. 10, vi. 2, 18, vii. 8, 26, 27), then in Kings, but very seldom, and only by Elijah and Elisha (1 Kings xviii. 15, xix. 10, 14; 2 Kings iii. 14). In the prophetic books of Amos, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, it frequently occurs; but in the others seldom, and in Ezekiel and Daniel not at all. It is missing in Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, generally in the Psalms, entirely in the post-exilic books, except in 1 Chronicles, in direct relation to David (xi. 9, xvii. 7, 24). The original meaning of the appellation "Jehovah Sabaoth" does not imply, as many maintain, that Jehovah was a god of war; for it is precisely in that period when he was fighting in a wondrous way for his people that the appellation is unknown. In 1 Sam. xvii. 45 its juxtaposition with "God of the armies of Israel" shows that it did not mean the same as the latter. So also Ps. xxiv. 8 (cf. with 10) proves that "the Lord mighty in battle" was a different and lower conception to "the Lord of hosts." Nor are the "hosts" to be understood of the creation generally. The appellation comes from the "heavenly hosts," including both the stars and the angels, and calls attention to the position of Jehovah above both classes: hence the folly of star-worship, so common in the countries surrounding Israel. The stars are mere lights (Gen. i. 14), created for a definite purpose (Ps. civ. 19), although in their way eloquent of Jehovah's praise (Ps. viii. 3, xix. 1). Above them far is Jehovah, who made them, and rules them. Similar is the case respecting angels. They constitute the upper congregation of worshippers (Ps. cxlviii. 2, cl. 1), who praise God for his wonders of providence and grace (Ps. xxix. 9, lxxxix. 6 sqq.). They also are the messengers of God and the witnesses of his mighty acts. When God is styled "Jehovah Sabaoth," his superiority to angels is set forth: hence the epithet rebukes star-worship, and other forms of idolatry; represents him as the absolute ruler of the world, and at the same time as ready to put down every opposition to the people of his choice. OEHLER.

SABAS, St., b. at Mutalasca, or Mutala, a village in Cappadocia, 439; d. near Jerusalem, about 531. When he was only eight years old, he gave up all his wealth, and retired into a monastery, whence he ten years afterwards went to Palestine, and settled as a hermit, and pupil of Euthymius, in the desert near Jerusalem. As his fame for sanctity increased, many Christians joined him, and a laura was formed under the rule of St. Basil. In 484 Bishop Sallustius of Jerusalem ordained him a priest, and made him abbot of an order of monks he had founded, and which was called, after him, the Sabaïtes. He introduced a very severe discipline, was a zealous defender of the synod of Chalcedon, founded several monasteries, and enjoyed the confidence and esteem of the Emperor Anastasius. He is commemorated by the Roman Church on Dec. 5. The existing convent of Mar Saba, on the western shore of the Dead Sea, was founded by him. — Two other saints of the same name, both of whom suffered martyrdom, — the one in Rome (272), the other in Wallachia (372), — are commemorated respectively on the 24th and the 12th of April. — Finally it may be noticed that the hermit Julian of Edessa also is surnamed Sabas. SABBATARIANS. See SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS.

SABBATH (Heb. shabbath; Gr., to sabbaton, or ta sabbata), the seventh day, regarded among the Israelites as holy, and a day of rest. It is of divine origin, its type being the seventh day, on which God rested from all his work. Moses introduced the sabbath first in connection with the manna (Exod. xvi. 5, 22–30), in such a manner as indicated that the sabbath was as yet unknown to the people. The people by observing the sabbath, having experienced its blessing, received then the commandment concerning that day on Sinai. The expression in Exod. xx. 8, “Remember the sabbath day,” is not intended to remind of the sabbath as an ancient institution, but it rather means that the people should always remember the now existing order of the sabbath. The signification of the sabbath can only be known from the Old Testament (cf. Gen. ii. 3; Exod. xx. 11, xxxi. 13–17), which is as follows: God created the world in six days, and rested on the seventh day: he therefore blessed and sanctified this day of completing his work. In like manner, the people which he had sanctified unto himself, and which acknowledged the Creator and Lord of the world as their God, was to sanctify, after every six days of labor, the seventh day as a day of rest; and this was to be a sign of the covenant between God and his people. These sentences convey the following ideas. (1) Like God, so is man to work and to rest. The life of man is to become a likeness of the divine: especially are the people, called to be the organ of establishing a divine order of life upon earth, to be known as the people of the living God by the change of labor and rest, corresponding to the rhythm of the divine life. (2) In blessed rest the divine work is finished: because the creating God rests satisfied in the contemplation of his works, his creation itself is finished. In short, “the seventh day is not the negation of hexahemeron, but the blessing and sanctification of the same.” Therefore, also, the work of men is not to be of a negative nature, but it was to finish itself in a blessed harmony of existence. In the same manner, also, the whole history of men was to complete itself in an harmonious order of God, as is already guaranteed in the sabbath of the creation, and prefigured in the sabbath seasons. The rest of God on the seventh day of creation, which is without an evening, moves over the whole course of the world to receive it at last in itself. The whole fourth chapter in the Epistle to the Hebrews bears upon this; viz., that the rest in God is to become also a rest for men.

But we get the full object of the sabbath idea by combining it with the dominion of sin and death which have entered into the development of the human society. After the divine curse had been pronounced upon the earth, and man had been destined to work for his food, the desire after the rest of God becomes a craving after redemption (Gen. v. 29). Israel, also, whilst in Egyptian bondage without any refreshing interruption, has to sigh for relief. When God, at the deliverance from bondage, gave him the seasons of rest returning regularly, this order became a thankful feast in commemoration of the deliverance which he had experienced. Therefore it is said (Deut. v. 15), “And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt,” etc. But there is yet another point. The sabbath has only its significance as the seventh day, which is preceded by six work-days. The first part of the commandment concerning the sabbath, which is a commandment itself (Exod. xx. 9), reads, “Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work: but the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God.” Only in consequence of preceding labor the sabbath is to follow, as work and creation completes itself in God in blessed rest. The word in Gen. iii. 19 retains its force, only that the sabbath becomes “a corrective for the injuries inflicted on men living under the curse of sin, by the heavy and oppressing work, and at the same time detracting from God.” We need not dwell here on the humane character of the Mosaic law, which in its enactments provides also for the rest of the servant and stranger as well as for the cattle (Exod. xx. 19, xxiii. 12). From what has been said, we see that the sabbath is a divine institution, a divine gift sanctifying the people (Ezek. xx. 12). The day was celebrated by rest from labor (Exod. xxxiv. 21; Num. xv. 32), and by a special burnt offering presented in the temple in addition to the usual daily offering, which was doubled on this day (Num. xxviii. 9). In the holy place of the temple the show-bread was renewed (Lev. xxiv. 8). Deliberate profanation of this day was punished with death (Exod. xxxi. 14 sq., xxxv. 2), which was inflicted by stoning (Num. xv. 32 sq.). The Israelites had to bake and cook their food for the sabbath on the preceding day (Exod. xvi. 23), to which undoubtedly refers the injunction in xxxv. 3. They were also forbidden to leave the camp on the sabbath day (Exod. xvi. 29), and, with reference to this, travelling on the sabbath was afterwards also forbidden. Marketing and public trade ceased on the sabbath (Neh. x. 31, xiii. 15, 16), and it was merely an auxiliary police regulation of Nehemiah to close the gates on that day (Neh. xiii. 19). But the passages in Nehemiah, especially x. 31, show that at that time a strict observance of the sabbath had not yet been customary among the people. The measures, however, which Nehemiah took for the sake of a more quiet sabbath contain nothing of that micrological casuistry which prevailed in later times; and when the Chasidim suffered their enemies to cut them down, rather than to arm on the sabbath (1 Macc. ii. 32 sq.; 2 Macc. vi. 11), Mattathias, apprehending the great danger which would accrue to the Jews, laid down the injunction that it was permitted to take defensive measures against the enemy, and to abstain from offensive operations (1 Macc. ii. 41; 2 Macc. viii.

26). This principle prevailed afterwards (Jos., Antt. XIV. 4, 2), but not always (Jos., War, II. 19, 2). The inventive spirit of later times laid down the minutest and strictest sabbath regulations, which are contained in the Talmud, and a whole Talmud treatise is devoted to this subject. That this micrology had already been developed in the time of Christ, we know from such passages as Matt. xii. 2, John v. 10 sq. In spite of these minute injunctions which were hedged about the sabbath, this day was to be regarded as a day of joy. The meals for the sabbath were prescribed, every one was to eat three meals; and the Talmud Shabbath (fol. 118, col. 1) says, "Whoever observes the three meals on the sabbath will be saved from the birth-pains of Messiah, the judgment of hell, and the war of Gog and Magog." SABBATH-DAY'S JOURNEY (Acts i. 12). From the injunction in Exod. xvi. 29 the scribes laid down the rule that an Israelite must not go two thousand yards beyond the limits of his abode. The permitted distance seems to have been grounded on the space to be kept between the ark and the people (Josh. iii. 4) in the wilderness, which tradition said was that between the ark and the tents. Whilst the rabbis on the one hand regulated the walking on the sabbath days by allowing only a certain space, yet on the other hand they also contrived certain means whereby the sabbath-day's walk could be exceeded, without transgressing the law, by the so-called mixtio terminorum, or connection of distances. They ordained that all those who wished to join their social gatherings on the sabbath were to deposit on Friday afternoon some article of food in a certain place at the end of the sabbath-day's journey, that it might thereby be constituted a domicile, and thus another sabbath-day's journey could be undertaken from the first terminus. Not only does an entire Talmudic treatise (Eruvin) treat on this "connection of distances," but rabbinism has also invented a prayer for that purpose, "Blessed art thou, Jehovah, who hast commanded (1) us the erub" (i.e., connection of distances). SABBATHARIANS, or NEW ISRAELITES, is the name of a religious sect founded by Joanna Southcott (b. about 1750, at Gittisham in Devonshire), who regarded herself as the bride of the Lamb, and declared herself, when sixty-four years of age, pregnant with the true Messiah, the "Second Shiloh," whom she would bear Oct. 19, 1814. She surrounded herself with prophets, and in order to prepare the way for the new dispensation ordered the strictest observance of the Jewish law and sabbath. A costly cradle was kept in readiness for the reception of the Messiah, and for a long time she waited for his birth. At last a supposititious child was declared to be he. But the fraud was detected, and those who participated in it were led around with the picture of Southcott in the public street. Joanna died in her self-delusion, Dec. 27, 1811; but her followers, who at one time numbered a hundred thousand, continued till 1831 to observe the Jewish sabbath and the ceremonials of the law in order to receive the hoped-for Messiah in a worthy manner. Her writings number sixty separate publications, of which the best known is the Book of Wonders, London, 1813-14, 5 parts. Comp. BLUNT: Dictionary of Sects, s.v. "Southcottians;" MATTHIAS: *J. SABBATICAL YEAR AND YEAR OF JUBILEE. (I.) The Sabbatical Year.—The laws respecting the sabbatical year embrace three main enactments,—rest for the soil, care for the poor and for animals, and remission of debts. The first enactment (which is comprised in Exod. xxiii. 10, 11; Lev. xxv. 2-5) enjoins that the soil, the vineyards and the oliveyards, are to have perfect rest: there is to be no tillage or cultivation of any sort. The second enactment (which is contained in Exod. xxiii. 11; Lev. xxv. 5-7) enjoins that the spontaneous growth of the fields or of trees is to be for the free use of the poor, hirelings, strangers, servants, and cattle. The third enactment (which is contained in Deut. xv. 1-3) enjoins the remission of debts in the sabbatical year. It has been questioned whether the release of the seventh year was final, or merely lasted through the year. The former is in general the Jewish view (cf. Mishna Shebiith, x. 1), and was also Luther's view. Seven such sabbatical years closed with (II.) The Year of Jubilee (Lev. xxv. 8-11), which is to follow immediately upon the sabbatical year. It was to be proclaimed by the blast of a trumpet on the tenth day of the seventh month. Like the sabbatical year, it was to be celebrated by (1) giving rest to the soil (Lev. xxv. 11, 12). While the law enjoins, that, as on the sabbatical year, the land should be fallow, and that there be no tillage nor harvest during the jubilee year, yet the Israelites were permitted to gather the spontaneous produce of the field for their immediate wants, but not to lay it up in their storehouses. Another law connected with this festival was (2) manumission of those Israelites who had become slaves (Lev. xxv. 39-51), and (3) reversion of landed property (Lev. xxv. 13-34, xxvii. 16-24). Houses which were not surrounded by walls were treated like landed property, and were subject to the law of jubilee (Lev. xxv. 31), whilst such as were built in walled cities, in case they had not been redeemed within a year after the sale, became the absolute property of the purchaser (Lev. xxv. 29, 30), and the jubilee year had no influence upon it. The houses of the Levites in the forty-eight cities given to them (Num. xxxv. 1-8) were exempt from this general law of house-property. The only exceptions to the general rule were the houses and the fields consecrated to the Lord. If these were not redeemed before the ensuing jubilee, instead of reverting to their original proprietors, they at the jubilee became forever the property of the priests (Lev. xxvii. 20, 21).

As to the design of the sabbatical and jubilee year, we may say that the spirit of this law is the same as that of the weekly sabbath. Both have a beneficent tendency, limiting the rights, and checking the sense of property: the one puts in God's claims on time; the other, on the land. The land shall "keep a sabbath unto the Lord" (Lev. xxv. 2). This is the main idea. Man, by withdrawing his hand from the cultivation of the soil, and putting it at the disposal of Jehovah's blessing, hereby actually acknowledges the exclusively divine right of possession. At the same time, the land pays a debt to Jehovah (cf. Lev. xxvi. 34; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21), and thus returns, in a certain sense, to that condition which it had before the words of Gen. iii. 17 were pronounced: yea, more, the sabbatical year points typically to that time when the creature itself shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption (Rom. viii. 21). The jubilee year, in which the sabbath cycle completes itself, takes up in itself the idea of the sabbatical year, but has its special signification in the idea of the redeeming restitution, and of bringing back the theocracy to the original divine order, where all are free as servants of God, and where every one enjoys the fruits of his inalienable possession. God, who once redeemed his people from Egypt's bondage, appears here again as their Redeemer, by giving liberty not only to the slave, but also by providing for the poor a certain portion of the heritage of his people, since there was to be no poor among the covenant people (Deut. xv. 4). To bring about such a year of grace, sins had to be forgiven: therefore the year of jubilee was proclaimed on the day of atonement. As the year in which the restitution of all things will take place, the year of jubilee in the prophecy of Isa. lxi. 1-3 (fulfilled in Christ, Luke iv. 21) is taken as a type for the messianic time of salvation, in which, after all the battles of the kingdom of God have been victoriously fought, the dissonances of the history of mankind will be lost in the harmony of the divine life, and, with the rest that remaineth for the people of God (Heb. iv. 9), the acts of history will be closed.

As to the practicability of the system of these institutions, it was possible, provided the people were willing to sacrifice all selfish interests to the divine will. In how far this order was executed in the post-Mosaic period, we know not; but that the sabbatical year was not celebrated in the last centuries before the exile, we know from 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21. After the exile, the people took it upon themselves to observe the sabbatical year (Neh. x. 31); and from that time on it seems to have been observed (cf. 1 Macc. vi. 49, 53; Joseph., Antt. XIII. 8, 1, XIV. 10, 6, XV. 1, 2; War, I. 2, 1). As for the year of jubilee, its laws seem not to have been carried out; yet there might have existed an era according to jubilee periods.

The rabbinic laws concerning the sabbatical year are contained in the Mishna treatise Shebiith; but these laws had only reference to Palestine itself, because it is said (Lev. xxv. 2), "When ye come into the land." Outside of Palestine there was no sabbatical year. Comp. the arts. SABBATIER, Pierre, b. at Poitiers, 1683; d. at Rheims, March 22, 1742. He entered the Benedictine order in 1700, and is famous for his edition of the Itala version, Bibliorum sacrorum Latine versiones antiquæ, seu Vetus Italica (Rheims, 1743-49), which was published under the supervision of Ballard and Vincent de la Rue.

SABBATIUS, a converted Jew, who was ordained priest by the Novatian bishop of Constantinople, Marcian, but afterwards, in the last years of the fourth century, caused a schism in the Novatian sect. By the synod of Paz in Phrygia, it was decreed that Easter should be celebrated at the same time as the Jewish passover; and this decree was accepted by Sabbatius, who at the same time commenced to aspire to the episcopal dignity, and to form a party in Constantinople. Meanwhile the Novatian bishops of Constantinople, Nice, Nicomedia, etc., convened a synod at Sangarum in Bithynia, by which the difference as to the celebration of Easter was declared an adiaphoron; but Sabbatius was by oaths compelled to renounce his aspirations of episcopal consecration. He, nevertheless, continued his intrigues, and was actually consecrated by some country bishops, but was then banished to Rhodes, where he died. His bones were afterwards brought to Constantinople; and by his followers, the Sabbatians (see NOVATIANS), he was honored as a martyr.

SABELLIUS is the most pronounced and most influential representative of the Jewish monotheism within the pale of the Christian Church. He knows only one divine substance; and he also knows only one divine person, or one hypostasis. The two ideas of substance and person, or substance and hypostasis, are to him identical; and he designates them with the same name,—the monad. This monad, he acknowledges, does not remain a mute unity. It develops into a triad; but the triad is not the unity of three persons, such as is the teaching of the orthodox church, but simply three different manners in which the one uniform substance is revealed, three different points of view from which it may be looked upon, three different relations in which God places himself to the world. As an illustration, Sabellius reminds his pupils of the round globe of the sun (the Father), his power of light (the Son), and his power of heat (the Spirit). The three links of his triads appear in other places to be merely three stages in the divine self-evolution; and, as soon as the whole course of that self-evolution has been perfected, the triad returns to, and becomes fully absorbed by, the motionless monad. Of the writings of Sabellius, only a few fragments have come down to us in HIPPOLYTUS (Philos., IX., 11), EPIPHANIUS (Hær., 62), and ATHANAsius (Contra Arian oratio), [collected in ROUTH: Reliquiæ Sacræ]. Of his life also very little is known. He was a presbyter, and seems to have been a Libyan by birth, from the Pentapolis. He spent some time in Rome in the beginning of the third century. His doctrine found adherents both in Rome and in his native country, and in 260 or 261 he was excommunicated by Bishop Dionysius of Alexandria. But his influence, or rather the influence of the view he represented, reaches down to Schleiermacher [and Bushnell. See the art. SABIANS. The name occurs for the first time in the Koran (Sur. 2, 59; 5, 73; 22, 17). Its place in the enumeration — Moslems, Jews, Sabians, Christians, Magians, and Polytheists — shows that it there denotes a monotheistic people: it, no doubt, refers to the Mendæans; which article see. How it afterwards came to be applied to a Pagan people settled in Northern Mesopotamia, more especially in Harrân, has been told us by an Arabic writer from the ninth century, — en-Nedim, a Christian. The caliph el-Mannûn (813–833) passed through that region on one of his expeditions against the Byzantine emperor, and all the peoples gathered to salute him. By their long hair and peculiar dress the people of Harrân attracted his attention; and he asked them whether they were Jews, or Christians, or Magians. As they could give no satisfactory answer, he allowed them to consider the matter until his return, when they would have to conform to one of the religions recognized by the Koran. They were thrown into great consternation by this resolution. Some of them adopted Islam, others Judaism, others, again, Christianity; but most of them clung to their old Paganism, concealing the fact by assuming the name of the Sabians. The caliph, however, never returned, and the question was dropped. But the name was continued.

Those Sabians of Harrân were Syrians by descent: but, since the time of Alexander the Great, numerous Greek colonists had lived among them; and, through its close contact with Greek mythology and philosophy, their Syrian Paganism had gradually assumed a Greek coloring. Greek names were used in their mythology, not as representing the true Greek gods, but simply as applied to similar Syrian deities; and in the same manner they had also introduced various biblical names, no doubt in order to propitiate the Mohammedans. Some of them called Hermes, others Buddha, and others again, Abraham, the founder of their religion. It was essentially a star-worship. To the sun, the moon, and the five planets — Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, Venus, and Saturn — temples of angular shape were erected, and suitable sacrifices (in pre-Mohammedan times also of human beings) were offered. To each of these heavenly bodies a peculiar metal was ascribed, — gold to the sun, silver to the moon, etc., — and the days of the week were called after them. But, besides those angular star-temples, round-shaped temples were built for the worship of certain deities representing abstract ideas, — the first cause, necessity, the soul, etc.; and finally, also, genii and demons were worshipped. See CHWOL-

SOHN: Die Ssabier und der Ssabismus, St. Petersburg, 1856, 2 vols. H. PETERMANN.

SABINA, one of the most celebrated martyrs and saints of the Roman-Catholic Church; lived as a widow of distinguished social position in Rome, or in some city of Umbria, in the middle of the second century, and was instructed in Christianity by Serapia, a young girl from Antioch, and probably a slave. Both suffered martyrdom, and are commemorated on Aug. 29. In 430 their remains were entombed in the church in Rome erected in honor of them. See Act. Sanct. Aug. 29.

SABINIANUS, Pope (Sept. 13, 604–Feb. 22, 605); succeeded Gregory the Great, as whose apocrisiarius he had acted in Constantinople, and is said to have introduced the announcement of the canonical hours by bells. He was succeeded by Boniface III.

SACHEVERELL, Henry, b. in Wiltshire, about 1672; d. in London, June 5, 1724; was graduated at Oxford, 1696, and appointed preacher at St. Saviour's, Southwark, in 1705. In 1709 he preached two sermons, which, on account of their political bearing, gave the gravest offence to the ministry and the majority of Parliament (Whigs). He was impeached for libel by the House of Commons; and in 1710 he was convicted by the peers, and suspended for three years from the ministry. He was ardently supported, however, by the Tories, the clergy, and the country squires; and the excitement caused by his trial contributed much to the defeat of the Whigs in the general election of 1710 and the downfall of Godolphin and his colleagues. In 1713 he was made rector of St. Andrew's, Holborn, in which position he died. See The Life of Dr. H. Sacheverell, London, 1711.

SACHS, Hans, b. in Nuremberg, Nov. 5, 1494; d. there Jan. 20, 1576; was the son of a tailor, but frequented, from 1501 to 1509, the Latin school of his native city, in which he learned "Puerilia, Grammatica, und Musica, auch Rhetorica, Arithmetica, Astronomia, Poeterey, und Philosophia." He complains, however, that he soon forgot all that he had learned; and, in spite of the comprehensive and varied reading which his writings evince, he calls himself an "unlearned man, who understood neither Greek nor Latin." In 1509 he was apprenticed to a shoemaker, and in 1511 he commenced the professional wanderings which formed an important element of the education of a thorough mechanic. He visited all the principal cities of Germany, and in the guilds of his trade he studied at the same time the craft of his profession and the art of poetry. The master-singers were mechanics, and every Sunday or holyday they assembled in the afternoon in the church or in the guild-hall. A "singing"-match took place; and he whose poem won the prize received a wreath of silken flowers, or a woollen string with a silver coin bearing the image of King David. Hans Sachs felt that only among the master-singers he could find what he considered enjoyment and amusement; and in 1514, in Munich, he appeared for the first time among them as a "singer" with the poem, Gloria Patri Lob und Ehr. In 1516 he returned to Nuremberg, settled there as a shoemaker, married, and, while he sustained a numerous family with the proceeds of his professional labor, he developed a literary activity which soon made him the "prince and patriarch of the master-singers." Nuremberg was at that time a free imperial city, and at the height of its prosperity. Charles V. often visited it; Luther praised it highly; among its citizens were Albrecht Dürer (d. 1528), Peter Vischer (d. 1529), Andreas Ossiander (1522-49), Peter Henlein (d. 1540), Lazarus Spengler (d. 1534), and others. Among these men, — known all over Germany, some of them all over the world, — Hans Sachs took rank. He became the representative poet of his age, and by the outspoken tendency of his poetry he occupied a place in the history of the German Reformation. It was the first rule of the Nuremberger master-singers, that nothing should be written against Luther's Bible; and, when the competing poems were tested, one of the judges had the office of comparing their ideas and their language with that book.

Hans Sachs was an exceedingly prolific author, and is in this respect surpassed only by the Spanish poet, Lope de Vega. His works consist of thirty-four large volumes in folio, written with his own hand, and containing 6,636 pieces, of which several hundreds are dramas, the rest epics and lyrics. The poetical tone of these pieces is very various, — tragical and comical, humorous and sentimental, sarcastic and enthusiastic; but the æsthetical character is always the same, always didactic: the ideal contents is some moral proposition, and the tendency of this proposition points directly towards the Reformation. Among his poems, which generally were printed on fly-leaves, and in that form scattered throughout all Germany, some of the most celebrated are his transcriptions of Luther's translation of the Psalms; Die Wittenbergisch Nachtigall, in seven hundred verses, and giving an explanation of the difference between "divine truth and human lies;" Eyn wunderliche weysung, in thirty strophes, and with a preface by Ossiander, giving thirty pictures of the Pope in glory and in distress. It was forbidden, and the poet was rebuked by the magistrates; but immediately after, appeared Inhalt zweierlei Predigt: Hec dicit Dominus Deus — Sic dicit papa, etc. His dramas comprise tragedies, comedies, farces, fables, and dialogues (Schwänke and Fassnachtsspiele), and were represented by himself and his brother-mechanics in the guild-hall or in private residences on festal occasions. Among his tragedies is one on the expulsion of Adam and Eve from paradise, in three acts and with eleven dramatis personæ, 1553; another, on the last judgment, in seven acts and with thirty-four dramatis personæ, 1558, etc. Of his comedies, the most celebrated is Die ungleichen Kinder Eve, which he recast three times. The idea he took from Philip Melancthon: God-Father visits Eve, takes her two sons on his knees, and examines them in Luther's Catechism. Abel answers every question correctly, Cain always goes wrong. (See Corpus Reform., iii. 653; and K. Hase: Das geistliche Schauspiel, Leipzig, 1858, pp. 217-239.) Also his Hecastus is interesting in various respects. (See K. Goedecke: Every-man, Homulus und Hecastus, Hanover, 1865.) His dramas are often dialogues between virtues and vices; and even his Schwänke and Fassnachtsspiele, — such as The devil marrying an old woman, The pious nobility which alone has the right of robbery, The man who hears his wife confessing, etc., — although they certainly have not only the intention, but also the power, of "dispelling melancholy," are, nevertheless, constructed on a strictly moral plan and for a decidedly moral purpose.

King Louis I. of Bavaria put a bust of Sachs in the Ruhmeshalle at Munich; Kaulbach put him in the foreground of his great picture, The Reformation; and in 1874 a bronze statue of the famous shoemaker was erected in the Spitalplatz at Nuremberg. [The earliest collective edition of his works appeared in Augsburg, 1570-79, 5 vols. folio, reprinted at Kempten, 1612-17, 4to; selections from his poems form vols. iv., v., vi., of GOEDECKE and TITTMANN'S Deutsche Dichter des 16. Jahrhunderts, Leipzig, 1870-72, 3 vols., new ed., 1874. A new edition of his poems by ADALBERT v. KELLER is in the Bibliothek des litterarischen Vereins zu Stuttgart, 1870 sq. (13th vol., 1883). His Fassnachtsspiele have been edited by E. GOETZE for the series Neudrucke deutscher Literaturwerke d. XVI. u. XVII. Jahrh., Halle, Nos. 26, 27 (1880), 31, 32 (1881), 39, 40 (1883), and in the same series, for the first time, Der hünen Scyfried (a tragedy in seven acts), No. 29 (1880). The majority of his works have not yet been printed.] The most comprehensive biography of Sachs is by SALOMON RANISCH, Altenburg, 1765: there is another by J. L. HOFFMANN, Nuremberg, 1847. [See F. SACK, August Friedrich Wilhelm, b. Feb. 4, 1703, at Harzgerode, in the principality of Anhalt-Bernburg; and d. in Berlin, April 23, 1786; was educated at Bernburg; studied theology at the university of Frankfurt-on-the-Oder; visited, as tutor to a young nobleman, the universities of Leyden and Groningen; spent three years (1728-31) at Hübensleben as tutor to the young prince of Hesse-Homburg; and was in 1731 called as third preacher to the German-Reformed congregation in Magdeburg. In 1740 he was made court-preacher in Berlin; and in this position he opposed with great energy, but also with perfect tact, the French scepticism and English deism which through many channels found their way to the court of Friedrich II. In 1745 he was chosen a member of the Academy of Sciences in Berlin, and in 1750 he was made a member of the consistory. In 1748 he published his chief work, Vertheidigte Glauben der Christen, of which a second edition appeared in 1773; and from 1735 to 1764 he published six volumes of sermons, several of which were translated into Dutch, French, and English. His biography (Berlin, 1789, 2 vols.) was written by his son, Friedrich Samuel Gottfried Sack (b. in Magdeburg, Sept. 4, 1738; d. in Berlin, Oct. 2, 1817), and his successor as court-preacher and in the consistory, with the title of bishop.

SACK, Karl Heinrich, b. in Berlin, Oct. 17, 1790; d. at Poppelsdorf, Oct. 16, 1875. He was docent in the university of Berlin (1817), extraordinary professor in Bonn (1818), and ordinary professor (1832). In 1847 he was called to Magdeburg as Consistorialrath, and later made Oberconsistorialrath. He was a representative of the so-called "right" of the Schleiermacher school.

His writings are numerous. The chief are Christliche Apologetik, Hamburg, 1829, 2d ed., 1811; Christliche Polcmik, 1838; Die Kirche von Schottland, Heidelb., 1814-15, 2 parts; Die evangelische Kirche u. d. Union, Bremen, 1861; Geschichte d. Predigt von Mosheim bis Schleiermacher, Heidelb., 1866, 2d ed., 1875; Theologische Aufsätze, Gotha, 1871.

SACK, Brethren of the (Saccati, Saccitæ, or Saccophori), often, like the monks of Grammont, the Minims, the Cathari, and Waldenses, styled boni homines, formed an ecclesiastical order somewhat similar to that of the Augustines. It was founded in France about 1200, and confirmed by the Pope in 1219. It received its name from the sack which its members used as a garment, and spread rapidly, not only in France, but also in England. In 1275, however, it was dissolved by the Council of Leyden; and in 1293 the remaining members were incorporated with other orders. In his Entwurf einer vollständigen Historie der Ketzerien, i. p. 437, Walch places the Brethren of the Sack among the Encratites. They abstained from flesh and wine, held no property, went about barelegged with wooden sandals on their feet, etc.; but it was, no doubt, heretical views which caused the early dissolution of the order. Besides these fratres saccati, there was also an order of sack-bearing nuns, founded in 1261 by King Louis IX. of France, on the suggestion of his mother, Blanca. They called themselves "Penitent Daughters of Jesus," or, with reference to their garment, Saccarie, and lived in nunneries near St. Andrew's in Paris. But also this order was soon abolished, even while its founder was still living; though there was in London, as late as 1557, a nunnery whose inmates wore sacks of hemp, and walked barefooted.

KLIPTEL.

SACRAMENT (from sacramentum, which in classical usage means an oath, especially a military oath, and also a gauge in money laid down in court by two contending parties) is not, strictly speaking, a scriptural term, but occurs repeatedly in the Latin Vulgate as a translation of the Greek μυστήριον, "mystery" (Eph. i. 9, iii. 3, 9, v. 32; 1 Tim. iii. 16; Rev. i. 20). It came into technical ecclesiastical use with Tertullian at the close of the second century and the beginning of the third. It was first loosely employed for all sacred doctrines and ceremonies, like the Greek μυστήριον, and then more particularly for baptism and the eucharist, and a few other solemn rites connected with Christian worship. In the Greek Church they are called "mysteries." St. Augustine defines sacrament in the narrower sense to be the visible sign of an invisible grace (signum visibile gratie invisibilis). To this was afterward added by Protestants, as a third mark, that it must be instituted not only by the church, but by Christ himself, and enjoined upon his followers in the New Testament. Sacraments are also called signs, seals, and means of grace and of public profession. The Reformed churches emphasize the sealing character of these ordinances; the Roman Church makes them the channels of all divine grace.

The number of the sacraments is by Protestants confined to two, viz., baptism and the Lord's Supper (corresponding to circumcision and the passover in the Old Testament); because these alone are instituted by Christ, and commanded to be observed to the end of time. The Roman Catholic and the Greek churches add to them five others, viz., confirmation, penance, extreme unction, ordination, and matrimony. The number was so fixed by the schoolmen of the middle ages, who defended it by various illustrations taken from the sacredness of seven,—the seven needs of human life, the seven virtues, and seven sins or infirmities, etc. The Council of Trent anathematizes those who teach that there are more or less than seven sacraments (esse plura vel pauciora quam septem sacramenta).

As to the efficacy of the sacraments, the confessions of the Reformed churches require faith as a subjective condition; while the Roman-Catholic Church teaches that the sacraments work ex opere operato, i.e., by the inherent power of the institution, or by the performance of the act, independently of the moral character of the priest and the state of the recipient. Two of the sacraments, baptism and ordination, are supposed to confer an indelible character, and cannot be repeated: once baptized, always baptized; once a priest, always a priest. This does not exclude, however, the danger of losing the benefit, and consequent excommunication and deposition.

There has been much controversy about the sacraments (especially the Lord's Supper, which is sometimes emphatically called the sacrament) between Protestants and Roman Catholics, and also between Luther, Zwingli, and their followers. Calvin occupied a mediate position between the two on the sacramental question, and his views passed into the Reformed Confessions. The Quakers reject the sacraments as external ceremonies, and hold only to internal baptism or regeneration by the Spirit, and internal communion with Christ. See STREITZ, in Herzog xiii. 264-299, and arts. on the several sacraments, especially BAPTISM and LORD'S SUPPER.

SACRIFICATI, in ecclesiastical antiquities, denote a subdivision of lapsi; those, namely, who sacrificed to the Pagan gods in order to escape persecution. In the time of Trajan the mere profession of Christianity was considered a crime against the State; but those Christians were forgiven who declared themselves willing to recant, and offer up incense before the statues of the emperor and the gods (sacrificati et thurificati). Many Christians who shrank from actually sacrificing escaped, through the avarice of the Roman officials, by buying certificates that they had complied with the law (libellatici). But even this was severely rebuked by the Church; and, at least as long as the persecutions lasted and the Church had to guard against apostasy, rigid measures were enforced against the sacrificati. See LAPSI.

SACRIFICES. See OFFERINGS.

SACRILEGE (sacrilegium) corresponds to blasphemy, as acts to words, and denotes a crime against God. Canon law, or, more especially, the Roman casuists, distinguish between sacrilegium immediatum (a crime committed against that which by itself is holy, such as unworthy participation in the Lord's Supper, robbery of a monsternce containing the consecrated wafer, etc.), and sacrilegium mediatum (a crime committed against that which is sacred because it is devoted to God, such as church-robbery, molesting or hindering a clergyman in the performance of his office, etc.). Sacrilegium mediatum is further subdivided into personale, reale, and locale, but none of these distinctions have any signification in modern legislation.

Between the Mosaic law and the Roman, there is a striking difference with respect to their conceptions of sacrilege. According to the Mosaic law, sacrilege could be committed by a Jew only; and the punishment which he incurred comprised complete restitution or compensation, a fine of one-fifth of his income, and an expiatory sacrifice (Lev. v. 15, 16, xxii. 14, 16). When the crime was committed by a non-Jew, the Lord himself was expected to avenge the deed (see 1 Sam. v. 6; the Philistines having taken the ark of the Lord, and brought it to Ashdod; Jer. 1. 28, li. 11, and elsewhere). With the Romans the crime of sacrilege became only so much the more aggravated by having been committed by a foreigner, and death was always the punishment. In the older Roman law sacrilegium comprised not only the appropriation of res sacræ to secular uses, but also the appropriation of objects not sacræ which had been deposited in the temple, or in other ways placed under the guardianship of the gods. (See CICERO: De legibus, i. 16.) Afterwards, by decrees of Severus and Antoninus, a distinction was made between the stealing of res sacræ in a sacred place and the stealing either of res sacræ in a profane place or of objects not sacred in a sacred place: only the first case was defined as sacrilegium; the two last, as simple theft (furtum). In the Christian Church the crime appeared very early; and complaints occur that clergy and laymen took away from the churches wax, oil, etc. The decrees of the Mosaic law were applied, and excommunication was added (Can. Apost., c. 72, comp. c. 73). But the crime spread, and is more and more frequently mentioned in the decrees of the synods, the writings of the Fathers, the penitentials, etc., though at the same time the penalties became heavier and heavier (REGINO: De synodalibus causis, lib. ii. c. 276 sq.). By degrees, as the Germanic element became prominent in the legislation of the nations of Central and Western Europe, the Germanic conception of sacrilege as violation of the sacredness of the church prevailed, and the Roman distinction between res

sacræ and non sacræ was abolished (Lex Ribuariorum, tit. lx. cap. 8; Lex Alamannorum, tit. v., vii.; Lex Bajuvariorum, tit. i. cap. 3, 6; Capitulare Paderbrunnense, a. 785, c. 3, in PERTZ: Monum. Germanicæ, t. iii. fol. 48). In Lex Frisionum we even find an old law concerning the sacredness of the Pagan temples applied directly to the Christian churches. Of great interest is the legislation of Charles V. on this point (1532). Here is a return to the distinctions of the Roman law, though in such a way that the appropriation of res sacræ or of res non-sacræ, deposited in a sacred place, never becomes a simple theft; and this aggravation of the crime, when it becomes sacrilegious, is adopted by all modern legislations.

SACRISTY and SACRISTAN. The sacristy is sometimes a separate building belonging to a church or convent, sometimes only an apartment in the main structure, in which the sacred vessels are kept, and in which the ecclesiastics who are to take part in the service assemble. The person who has charge of that room or building is the sacristan.

SACY, Louis Isaac Le Maistre de, b. in Paris, March 29, 1613; d. Jan. 4, 1684; studied at Beauvais together with Antoine Arnauld; was ordained priest in 1648, and became in 1650 confessor and spiritual director of the recluses of Port-Royal. During the persecution of the Jansenists he lived concealed in the suburb of St. Antoine; but, as he continued to correspond with the nuns, his residence was discovered, and May 13, 1666, he was imprisoned in the Bastille. Oct. 31, 1669, he was released, and returned to Port-Royal; but in 1679 he was once more compelled to leave the monastery; and the last days of his life he spent in the house of his cousin, the Marquis of Pomponne. He is principally known by his translations of the Bible. In 1667 appeared his Le Nouveau Testament, traduit en Français, generally called Nouveau Testament de Mons, though it was printed in Amsterdam by the Elzevirs. It was vehemently attacked by several bishops, condemned by Pope Clement IX. (April 20, 1668), defended by Arnauld and Nicole, and caused a controversy which lasted twenty years. La Sainte Bible, containing the  Vulgata, a translation into French, and notes (Paris, 1672, 32 vols.), was often republished, and is still widely used in France. Les Psaumes de David, also with notes, appeared in 1679. See SAINT-BEUVE: Port-Royal, vol. ii.

SADDUCEES. All sources agree in putting Sadduceeism in opposition to Pharisaism. It is not the name of a sect, but of a party which refused to adopt the exaggerations of ritualistic and ascetic formalism of Pharisaism. In a certain sense the Pharisees were the innovators. Their peculiar teachings were additions to the law, which the Sadducees regarded as sole authority; and thus only can we understand the reluctance of the latter against the traditional system, and its religious and ascetical requirements, as well as the rejection of the doctrine of the resurrection. Being forced by the natural course of things to make an opposition in the field of public and social life, the Sadducees were finally entangled in political difficulties, till they thus became the opponents of the Pharisees in matters of which they had not thought at the beginning. Less favored by the people, they easily accommodated themselves to make political connections with foreigners, as the misfortunes of the nation required it, and to live in peace with a world which they could neither conquer nor with which they could assimilate themselves. They took things as they were; they went their own way, and had no sympathy with the people, which from the very start was pharisaically inclined, because the Pharisees had the appearance of greater piety, and because they hated every thing foreign. Thus the Sadducees became at last only a political coterie, and with the destruction of Jerusalem they disappear from history. From a political point of view it must be said that they were wiser and more far-seeing than the Pharisees, and that they cannot be blamed for the final catastrophe. It must be said of them that they refused to gain an influence by hypocritical demagoguery which they could not gain by straight measures: still, this also must be said, that most of them, by befriending themselves with Greeks and Romans, and serving a foreign policy, had their personal interest in view, and cared just as little for the religious interests of the nation as for the civil.

This brings us back to our assertion that the Sadducees, still less the Pharisees, formed a sect. Towards the Pharisaic Judaism they observed a cold neutrality; and it is sufficient to say that the very basis of Judaism, the idea of the theocracy, was violently shaken. The weakening of the theocratic principle naturally led to giving up other ideas connected with it: hence the messianic hope and teachings, including the dogma of resurrection, appeared to them as chimerical.

In the New Testament the Sadducees are mentioned in Matt. iii. 7, xvi. 1, 6, xxii. 23, 34; Mark xii. 18; Luke xx. 27; Acts iv. 1, v. 17, xxiii. 6-8. From the Gospel narrative it seems to be evident that at that time these parties opposed each other more on political grounds; and this seems to be clear from the narrative in the Acts of the Apostles, where the Sadducees always opposed the Christians, while the Pharisees favored them in many respects (Acts v. 17, 34). How are we to explain this phenomenon? or are we to believe that Christianity, after the death of Jesus, had degenerated into sheer Pharisaism? The fact, however, seems to be this: the preaching of Jesus which concerned the inner life naturally brought it into conflict with the Pharisees. But the moving power and vitality of the first Christian Church was the messianic hope; and this it shared with the Pharisees, who beheld in it something which they could utilize for their special purposes; whereas the Sadducees regarded it as something dangerous, because exaggerated, if not demagogical.

Occasionally we also hear (Acts xxiii. 8) that the Sadducees believed neither in angels nor spirits, whereas the Pharisees believed in both; and this we explain best by bearing in mind, that, as political parties, one affirmed what the other denied. Passing over from the New Testament to Josephus, who has always been regarded as the main authority in this respect, we are led to the supposition that the Sadducees were a school of philosophers; and for Greek readers every thing that concerned the future life belonged to the sphere of speculation. But the Jewish historian studiously avoided giving his readers an inside view of the political party-machinery; and that the Sadducees were philosophers was the more believed, since Josephus asserted that they denied the doctrine of fatalism, but contended for the freedom of the will. And whereas we will not deny that there were some speculating spirits among the Sadducees, yet we must bear this in mind, that Josephus only mentions what serves his purposes, thus deceiving the inexperienced and inconsiderate reader. And the scanty notices which we find in the Talmud also lead us to the supposition that both Pharisees and Sadducees were nothing but parties; that in the main they both stood on the ground of the same Judaism as far as the inner relations were concerned, and that in this sphere there were no oppositions which had to lead to a rupture; for evidently both parties were represented in the Sanhedrin, where they could defend their different ideas, but always with a view of gaining a victory which would need endanger the State.

More confused are the notices which we find in the writings of the church Fathers, and especially in those of mediæval Judaism. The Sadducees, as we have seen, were friends of the foreigners; and, as they mostly belonged to the aristocracy, it cannot be remarkable, that, by their aversion to asceticism, they gave offence by their luxury and immorality. But this did not necessarily belong to the party, and was also not the cause why later Jews called them Epicureans: for the latter name in rabbinic writings denotes all kinds of heresy; and we can easily perceive, how, with the increasing narrowness of the ecclesiastical horizon, such imputations could be made, and it is also very characteristic that Christian writers should have taken this up, and made the rabbinic-Pharisaic mode of intuition their own. To this source belongs the myth concerning the origin of the Sadducees. Of a renowned teacher of the third century before Christ, Antigonus of Socho, we are told in the Mishna (Pirke Aboth, 1, 3), that he recommended to his disciples the exercise of virtue without any view of reward. In the Gemara, and later by other authorities, we are told Antigonus had two disciples, Zadok and Baithos, who, be it advertently or inadvertently, drew the inference from their teacher's maxim that there is no reward and no future life. This is the origin of Sadduceism. Whether and how the Sadducees and Baithoseans were the same or not, no one could rightly understand any more. Yet there are still some scholars who believe in the existence of Zadok and Baithos; whereas the highest antiquity is silent concerning them, and prefers the etymological explanation of the name "Sadducees" [i.e., from Heb. for "just"]. Often the Sadducees have been identified with the Karaites, but the only relation between the two consists in the rejection of the Pharisaic-rabbinic system of tradition.

SADOLETO, Jacopo, b. at Modena in 1477; d. in Rome, Oct. 18, 1547; studied philosophy and rhetoric at Pisa, Ferrara, and Rome, and became secretary to Leo X. in 1514, and bishop of Carpentras in 1517. During the reign of Adrian VI., who had no taste for literature, Sadoleto, who was best known for the elegance of his style, and as author of some poems, lived at Carpentras; and, although Clement VII. called him to Rome as his secretary, he soon again returned to his episcopal see. During the next ten years he wrote — besides De liberis recte instituendis liber, Interpretatio in Psalmum, Miserere mei Deus, etc. — his chief work, In Pauli epistolam ad Romanos Commentarium libri tres. It gave offence in Rome on account of its Semi-Pelagian views, and Sadoleto undertook to alter it. In 1536 Paul III. again called him to Rome, made him a cardinal, and employed him frequently in diplomatical negotiations with Francis I. and Charles V. He was very active, and very successful as an administrator and diplomatist, but continued to cultivate his literary and philosophical tastes. His Phædrus sive de Philosophia appeared in 1539. The best collection of his works, including his letters and his biography by Fiordibello, was published in Verona, 1737-38, 4 vols. fol. See PÉRICAUD: Fragments biographiques sur Jacob Sadoleto, Lyons, 1849; JORY: Étude sur Sadoleto, Caen, 1857. SAGITTARIUS, Kaspar, b. at Lüneburg, Sept. 23, 1643; d. at Jena, March 9, 1691; was educated in the gymnasium of Lubeck; studied theology and philology in the university of Helmstädt; was appointed rector of the school of Saalfeld in 1668, and professor of history in the university of Jena in 1671. He was possessed of an almost encyclopedic knowledge, travelled much in Germany and Denmark, examining the archives and libraries, and published a number of valuable works relating to the history of Thuringia and Saxony. In 1691 he published at Jena his Theologische Lehr- sätze von dem rechtmässigen Pietismo, in which he protested against the use of the term "pietism" as a nickname, as the religious stand-point thereby denoted was indeed the true representative of Christianity. The book was hotly attacked, especially by superintendent Johann Schwartz of Querfurt; but Sagittarius left none of his adversaries without an answer: Theses apologeticae theologicae (1692), Christlicher Neu-Jahrs-Wunsch an alle evangelische Theologos (1692). He also wrote Historia vite Georgii Spalatini (1693), and Introductio in historiam ecclesiasticam. See J. A. SCHMID: Commentarius de vita et scriptis Caspari Sagittarii, Jena, 1713. NEUDECKER.

SAILER, Johann Michael, b. in the village of Aresing, near Schrobenhausen, Bavaria, Nov. 17, 1751; d. at Regensburg, May 20, 1832. In 1770 he entered the Jesuit college at Landsberg, and after the dissolution of the order, in 1773, he studied theology and philosophy at the university of Ingolstadt. In 1777 he was ordained priest, and appointed repetitor publicus in theology and philosophy. In 1780 he was made professor of dogmatics, and in 1784 he moved to Dillingen as professor of pastoral theology. But on Nov. 4, 1791, he was suddenly dismissed, accused of participation in secret political intrigues, and of connection with the Illuminati; and for many years he lived in retirement in Munich or at Ebersberg, developing, however, a great literary activity. His orthodoxy had long been suspected by the Ultramontanists, but the suspicion was entirely without ground. However much he at times was harassed by doubts (see his book, Der Friede, 1821), he never swerved from that which forms the essential and vital points of the Roman-Catholic faith; and his opposition to the rationalism and indifference of the age was energetic and successful. Meanwhile his works — Briefe aus allen Jahrhunderten, Grundlehren der Religion, Glückseligkeitslehre (afterward entitled Moralphilosophie), Ueber Erziehung für Erzieher, Die Weisheit auf der Gasse, etc., — gathered a considerable number of disciples around him. Without forming a theological school, he wielded a great religious influence, and he received tempting offers from abroad. In 1818 the king of Prussia offered him the archiepiscopal see of Cologne. But he declined: he would not leave Bavaria. In 1821 he was made capitular at Regensburg; in 1822, coadjutor to the bishop; in 1829, bishop. A collected edition of his works, consisting of forty volumes, was commenced in 1820, but not completed until after his death. The most prominent among his disciples was Melchior Diepenbrock (q. v.). SAINT-MARTIN, Louis Claude de, le philosophe inconnu, b. at Amboise, Jan. 18, 1743; d. in Paris, Oct. 13, 1803; the only noticeable theosophist the French tongue has produced. He grew up in a devout home, was educated in an ecclesiastical institution, studied law, entered afterwards the army, and became, while a young officer in the garrison of Bordeaux, an enthusiastic adherent of Dom Martinez de Pasqualis. The pupil, however, soon separated from the master, entered into connection with Cagliostro, studied Swedenborg, resigned his position in the army, wrote books which attracted much attention, — Des erreurs et de la vérité (1775), and Tableau naturel des rapports entre Dieu, l'homme, et l'univers (1782), — and travelled extensively in England, Italy, and Germany, making everywhere intimate acquaintance with the mystical spirits of the age, William Law, Best, the Galatzin family, and others. From 1788 to 1791 he lived in Strassburg, his "paradise;" and while there he studied Jacob Boehme, and wrote L'homme de désir (1790), Ecce homo (1792), and Le nouvel homme (1792). The French Revolution he hailed with great enthusiasm: but he soon discovered the utter lack of moral responsibility which characterized its movements, and he sent out a word of warning, Lettre à un ami (1796), Eclair sur l'association humaine (1797), Esprit des choses (1800); but his books were not read, and his last independent work, Ministère de l'homme Esprit (1802), was completely thrown into the shade by Chateaubriand's Génie du Christianisme. In the last years of his life he was much occupied with a French translation of Jacob Boehme, which, considering the enormous difficulties, is remarkably well done. Most of his own works were translated into German and commented upon by Frantz von Baader. His life has been written by GENGE (1824), L. MOREAU (1850), SAINTE-BERVE, in Causeries du Lundi, vol. x., CARO (1852), SCHAUER (who published his correspondence, 1862), and MATTER (1862). A consistent theosophical system he did not give; but deep glimpses of Christian truth sparkle everywhere in his books in close proximity to singular expressions of the prejudices and the fanaticism of his time.

SAINT-SIMON DE ROUVROY, Count Claude Henri, b. in Paris, Oct. 17, 1760; d. there May 19, 1825. He was educated for the army, and fought with bravery in the American War of Independence. But from early youth his brain was busy with great social schemes. In Mexico he proposed to cut a canal through the isthmus; in Spain he proposed to connect Madrid with the sea. During the Revolution he speculated in confiscated estates, made a fortune, kept a magnificent establishment in Paris, squandered all his riches, and found himself penniless just as he had finished his great plan of a complete social reorganization, — the consummation of the Revolution. He proposed to Madame de Staël-Holstein, in order to have her as a partner in his great scheme of revolutionizing society; but she declined the offer. And from that moment till his death he often had to fight against actual starvation. His books attracted no attention, — Lettres d'un habitant de Genève, 1802; Introduction aux travaux littéraires du 19 siècle, 1808, 2 vols.; De la réorganisation de la société européenne, 1814; L'industrie, 1817, etc., — though he found enthusiastic pupils among men like Augustin Thierry and Aug. Comte. In despair, he attempted to commit suicide, but was fortunately prevented. On his bed of suffering he wrote his two best books: Catéchisme politique, 1823-24; and Nouveau Christianisme, 1825. In many respects he was far in advance of his time. He had not the prejudices of many of his contemporaries. He was aware of the part Christianity has played in the history of civilization, and he spoke with respect of the labor of the lower clergy. But his knowledge was utterly incomplete, and led him to extremely wrong views. He considered the Reformation a retrograde movement. Most influence he has exercised through his disciples, Olinda Rodrigues, Bazard, Enfantin, and others. His life was written by G. HUBBARD, Paris, 1857. G. BUCHSENSCHÜTZ.

SAINTS', Day of All. See ALL-SAINTS'-DAY.

SAINTS, Worship of the. The apostolic designation of Christians as "saints" (Rom. i. 7; 1 Cor. i. 2) was used down to the days of Irenæus and Tertullian. The inclination early developed itself to apply the term in a peculiar sense to such Christians as had lived exemplary lives, and had witnessed a steadfast confession in life and death, often a martyr's death. As early as the second part of the second century, congregations were celebrating the memory of martyrs. The day of their martyrdom was called the day of their birth (γενέθλια τῶν μαρτύρων), and set apart for special services; and the place where the remains of a martyr were interred was regarded as consecrated. There the story of his sufferings and death was related once a year, and the Lord's Supper celebrated in token of the communion of saints. Eusebius (IV. 15) states that the Church of Smyrna honored the bones of Polycarp above silver and gold. In the fourth century a yearly festival of all saints and martyrs was appointed by the Eastern Church. One of Chrysostom's homilies (De martyribus totius orbis) was delivered on this festival. The Western Church did not appoint an all saints' day till the seventh century.

The respect for the memory of the saints gradually degenerated into a worship of saints and their relics. The monkish system, which began in the third century, was the occasion of exaggerated accounts of the piety and power of men who spent their lives in caves, devoting themselves to the most severe ascetic practices. Miracles were associated with their names. Cyprian, Gregory of Nyssa, Gregory Nazianzen, Ambrose, Augustine, and others exalted their memories [in treatises and sermons on the saints called Panegyrics], and attributed to them a part in the judgment and power, by their intercessions, to become protectors of men on earth. It was taught that they not only interceded for the pardon of sins, but for the relief of physical infirmities (Ambrose: De Viduis 9). Chapels and churches were erected over their bones, and relics were carried as amulets. Their aid was sought at the inception of journeys, for ships at sea, etc. Special saints were associated with different cities, lands, and occupations. Peter and Paul are the patrons of Rome; James, of Spain; Andrew, of Greece; Gregory of Tours, of France; Luke, of painters; John and Augustine, of theologians; Ivo, of jurists; Crispin, of shoemakers, etc. Vigilantius of Barcelona protested vigorously in the fifth century against such worship as idolatry, but Jerome defended the practice with vigor.

The worship of saints was fixed in the Oriental Church by the Second Nicene Council (787), John of Damascus having before argued for the practice. The theologians of the West took up the subject, and advanced arguments in favor of the custom. Peter Lombard, Alexander of Hales, and Thomas Aquinas display much skill in this direction, but distinguished between the worship (latreia, adoratio) due to God, and the worship (douleia, invocatio) due to saints. Thomas demanded for Mary an honor lower than that due God, and yet higher than that due the saints (hyperdulia). The increasing host of the saints was divided into six classes; and the Roman Breviary ordains that they shall be addressed ("Apostles, martyrs, etc., pray for us") at all other times than the high festivals. The art of the middle ages was likewise devoted to bring out the emblems and peculiarities of the saints. Peter was pictured with the keys, John with a lamb upon his arm, Paul with a sword, Bartholomew with a knife, etc. On account of the smuggling-in of martyrs, the Pope was called upon to declare who were saints; and in 973 John XV. canonized the first saint in the person of Bishop Ulrich of Augsburg.

In the eleventh century Guibert, abbot of Nogent raised his voice against the abuses of saint-worship in his work, De pignoribus Sanctorum. Wiclif ridiculed those who sought the intercession of any other than Jesus Christ. Nicolaus of Clemanges, in his De novis celebritatibus non instituentis, advocated a return to the practice of the early ages, when the worship of the saints did not prevail to the exclusion of the worship of God. The Reformers lifted up their voices in sternest protest against the practice of the church, and the confessions deny all scriptural warrant for it. The Council of Trent (XXV.) established it, condemning all who denied the efficacy of the intercession of the saints. Modern Roman-Catholic divines endeavor in vain to find a scriptural warrant for it in Rev. v. 8, viii. 3, xx. 4; and, if they appeal to the Disciplina Arcana of the first centuries, Protestants reply by giving a different explanation of that secret discipline.

The legends of the saints form a large literature, which is full of fancies and falsehoods. Calendars and Martyrologies dating back to the eighth century are in existence. The collection most highly prized in the East is that of SIMEON METAPHRASTES of the twelfth century. The Legenda Aurea of JACOB DE VORAGINE is highly prized in the West. The most important of the later works is the Acta Sanctorum, edited by the BOLLANDISTS, [Antwerp, 1643 sqq., Paris, 1875; Mrs. JAMIESON: Sacred and Legendary Art, London, 1848, 2 vols.; Legends of the Monastic Orders, 1850; BARING-GOULD: Lives of the Saints, London, 1873-77, 15 vols.]. He studied at Halle and Jena, and published, besides other works, a Vollständige Historie der Augsbургischen Konfession (Halle, 1730-35, 3 vols.), and a Vollständige Geschichte des Tridentinischen Conciliums, which, however, did not appear until after his death (1711-45, 3 vols.). His biography was written in Latin by Ballenstedt, Helmstadt, 1738.

SALISBURY, or NEW SARUM, capital of Wiltshire, Eng., seventy-eight miles west-south-west from London; population in 1871, 12,903. It is the seat of a bishopric, transferred from Old Sarum in 1217, where it had been established prior to 1078. Its cathedral was commenced in 1220, and finished in 1258: it has been since 1868 completely restored. See W. H. JONES: Salisbury, London, 1880.

SALMANTICENSES. Towards the close of the sixteenth and in the beginning of the seventeenth century the hostility between the Dominicans and the Jesuits became very intense in Spain. Pope Paul V. commanded the contending parties to keep silence: but the controversy continued; and at Salamanca, the headquarters of the Dominican camp, the professors took an oath to give a pure representation of the views of Augustine and Thomas Aquinas, without any Semi-Pelagian coloring. For this purpose the celebrated Collegii Salmanticensis cursus theologicus was published, Salamanca, 1631 sqq., 9 vols.; Lyons, 1679, 12 vols.; new ed., Paris, 1871 sqq., 20 vols. It was directed against Molinos. The principal authors were ANTONIUS DE OLIVERO, DOMINICUS A S. THERESIA, and JOHANNES AB ANNUNCIATIONE. ZÖCKLER.

SALMASIUS, Claudius, b. at Semur in Burgundy, April 15, 1588; d. at the baths of Spa, Sept. 3, 1653; one of the greatest scholars of his age, and famous for his Defensio regia pro Carolo I. (1649), which called forth the sharp answer of Milton. He studied at Paris and Heidelberg; was in 1632 appointed professor of classical literature and language at Leyder; and went in 1650 to Sweden, on the invitation of Queen Christine. Among his works several — De primatu papæ, De episcopis et presbyteris, De transsubstantiatione, Super Herode infanticida, etc. — have theological interest.

SALMERON, Alphonso, b. at Toledo in October, 1515; d. at Naples, Feb. 13, 1585. He studied at Alcalá and Paris; joined Ignatius Loyola, and became one of the founders and most active members of the Society of Jesu. Fanatical in his resistance to the Reformation, he visited almost every country in Europe, was present at the Council of Trent as papal theologian, and wrote commentaries on most of the books of the New Testament.

SALT (סֶלַח, śelach) plays in the Bible an important part: in the Old Testament through its use in all sacrifices (Lev. ii. 13; Mark ix. 49), and in the New Testament through its symbolical application to the position of Christians in the world (Matt. v. 13). The Mosaic injunction rests upon the Oriental custom of eating salt, on the ratification of a covenant, as the pledge of perpetual and mutual friendship between the contracting parties, because of its property of preservation: hence a lasting covenant was called "a covenant of salt" (Num. xviii. 19; 2 Chron.

xiii. 5). The salt of the sacrifice symbolized the firmness of the bond between Jehovah and Israel. But salt was also strewn over a cursed place to indicate that nothing could any longer be allowed to grow there, because there can be no vegetation where the ground is saturated with salt (Deut. xxix. 23; Judg. ix. 45; Zeph. ii. 9): hence "a salt land" was a barren land (Job xxxix. 6; Jer. xvii. 6). The necessity of employing salt in cooking is expressed in Job vi. 6. Josephus (Antiq. XII. 3. 3) states, what of course would be understood, that in the temple there was always a great quantity of salt. It was also for sale in the temple-marts (MAI: Diss. de usu salis, Giessen, 1692).

The salt thus used was obtained principally from the valley of salt (2 Sam. viii. 13), south of the Dead Sea, where the soil is entirely covered with salt, left there every year on the recession of the waters; from Jebel Usdum, two or three miles south of the Dead Sea, substantially a mountain of rock-salt, about seven miles long, from a mile and a half to three miles wide, and several hundred feet high, and by evaporating Dead Sea water. According to Josephus, only "Sodomitish" salt could be used in the temple [cf. CARPZOV: Appar., p. 718]. The reasons of this regulation were, (1) that this salt was a witness to the terrible consequences of God's wrath, and a constant exhortation to repentance, and (2) it was a product of the Holy Land itself. But since Oriental salt contains many mineral impurities, by exposure to rain or dampness it may lose its savor: hence our Lord's expression (Matt. v. 13; Mark ix. 50; Luke xiv. 34). Christians lose their savor by undue exposure to the sinful world. [By "salt-pits" (Zeph. ii. 9) are meant such pits as the Arabs still dig on the shore of the Dead Sea in order that they may be filled when the spring freshets cause the sea to overflow. Then, when the water has evaporated, the sides of the pits are found to be incrustated with salt an inch thick.]

WILHELM PRESSEL.

SALT SEA (Deut. iii. 17; Josh. iii. 16, xii. 3), commonly, although never in the Bible, called the Dead Sea. The Bible writers also call it the "sea of the plain" (Deut. iv. 49), the "east sea" (Joel ii. 20; Ezek. xlvii. 18; Zech. xiv. 8), and "vale of Siddim" (Gen. xiv. 3). The designation "Dead Sea" was given by early Greek writers: so the Arabs call it, more commonly, however, Bahr Lût ("Lake of Lot"). It is sixteen miles east from Jerusalem, is forty-six miles long, and ten and a third wide at the widest part, and covers nearly three hundred square miles. In shape it is oblong; on each side are mountains. The Jordan empties into it, as do also several minor streams; but the lake has no outlet: hence the water is impregnated with mineral substances, containing, on an average, twenty-five per cent of solid substances, half of which is common salt, and has extraordinary buoying qualities, and a specific gravity of from 1.021 to 1.256. From the presence of chloride of magnesium the water gets its bitter taste; from chloride of calcium, its smooth and oily touch. The lake is surrounded by "unmixed desolation." But it is not true that birds flying over it drop dead, for there are numerous varieties of birds on its shores; but no fish can live in it. The bottom of the lake is gradually sinking. See Lieut. W. F. LYNCH: Narrative of the United States Expedition to the River Jordan and the Dead Sea, Phila., 1819, 9th ed., 1853; F. SALTZMANN, Friedrich Rudolph, b. at Strassburg, March 9, 1749; studied jurisprudence and history; travelled as tutor to Baron von Stein, afterwards Prussian minister of state; settled in 1776 in his native city, and began publishing a political paper, but was suspected of aristocratic tendency, and compelled to flee in 1793. After the fall of Robespierre he returned, and resumed his activity as an editor. But in the mean time a great change had taken place in his inner religious life. He had become acquainted with the French and German mystics; and though he kept aloof from the so-called spiritists, Mesmer, Cagliostro, etc., he became himself a pronounced mystic. Of his religious writings, Es wird alles neu werden (1802-10), Das christl. Erbauungsblatt (appearing from 1805 for several years), Blicke in das Geheimniss des Rathschlusses Gottes (1810), Religion der Bibel (1811), found many readers on both sides of the Rhine, and even in Northern Germany. He died after 1820. MATTER.

SALVATION ARMY, The, is a body of men and women, joined together after the fashion of an army, with a general, colonels, majors, captains, and lower officers, under whom are the privates, bent, as they claim, upon presenting the gospel in a manner to attract the attention of the lowest classes. Its organizer and leader is William Booth, by baptism a member of the Church of England, but by conversion a Wesleyan, and afterwards a minister of the Methodist New Connection. In this latter capacity he had great success; but in 1861 he withdrew from the regular ministry, and devoted himself to independent evangelistic work. In 1865 he came to the east of London, and there began the movement which resulted in the organization of the "Salvation Army" in 1876. The name comes from the methods adopted and the object aimed at. The army studiously avoids, as far as may be, religious phraseology, calling its places of meeting "Salvation Warehouses" and "Salvation Stores," puts its notices in military or startling terms, and deliberately adopts peculiar posters and window placards to announce its presence and work. Its object is everywhere to make a sensation. The expenses of the army are borne by collections. Care is taken to have its pecuniary affairs as public as possible, and its expenses low. In doctrine it is broadly evangelical. It does not teach sinless perfection, but the possibility of "a heart from which the blood of Christ has cleansed away all unrighteousness." It does not seek to draw persons from existing churches; but it desires to make converts among the most abandoned classes, who lie outside of religious influences. Much noise and confusion attend its operations, but these it considers necessary accompaniments. The members of the army wear a peculiar though plain uniform, parade the streets with martial the Salzburg Protestants to come and settle under his sceptre. The archbishop was compelled to yield, and a regular emigration was arranged. No less than 18,000 people were removed to Prussia, and Leopold Anton lived to see thorns and thistles cover large tracts of his country. See GÜCKING: *Emigrationsgeschichte der Salz. SAMARIA AND THE SAMARITANS. Samaria is the name of a city of the province. 1. City. It was, according to 1 Kings xvi. 23, 24, built by Omri, the sixth king of Israel, who, after the burning-down of his palace at Tirzah, bought a hill from a certain Shemer, on which he built a city which he called Shomron, after the former possessor. Samaria continued to be the metropolis of Israel for the remaining two centuries of that kingdom's existence; was twice besieged by the Syrians (1 Kings xx. 1; 2 Kings vi. 24-vii. 20), but without effect, till at last it was taken by Shalmaneser (2 Kings xviii. 9, 10), and the kingdom of the ten tribes was destroyed. After this capture, Samaria appears to have continued, for a time at least, the chief city of the foreigners brought to occupy the places of the departed natives. At the time of the Maccabæans, Samaria was again a fortified city; for Josephus describes it as a very strong city (Ant., XIII. 10, 2). John Hyrcanus took it after a year's siege, and razed it (Joseph., Wars, I. 2, 7, Ant., XIII. 10, 2). By directions of Gabinius, Samaria and other demolished cities were rebuilt (Ibid., XIV. 5, 3); but its more effectual rebuilding was undertaken by Herod the Great, who called it Sebaste, in honor of the Emperor Augustus. It was colonized by six thousand veterans and others, for whose support a district surrounding the city was appropriated. Sebaste is to-day a poor village.

2. Province. As such, Samaria is first mentioned 1 Macc. x. 30, then in the New Testament (Luke xvii. 11; John iv. 4 sq.; Acts i. 8, viii. 1, 5, ix. 31, xv. 3), and by Josephus (War, III. 3, 4). Two hours from Samaria, towards the south-east, lies Nablûs, the ancient Sichem, the seat of Samaritan cult, where, for a very long time, the Samaritans, or, as they call themselves, the Shomerim, i.e., custodians of the law, lived.

3. Samaritans. When Cyrus permitted the Jews to rebuild the temple, the colonists of Samaria asked to be permitted to take part in the work of building (Ez. iv. 2). On being refused to do so, the Samaritans succeeded in preventing the erection of the temple for twenty years, and offered the same unrelenting opposition to Nehemiah, when in 445 he set about rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, which till now had lain in ruins. They welcomed with open arms any refugees from Jerusalem, who for crime, or to escape the strict Mosaic rule there established, might wish to leave their country (Jos., Ant., XI. 8, 7). No doubt the stern reforms introduced by Nehemiah on his second visit (Neh. xiii.) were highly distasteful to many who preferred the laxity, which had crept in during his absence, and to these an asylum was always open at Shechem. The alienation between the two nations was finally completed when the Samaritans at last succeeded in erecting a rival temple on Gerizim, and endeavored to transfer thither the prestige of the older one of Jerusalem. The immediate occasion of the undertaking was the refusal of Manasseh, brother of Jaddua the high priest, and son-in-law to Sanballat the Samaritan governor, to dissolve his irregular marriage in obedience to the admonition of the Jewish elders. To reward him for his constancy, Sanballat exerted himself to erect a rival sanctuary, and there established him in the high priesthood. With this the separation between the Jews and Samaritans became final, and up to this day they have perpetuated their mutual hatred. On the troubled scene of politics which opened after the death of Alexander the Samaritans suffered equally with the Jews. Under Ptolemy Lagi, a colony of Jews and Samaritans was deported into Egypt. Under John Hyrcanus, their temple was destroyed about 130 B.C.; and many Samaritans emigrated to Damascus, where they built a temple. Under the Romans, they first enjoyed many liberties; but their unquiet spirit caused them often great troubles. Under Vespasian, a revolt was quelled with the loss of 11,600 persons, and Sichem received a garrison and the name Flavia Neapolis. The rest which they enjoyed under the rule of the Antonines was interrupted under Commodus, Septimius Severus, Constantine, and Constantius. Quieter times fell to their lot under Julian, Valentinian, and Valens: their fortunes varied under the later emperors. Laws unfavorably affecting their position were passed by Honorius and Theodosius II. The latter even forbade them to erect new synagogues. The hatred with which they had formerly regarded their Jewish rivals began to concentrate itself upon the Christians, now that the new faith had become that of the empire. In the year 451, while under the rule of Zeno, they attacked the church at Nablûs, maimed the bishop, and murdered many of the worshippers, committing the like atrocities at Caesarea also. Under Anastasius and Justinian, fresh troubles broke out. In 529 a general revolt of the Samaritans took place against the Christians. The severity with which this was put down by Justinian, followed by the enactment of severe laws against them, completely crushed the Samaritan people. Many fled to Persia; many became Christians. In 636 they fell under Mohammedan rule. During the time of the crusades they came, in 1099, into the power of the crusaders; and, with the exception of some temporary occupations by the Saracens, remained under the Christians till 1244, when they again became subject to Mohammedan rule. Since 1517 they have been under Turkish rule. Brief notices of the Samaritans and their country appear in the works of Benjamin of Tudela (twelfth century). But little was known of them till the close of the sixteenth century, when Joseph Scaliger first opened communications with them, addressing a letter to the congregations at Nablûs and Cairo. Answers arrived in 1589, but not till after Scaliger's death. In 1671 Robert Huntington, bishop of Raphoe, chaplain to the English factory at Aleppo, paid a visit to Nablûs, procured from them a Pentateuch, and in conjunction with Thomas Marshall, rector of Lincoln's College, Oxford, carried on a correspondence with the Samaritans, which lasted, with drumming, banners, and singing, are obligated to go anywhere they may be sent, and exhibit courage bordering upon recklessness. In November, 1883, according to report of the army's "commissioner for the United States of America," the army had 500 stations, 1,400 officers wholly paid by the work in England. It had spread all over Great Britain, the North of Ireland, the United States of America, and had entered Sweden, France, India, Africa, and New Zealand. In the United States it had 50 stations, including 3 in California, 99 permanently engaged officers, and during 1882 and 1883 had purchased, by contributions of "those blessed through the work of the army," nine properties valued at $38,000. The War Cry, the army's organ, had a circulation of twenty thousand weekly. See All about the Salvation Army, London, 1883, 28 pp.

In 1883 the army was expelled from several cantons of Switzerland (Geneva, Bern, and Neuchâtel) as disturbers of the peace.

SALVE, a salutatory formula of great solemnity, is used as the opening word in many celebrated Latin hymns, of which we mention, Salve, caput cruentatum, one of the seven passion-hymns by St. Bernard, translated by Mrs. Charles (Christian Life in Song), "Hail, thou Head! so bruised and wounded;" by Alford (Year of Praise), "Hail! that Head with sorrows bowing;" by Baker (Hymns, Ancient and Modern), "O sacred Head, surrounded." — Salve, festa dies, toto venerabilis ævo, a resurrection-hymn by Venantius Fortunatus, translated into English by Mrs. Charles (l.c.), "Hail, festal day! ever exalted high;" in Lyra Eucharistica, "Hail, festal day! forevermore adored;" in Schaff's Christ in Song, "Hail, day of days, in peals of praise." — Salve, flores martyrum, by Prudentius, translated into English by Chandler (Hymns of the Primitive Church), "Hail, infant martyrs;" by Caswall (Hymns and Poems), "Flowers of martyrdom." — Salve mundi salutare, a passion-hymn, translated into English by Mrs. Charles (l.c.), "All the world's salvation, hail;" and by Kynaston (Lyra Messianica), "Jesus hail! the world's salvation."

SALVIANUS, b. in Gaul, probably at Cologne [Treves], in the beginning of the fifth century; d. as presbyter, in Marseilles, after 495; was an elegant and prolific writer. Of his works are still extant, De avaritia, written about 440, first edited by Richardson, Basel, 1528, a denunciation of the avarice of the laity, in favor of the church; De gubernatione Dei, often called De providentia, written about 451, first edited by Brassicanus, Basel, 1530, a defence of divine Providence, somewhat resembling the De civitate Dei by Augustine; nine letters to different persons. Collected editions of his works were published by Pithoeux (Paris, 1580), Baluzius (Paris, 1669), [C. Halm (Berlin, 1878), F. Pauly (Wien, 1883)]. There is a French translation by Grégoire and Colomitet, Paris, 1831. See also F. PAULY: Die handschriftliche Ueberlieferung des Salvianus, Wien, 1881 (41 pp.).

HERZOG.

SALZBURG. From Bohemia, the Hussite movement penetrated into the diocese of Salzburg, and in 1420 Archbishop Eberhard III. was compelled to employ very severe measures in order to suppress that heresy in his countries. Apparently he succeeded. Nevertheless, the very first writings of Luther caused a singular commotion throughout the whole population; and when Staupitz, Paul Speratus, Stephan Agricola, and Georg Schärer had successively preached the views of the Reformation in the country, the archbishop, Wolfgang Dietrich, found it necessary not only to silence and expel a number of preachers, but to cleanse the very flocks. In 1588 he issued a decree ordering the inhabitants of the city of Salzburg either to return to the Roman-Catholic faith, or to leave the country within a month; and in 1614 the edict was extended to the whole country, and enforced by means of a swarm of Capuchins and a troop of soldiers. Again, for some time, the country seemed on the right path, until in 1685 a priest in the Tefferegger valley discovered a whole congregation of secret Lutherans. They used the Bible, Luther's Catechisms, Spangenberg's postils, and Urban Rhegius's Seelenarzeney (medicine for the soul) for their edification and instruction; and they assembled often in the dead of night for common prayer and singing. The archbishop, Maximilian Gandulph, ordered them to present their confession of faith: but, the confession being a very simple statement of purely biblical views, it was found utterly heretical; and, in spite of the interference of the elector of Brandenburg and the diet of Ratisbon, the archbishop gave his subjects the option between recantation and exile. The next year, however, Gandulph died; and the question was dropped by his successor. But in 1728 Leopold Anton ascended the episcopal chair, and his principal object was to amass power and wealth for himself and his family. The heresy question seemed to him a suitable point of operation; and he declared that he would have the heretics out of the country, even though all the field should be covered with thorns and thistles. The Jesuits were let loose on the population, and chicaneries very rapidly turned into actual persecutions. The old conditions were revived, — recantation, or exile; and, in order to suit the purposes of the archbishop, exile was made to mean confiscation of property, and renunciation of family. As such measures were utterly at variance with the stipulations of the peace of Westphalia, complaints were made both to the emperor in Vienna, and to the diet at Ratisbon; and Prussia, Denmark, Holland, and England interfered. The archbishop charged a committee with investigating the whole matter, and placing it on a legal footing. The committee travelled from county to county to register the names of the Protestants, and hear their complaints; and as it gave golden promises of religious freedom, and justice in every respect, the Protestants were not slow in coming forward. But, when the archiepiscopal government discovered that no less than 20,675 persons wished to separate from the Roman-Catholic Church, it immediately changed its policy. Austrian troops were sent for, and quartered upon the Protestant households; and a kind of dragonades was introduced. Only with great difficulty could the Protestants obtain permission to leave the country, and their children and property were retained. In this great emergency the king of Prussia came to the aid of his co-religionists. He threatened to adopt a similar policy towards his Roman-Catholic subjects, and formally invited intervals, till the latter's death, in 1685. About this time a few letters also passed between them and the celebrated Job Ludolf; and then, with the exception of one letter addressed, in 1790, to their "Samaritan brethren" in France, nothing more is heard of them till 1808, when the bishop and senator Grégoire set about making inquiries with regard to them by means of the French consular agents in Syria. These letters are of high value; and, togetherwith notices which we find in the works of modern travellers, they give us an insight into their literary and religious state. As to their

Doctrines, they are strict monotheists, and reject all images. They believe in angels and astrology. They believe in a day of retribution, when the pious will rise again, false prophets and their followers will be cast into the fire, and burned. The coming of the Messiah is to take place immediately before the day of judgment, or six thousand years after the creation of the world. As these have now elapsed, he now, though all unknown, is going about upon earth. The Samaritans expected in 1853 a great political revolution, and that in 1863 the kings of the earth would assemble the wisest out of all nations, in order, by mutual consent, to discover the true faith. From the Israelites, i.e., Samaritans, will one be sent; and he will be the Taëb. He will gain the day, lead them to Gerizim, where under the twelve stones they will find the Ten Commandments (or the whole Torah), and under the stone of Bethel the temple utensils and manna. Then will all believe in the law, and acknowledge him as their king, and Lord of all the earth. He will convert and equalize all men, live a hundred and ten years upon earth, then die, and be buried near Gerizim; for upon that pure and holy mountain, which is fifteen yards higher than Ebal, no burial can take place. Afterwards will all the earth remain some hundreds of years more, till the seven thousand are completed, and then the last judgment will come on.

Usages. — At the present day the Samaritans celebrate seven feasts in the year; though only one, the passover, is observed with its former solemnities. [A minute and interesting account of the ceremonies of this feast is given by Stanley: History of the Jewish Church, i. pp. 134 sq., 559 sq. The Liturgy for this feast is very rich; thus every evening during the feast the "dream of the priest Abisha" is read, to hear which only the elders are permitted. This dream is contained in Cod. 19007, Add. MSS. Brit. Museum. There are passover hymns composed by the high priests Marka, Pinchas, and Abisha, given by Heidenheim: Vierteljahrsschrift, iii. 94 sq., 357 sq., 475 sq. There exists also a History of the Exodus, a so-called Pesach-Haggadah, which Dr. S. Kohn published, with a German translation, in Abhandlungen der Deutschen Morgenl. Gesellschaft, 1876, No. 4.] The second feast, celebrated on the 21st of Nisan, or last day of unleavened bread, is marked by a pilgrimage to Gerizim. The third feast is Pentecost; the fourth, that of Trumpets; the fifth is the Day of Atonement. The first and eighth days of tabernacles count for the remaining feast-days. The sabbath, moreover, is kept with great strictness: the years of jubilee and release are also still observed.

The Samaritans have two more days of assembly, though they do not count them as holidays, termed Sammoth, on which the number of the congregation is taken; and, in return, every male over twenty years of age presents the priest with half a shekel, in accordance with Exod. xxx. 12-14, receiving from him a calendar for the coming six months, prepared from a table in his possession. From these offerings the priest gains his living. He may consecrate any of his family that he pleases to the priesthood, provided the candidate be twenty-five years of age, and never have suffered his hair to be cut. Like other Orientals, he never removes his turban, and thus is not easily to be distinguished from the rest of the congregation; but, in accordance with Lev. x. 6, he does not "rend his clothes" by wearing a slit on his sleeve, as other Samaritans; and, when the roll of the law is taken from the ark, he, like his assistants, places a cloth, which they call tal-lith, around his head. They wear white turbans; ordinarily they are compelled, by way of distinction from Mohammedans, to wear them of a pale-red color. They may cut their hair, or not, as they please, but not their beards, this being forbidden in Lev. xix. 27, xxi. 5. Women must let their hair grow, and wear no ear-rings, because of them the golden calf was made. For fear of scandalizing the Mohammedans, none but the old ones venture to attend the synagogue. When a boy is born, great rejoicing is held: his circumcision always takes place on the eighth day after birth, even though it be a sabbath. Boys marry as early as fifteen or sixteen, girls at twelve. The Samaritans may marry Christian or Jewish girls, provided they become Samaritans. When a man has a childless wife, he may take a second, but, if she also be barren, not a third. Divorces, though permitted, are uncommon. The dead are prepared for burial by their own friends: the whole body is washed, but especially the hands (thrice), mouth, nose, face, ears, both inside and out (all this is Mohammedan fashion), and lastly the feet. The burial takes place, if possible, before sunset the same day, accompanied with the recitation of the law and hymns. [The following is a part of a litany for the dead: —

"Lord Jehovah, Elohim, for thy mercy and for thine own sake, and for thy name, and for thy glory, and for the sake of our lords Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, and our lords Moses and Aaron and Eleazar and Ithamar and Phinehas and Joshua and Caleb, and the holy angels, and the seventy elders, and the holy mountain of Gerizim, Beth El. If thou acceptest this prayer, may there go forth from before thy holy countenance a gift sent to protect the spirit of thy servant N., the son of N., of the sons of N., . . . daughter . . . from the sons of N. . . . O Lord Jehovah, in thy mercy have compassion on him (or her), and rest his (her) soul in the garden of Eden, and forgive him (or her) and all the congregations of Israel who flock to Mount Gerizim, Beth El. Amen. Through Moses the trusty. Amen. Amen. Amen."]

These readings are continued every day to the next sabbath, the women of the family watching near the grave. On the sabbath it is visited by the whole congregation, except the near relations, who eat there together, reciting part of the law, and singing hymns, finishing the recitation later in the day with the relations.

Of the Old Testament they only have The Pentateuch. — The text differs in many passages from the present Hebrew text, often agreeing with the Septuagint. It is reprinted in the London Polyglot. [The whole Pentateuch is divided into nine hundred and sixty-four paragraphs, or kazzin, and is halved in Lev. vii. 15 (Authorized Version and Hebrew text, viii. 8). As to its critical character, there has always been a difference of opinion; and for nearly two hundred years one of the most extraordinary controversies on record was kept up. The leader in this controversy was J. Morin, who placed the Samaritan Pentateuch far above the received text; and in this opinion he was followed by men like Capellus and others. Others, as De Dieu, Hottinger, Buxtorf, took the opposite view; and while they maintained the superiority of the Hebrew text, yet in doubtful cases, when the Samaritan had an "unquestionably clearer" reading, they would adopt it. Here the matter rested until 1815, when Gesenius abolished the remnant of the authority of the Samaritan Pentateuch by publishing his De Pent. Sam. Origine, Indole et Auctoritate. The subject was taken up again by Kirchheim, and of late by Kohn.] As to their pronunciation of the Hebrew, it differs somewhat from the usual. [According to Petermann's transcription, the first verse in Genesis would read thus: "Baräset bara eluwēm it aššamēm wit aäres."] Besides the Hebrew text of the Pentateuch, the Samaritans have also versions of the same. The most important is the Samaritan Version [published by A. Brüll, in Hebrew characters, in 1875].

The Samaritan, in Greek (τὸ Σαμαριτικόν), probably the same which is mentioned in the Hexapla of Origen.

The Arabic version of the Samaritan Pentateuch, made by Abu Saïd in Egypt, on the basis of the Arabic translation of Saadia. An edition of this version was commenced by Kuenen at Leyden. Genesis was published in 1851; Exodus and Leviticus, in 1854.

The other literature of the Samaritans is very unimportant. They have ten prayer-books for the sabbaths and feasts, besides two collections of hymns, which they call Durrân ("string of pearls") and Dešer ("book"). Of their chronicles, we mention the Samaritan Chronicle, or Book of Joshua (sent to Scaliger by the Samaritans of Cairo in 1584: it was edited by Juynboll, Leyden, 1848), the Chronicle of Abûl-Fath, full of fables, and containing little useful matter [published recently by Vilmar, with the title Abulfathi Annales Samaritani, etc., Gotha, 1865].

Sects.—Concerning the sects, Abûl-Fath's statement is as follows: A sect appeared calling themselves "Dostân," or "The Friends," which varied in many respects from the traditions of their fathers respecting many religious matters. Thus they held for impure a fountain into which a dead insect had fallen, altered the time for reckoning the purification of women and commencement of feasts, forbade the eating of eggs which had been laid, allowing those only to be eaten which were found inside a slain bird, considered dead snakes and cemeteries as unclean, and held any one whose shadow fell upon a grave as impure for seven days. They rejected the words "Blessed be our God forever," and substituted Elohim for Jehovah; denied that Gerizim had been the first sanctuary of God; upset the Samaritan reckoning for the feasts, giving thirty days to each month, rejecting the feasts and order of fasts, and the portions due to the Levites. They counted the fifty days to Pentecost from the sabbath, the day after the first day of the passover, like the Jews, not from the Sunday like the other Samaritans. Their priests, without becoming impure, could enter a house suspected of infection, as long as they did not speak. When a pure and a doubtful house stood side by side, the condition of the latter was decided by watching whether a clean or unclean bird first settled upon it. On the sabbath they might only eat and drink from earthen vessels, which, if defiled, could not be purified: they might give no food or water to their cattle; this was done on the day previous. Their high priest was a certain Zarâ, who had been turned out of his own community for immorality.

At a later period lived Dûsis. Being condemned to death for adultery, he was respited on the promise of sowing dissension among the Samaritans by founding a new sect. He went to Asker (near Nablûs), and formed a friendship with a Samaritan distinguished for his learning and piety. Compelled, however, to fly for his life on account of a false accusation which he had brought against his friend, he took shelter at Shueike with a widow-woman named Amentiu, in whose house he composed many writings; but, finding that a hot pursuit after him was still maintained, he retired to a cave, where he perished of hunger, and his body was eaten by dogs. Before his departure, however, he left his books with his hostess, enjoining her to let no one read them unless he first bathed in the tank hard by. Accordingly, when Levi, the high priest's nephew, arrived with seven others in search of him, they all bathed, one after the other, in the tank; and each, as he emerged from the water, exclaimed, "I believe in thee, Jehovah, and in Dûsis thy servant, and his sons and daughters;" Levi adding, when his turn came, "Woe to us if we deny Dûsis, the prophet of God!" They then took the writings of Dûsis, and found that he had made many alterations in the law, more even than Ezra. They concealed them, and on their return to Nablûs reported that Dûsis had disappeared before they arrived, they knew not whither. At the next passover, Levi had to read out Exod. xii. 22 in the synagogue; but for "hyssop" he substituted "thyme." Corrected by the congregation, he still persevered, crying, "This is right, as God hath said by his prophet Dûsis, on whom be peace! Ye are all worthy of death for denying the prophetic office of his servant Dûsis, altering the feasts, falsifying the great name of Jehovah, and persecuting the second prophet of God, whom he hath revealed from Sinai. Woe unto you that you have rejected and do not follow him!" Levi was stoned. His friends dipped a palm-leaf in his blood, and ordained that whoever would read Dûsis' writings, and see the leaf, must first fast seven days and nights. They cut off their hair, shaved their beards, and at their funerals performed many strange ceremonies. On the sabbath they would not move from their place, and kept their feasts only on this day, during which they would not remove their hands from their sleeves. When one of their friends died, they would gird him with a girdle, put a stick in his hand, and shoes on his feet, saying, "If we rise, he will at once get up;" believing that the dead man, as soon as he was laid in the grave, would rise and go to paradise. As to the age in which Dûsis lived, it must have been long before Origen; for this Father, in his Commentary on John xiii. 27 (ed. Lommatsch, ii. 49), tells us that a "certain Dositheus arose, and claimed to be the Messiah. His followers are called Dositheans, who have his books, and tell wonderful stories of him, as if he had not died, and is still alive somewhere." This agrees with the statement of Abûl-Fath concerning Dûsis. According to Origen, Dositheus must have lived long before him, probably in the first, or at least in the second century of the Christian era. That he was the teacher or pupil of Simon Magus, as some have asserted, is an untenable conjecture.

SAMSON (i.e., the destroyer) was an Israelite of the tribe of Dan (Judg. xiii. 2). His birth was announced to his mother, who had long been barren. He was to be a Nazarite from his birth. The mother was directed, accordingly, to conform her own regimen to the tenor of the Nazarite law, and strictly abstain from wine and all intoxicating liquor, and from every species of impure food. Samson was born at Zorah (Josh. xv. 33, xix. 41). When he was grown up, he staid at the camp of the Danites (Judg. xiii. 25), between Zorah and Eshtaol, where "the Spirit of the Lord began to move him at times." From this time his career commences, and his deeds may be divided into six parts.

1. Samson's Wedding.—Samson goes to Timnath, where he met one of the daughters of the Philistines: "it was of Jehovah." The parents object to such a union at first, but at last yield to their son's wish. On his first visit to his future bride, he slew a lion without a weapon; and on his second visit, to espouse her, he found the skeleton, denuded of the flesh by the birds and jackals, occupied by a swarm of bees (Judg. xiv. 1-8). At his wedding-feast he propounded a riddle, the solution of which referred to his obtaining a quantity of honey from the carcass of a slain lion; and the clandestine manner in which his guests got possession of the clew to the enigma cost thirty Philistines their lives (Judg. xiv. 10-20).

2. Samson's Vengeance (Judg. xv. 1-8).—The ill treatment which he had received at the hands of his father-in-law, who, upon a frivolous pretext, had given away his daughter in marriage to another man, prompted Samson to a vindictive deed, which was executed by securing a multitude of jackals, and, by tying firebrands to their tails, setting fire to the cornfields of his enemies. The indignation of the Philistines, on discovering the author of the outrage, vented itself upon the family of his father-in-law, who had been the remote occasion of it, in the burning of their house, in which both father and daughter perished. This cruelty provoked Samson, and he smote them "hip and thigh with a great slaughter."

3. The Battle Ramath-lehi, i.e., at the lifting-up of the Jawbone.—Having taken his residence at Ètam, he was thence dislodged by consenting to a pusillanimous arrangement on the part of his own countrymen, by which he agreed to surrender himself in bonds, provided they would not themselves fall upon him and kill him. Being brought, in this apparently helpless condition, to a place called, from the event, Leli ("a jaw"), his preternatural potency suddenly put itself forth, and snapping the cords asunder, and snatching up the jawbone of an ass, he dealt so effectually about him, that a thousand men were slain on the spot. Wearied with his exertions, Samson became faint from thirst. God heard his prayer, and caused a stream to gush from a hollow rock hard by; and Samson gave it the name of En-hak-kore (i.e., the well of him that heareth).

4. The Gates of Gaza at Hebron (Judg. xvi. 1-3). — Samson suffered himself weakly to be drawn into the company of a woman of loose character at Gaza. The inhabitants attempt to detain him at Gaza by closing the gates of the city, and making them fast; but Samson, apprised of it, rose at midnight, and breaking away bolts, bars, and hinges, departed, carrying the gates to a hilltop near Hebron.

5. The Attempted Outwitting in the Valley of Sorek (Judg. xvi. 4-14). — Here he lived with Delilah. Tempted by the bribe of the Philistines, she employs all her arts to worm from him the secret of his strength. Three times he deceived her, abasing at the same time the Philistines lying in wait.

6. Samson's Self-treachery and Death (Judg. xvi. 15-31). At last, in a moment of weakness, Samson disclosed to Delilah the fact that his strength lay in his hair, — not that it really lay in his hair, but in the fact that it arose from his relation to God as a Nazarite. The Philistines, having deprived him of sight, at first immured him in a prison, and made him grind at a mill like a slave. In the process of time his hair recovered its growth, and Samson experienced the help of Jehovah (Judg. xvi. 28). A feast was celebrated in honor of Dagon, and Samson was ordered to be brought out to be made a laughing-stock for the immense multitude. He grasped the massive pillars; and, bowing with resistless force, the whole building fell upon the lords and upon all the people that were therein. "So the dead which he slew at his death were more than they which he slew in his life." His brethren buried him between Zorah and Eshtaol, in the burying-place of his father.

SAMSON, Bernhardin, a Franciscan monk noted for his traffic in indulgences in Switzerland. He was a native of Milan, but the dates of his birth and death are not known. He entered Switzerland as the agent of Cardinal Forli, who had charge of the sale in that region; but his behavior caused much scandal, and after some disastrous encounters with Zwingli and Bullinger he was recalled by Leo X. Nothing further is known of him. See HOTTINGER: Helvetische Kirchengeschichte, Zürich, 1708 (iii.).

SAMUEL was born as the son of Elkanah, an Ephrathite, at Ramathaim-zophim, in the mountain of Ephraim, and was of Levitical descent; but not only did he perform priestly functions, but his descendants also, like Heman his grandson, one of the chief singers in the Levitical choir, are counted as belonging to the Levites. His mother, Hannah, for a long time childless, sought from God the gift of a son, whom she dedicated to the Lord before his birth, to the office of a Nazarite. When the son was born, she called him Samuel, "the asked, or heard of God." As soon as he was weaned, she brought him unto the house of the Lord (1 Sam. i. 24), where he afterwards remained. He was dressed in a sacred garment, an ephod of white linen; and his mother gave him every year a little mantle reaching down to his feet. And "the child Samuel grew on, and was in favor both with the Lord, and also with men" (ii. 26).

Samuel's Call. — Times looked rather gloomy in Israel. Eli the high priest was a weak character; his sons prostituted the sanctuary; the people served idols; and the oppressive power of the Philistines was felt. Thus it was that Samuel had no idea how the Lord revealed himself to the prophets, the messengers of his word (1 Sam. iii. 1, 7). While he was sleeping, he received his first revelation, or communication, — the doom of Eli's apostate house (iii. 11-14). Other revelations speedily followed this. The frequency of God's messages to the young prophet established his fame: his words were treasured up, and Shiloh became the resort of those who came to hear him (iii. 19-21). Samuel was not only a prophet like others, but he is also the first of the regular succession of prophets (Acts iii. 24). His influence at the beginning of his career — "and the word of Samuel came to all Israel" (1 Sam. iv. 1) — paved the way for his judicial administration; and, although he was neither called nor elected to this office, yet "Samuel judged the children of Israel in Mizpeh" (vii. 6). But the zenith of his prophetic activity was the election, rejection, and second election of the theocratic king (viii.-xvi.), which was mediated by his office. After having anointed David as king (xvi. 13 sq.), he retired to his house at Ramah; and, besides his death (xxv. 1), only his apparition at Endor is recorded (xxviii.). Samuel's prophetic activity was not confined to a mere receiving and communicating the divine word, but he also founded and guided those societies which are known as the schools of the prophets. The spirit of prophecy, it seems, had in the time of Samuel gained possession of many. In order to keep away all impure elements, it was necessary to conserve and purify those of whom the Spirit had thus taken a hold by teaching and discipline; and to achieve this Samuel formed them into one congregation near Ramah, where they lived in habitations (Heb., Naioth, xix. 19 sq.), Samuel "standing appointed over them" (xix. 20), ruling and leading them by the power of his spirit.

Samuel's judicial activity was not only the outgrowth of the prophetic office, but was also constantly guided by it. We must not only suppose that he dispensed judgment with prophetic wisdom, but that he also pleaded the cause of the people as a man who had the spirit of God. Although Samuel had never drawn the sword, except in one case (1 Sam. xv. 33), yet he was a hero. He was the first who gained such a decisive victory over the Philistines, that all the days of Samuel they never again attacked the Israelites (vii. 13); and the Eben-ezer stone was the sign of victory which Samuel put up. As to the manner in which Samuel exercised his judicial office, we know that he annually visited, in discharge of his duties as ruler, the three chief sanctuaries, — Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpeh (vii. 16). At other times he lived at Ramah, and exercised his functions there (vii. 17). When he became old, he appointed his sons Joel and Abiah as judges, not to take his place, but to relieve him. They were judges at Beersheba (viii. 2). But these sons possessed not their father's integrity of spirit, but "turned aside after lucre, took bribes, and perverted judgment" (viii. 3); so the elders of the people came to him and said. "Behold, thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways: now make us a king" (viii. 5). Although the Lord fulfilled the desire of the people, yet the people sinned in preferring the splendor of an outward, visible kingdom to the glory of the invisible kingdom of Jehovah (viii. 7, x. 19, xii. 12, 16 sq.). At the command of God, Samuel anointed and made Saul king, and then retired from public office (xii.). Saul proved himself incapable of leading the people. Samuel's help was often needed. When after the rejection of Saul, and David's anointing to the throne, Samuel felt assured that David was the man after God's heart, able to build up the kingdom of Israel, he retired entirely from public life. Only once again he came forward before his death to defend the anointed of the Lord against the rejected by the Lord (xix. 18-24). It may be that in his retirement Samuel put in writing what is called (1 Chron. xxix. 29) the "Book of Samuel."

Samuel's Priesthood. — In this direction Samuel only filled a gap out of necessity. Eli was dead, and his two sons also. The ark was taken, Shiloh was desolated. In this time of need Samuel restored the orphaned priesthood by building an altar at Ramah (1 Sam. vii. 17). Here, as well as at Mizpeh (vii. 5), Gilgal (xi. 15), and Bethlehem (xvi. 2 sq.), he offered sacrifices. His priestly function, however, consisted not merely in sacrificing, but more especially in praying for the people (vii. 5, 8, viii. 6, xii. 16-23); and the efficacy of the power of his prayer is often mentioned (Ps. xcix. 6; Jer. xv. 1).

In reviewing the whole career of Samuel, we notice that he forms a transition period. He is the last judge, and mediates the reconstruction of the theocracy by founding the royal and prophetic offices, which again were of the greatest influence for the formation of the priestly office. Some regard Samuel as a type of John the Baptist. It cannot be denied that there are many striking parallels between both, but the Baptist's activity was not as comprehensive as Samuel's. John was nothing but a voice of one crying in the wilderness, whilst Samuel had to reform and to guide the whole religious and political life of the nation. Samuel died at Ramah (1 Sam. xxv. 1, xxviii. 3). All Israel lamented him. He was buried in his house at Ramah. See the works of KNOBEL: *Prophet d. SAMUEL, Books of, so called because he is the prominent figure in their history, not because he was their author. They originally formed one book, as the Massoretic note to 1 Sam. xxviii. 24, which states that this verse is the middle of the book, incontestably proves. In the Septuagint they are called "The First and Second Book of the Kings." Daniel Bomberg was the first to introduce the division into the printed Hebrew text (Venice, 1517). The Book of Samuel links itself directly to Judges, which presents the confusion of that period by showing how the monarchy arose, and reached its height. It divides itself into three principal parts: (A) The history of Samuel, the last judge and the prophetic founder of the monarchy (1 Sam. i.-xii.); (B) The history of Saul, the first king of Israel (xiii.-xxxi.); (C) The history of David (2 Sam. i.-xxiv.). The death of David is given in 1 Kings. The book is a unit, but flows not from one source, but from several, which the author combines, without, however, being able always to disguise the fact. But the modern critics overdo the matter when they find everywhere contradictions. And they do not agree in tracing the sources. For instance, M. Duncker, Seinecke, and Reuss try to make out that the history of Saul's elevation to the monarchy rests upon three different and mutually exclusive accounts: (1) xi., which they say is the original historical account; (2) ix. 1-x. 16; (3) viii., x. 17-27. Dillmann and Wellhausen trace it to two sources: (1) ix. 1-10, 16, x. 27<sup>b</sup>-xi. 11, 15; (2) viii. 10, 17-27<sup>a</sup>, xi. 12-14. Wellhausen considers the second account as unhistorical, and of exilic or post-exilic origin. Dillmann maintains that one or the other must be false. But since the editor of the book, if he did really make up his history out of two different sources, evidently considered them of equal value, and mutually supplementary, the first question to be answered is, Was he not right? Of course, if there is no living God who regulates the future in its smallest details, and can reveal it, then both accounts are equally unhistorical. But, if there be such a God, then there is no difficulty in accepting both accounts as true, and fitting together.

It is true that in First Samuel there are told several similar stories, — Saul's inspiration (x. 10-12 and xix. 22-24), his rejection as king (xiii. 8-14 and xv. 12 sqq.), his madness (xviii. 10 sq. and xix. 9 sqq.), David's sparing of Saul (xxiv. and xxvi.), David's flight to the Philistines (xxi. 10-15 and xxvii. 1 sqq.); but the second story is not an exact repetition of the first. The circumstances were similar: hence the same general result followed, yet they were not identical in the two. It is also true that there are genuine repetitions and breaks, formal incongruities and contradictions, transpositions, etc. Cf. vii. 12, 13 with ix. 16, x. 5, xiii., which is intelligible only on the supposition that there was a fresh attack of the Philistines (xi. 15), or that Samuel's victory was temporary. Again: in David's early history there is some confusion. In Second Samuel, otherwise more united, there are some such phenomena: e.g., 2 Sam. vii. 1, 9, speaks of David's peace resulting from the wars mentioned in the next chapter; between xiv. 27 and xviii. 18 nothing is said about Absalom's death. The present Hebrew text of the book is defective and faulty: e.g., 2 Sam. xxi. 8, Michal for Merab; the name of Goliath's brother, missing in 2 Sam. xxi. 19, is to be supplied from 1 Chron. xv. 5. But the attempts (Thenius and Wellhausen) to make up deficiencies by the aid of the LXX. are conjectural, and more or less arbitrary.

While the author of Kings regularly names his sources, the author of Samuel does this only once (2 Sam. i. 18). But it is probable that the author had recourse to the official records spoken of in 1 Chron. xxix. 29. The book contains Ps. xviii. and the "last words of David" (2 Sam. xxiii. 1-7). The time of composition was after David's death (2 Sam. v. 5), after the separation of the kingdom, but before the downfall of Judah (1 Sam. xxvii. 6). Many rabbis make Jeremiah to be the author. But in truth, neither author nor definite date can be assigned to it. The author is, however, no mere compiler, but one, who, in the true prophetic spirit, made thorough use of the sources. The book takes high rank in literary and historical respects. The style is classic and graphic. The honest and impartial character of the prophetic author comes out in his statement of many things which were in plain contradiction to the Mosaic law, and in his faithful and unvarnished account of David's failings, notwithstanding his prejudice in his favor.

SANBAL'LAT (Heb., סַנְבַּלֶּט, or סַנְבַּלֶּט, so Baer and Delitzsch; LXX., Σαβαλλάτ; a name, probably of Assyro-Babylonian origin, i.e., Sin-uballit, "Sin [moon-god] bestowed life") is mentioned in the following passages of the Bible, all in the Book of Nehemiah: Neh. ii. 10, 19, iv. 1 sq. (Heb. iii. 33 sq.), iv. 7 sqq., cf. 15 (Heb. iv. 1 sqq., cf. 9), vi. 1-5 sqq., 12-14, xiii. 28. He headed the opposition which Nehemiah encountered in carrying out the plan of rebuilding Jerusalem, and re-establishing there a Hebrew national life. See NEHEMIAH.

We are told that Sanballat, and Tobiah "the servant, the Ammonite," were greatly displeased at the news of Nehemiah's coming, because of his interest in "the welfare of the children of Israel" (Neh. ii. 10). On learning of the determination formed by the Hebrews to build the walls of the city, these two, with "Geshem the Arabian," laughed scornfully, and contemptuously accused them of a rebellious purpose against the king, Artaxerxes (ii. 1); i.e., Artaxerxes Longimanus. When, in spite of this, Sanballat found the work actually in progress, although still contemptuous, he grew very angry, and roused the hostility of "his brethren and the army of Samaria" (iv. 1 sq. = Heb. iii. 33 sq.). At length he conspired with Tobiah "and the Arabians and the Ammonites and the Ashdodites"—hostile peoples on various sides of Jerusalem—to go up and hinder the work by force (iv. 7 sqq. = Heb. iv. 1 sqq.). The plot, however, became known to Nehemiah, and was abandoned (iv. 15 = Heb. iv. 9). After the wall was finished, Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem endeavored to secure the person of Nehemiah by inviting him to a conference. Four messengers in succession, followed by a letter, in which Sanballat mentioned rumors that charged Nehemiah with treason, failed to entice the latter (vi. 1-5 sqq.); and even the expedient of bribing a man to prophesy danger, and so to induce Nehemiah to shut himself up in the temple, was fruitless (vi. 12-14). After this we hear nothing more of Sanballat, except that a son of "Joiada, the son of Eliashib the high priest," was his son-in-law. This alliance seems to have taken place during an absence of Nehemiah from Jerusalem (cf. xiii. 6), and probably betokens a scheme of Sanballat to gain influence among the Hebrews, since he could not successfully oppose them by force (cf. xiii. 1, 7, 8).

It remains to inquire who Sanballat was. He is called "the Horonaim" (Heb., הֹרֹנַיִם; LXX., δ' Ἀρονί and τοῦ Οἰπαριῶν) (Neh. ii. 10, 19, xiii. 28). We cannot be sure whether this appellation is derived from Horonaim, a city of Moab (Isa. xv. 5, etc., and Mesha-stone), or Beth-horon, in Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 3, 5, etc.). In favor of Horonaim is the association of Sanballat with Tobiah the Ammonite and Geshem the Arabian, and more particularly the fact that his daughter's marriage with the high priest's grandson is classed with the marrying of "wives of Ashdod, of Ammon, and of Moab" (Neh. xiii. 28, cf. 23, 29). Against Horonaim is the lack of the term "Moabite" in connection with Sanballat, although this may be due to the fact (see below) that he did not properly belong to that people. In favor of Beth-horon is Sanballat's apparent residence in the territory of Samaria, and particularly his endeavor to have a meeting with Nehemiah at Ono in Benjamin (see vi. 2 and cf. xi. 31, 35), which cannot have been very far from Beth-horon. In any case his name points to Assyria or Babylonia as the original home of his family. They may have been among the colonists transported to the "western country" by Sargon or Esarhaddon (see those arts.). There is no evidence that Sanballat held any official position in Samaria under the Persian king. He seems to be distinct from "the governors beyond the river" (ii. 7, 9); and a Persian official would hardly have ventured to oppose so persistently one who, like Nehemiah, brought a commission from the king. We know nothing definite about "his brethren and the army of Samaria" (iv. 2 = Heb. iii. 34); but it seems to have been personal influence, and not official authority, which he exercised over them. The Sanballat (Σαβαλλάτης) whom Josephus (Ant., XI. 7, 2 sq.) names as satrap of Samaria was a contemporary of Alexander the Great. It is interesting to notice, however, that Josephus calls him a Cuthean (cf. Cutlah, Cuth, a Babylonian city, 2 Kings xvii. 24, 30), and says he gave his daughter in marriage to Manasses, brother of Jaddus, the high priest, that he might conciliate the favor of the Jewish nation. There may be here some confusion with the earlier biblical Sanballat.

SANCHEZ, Thomas, b. at Cordova, 1550; d. at Granada, May 19, 1610; entered the Society of Jesus in 1566; studied theology, philosophy, and jurisprudence; became director of the school at Granada, and acquired great fame as a moral philosopher by his De sacramento matrimonii (Geneva, 1592), though it was severely attacked by some on account of its cynicism and rudeness. His collected works appeared in Venice, 1740, in seven volumes.

SANCHUNIATHON, an old Phœnician scholar living before the Trojan war, is mentioned by Athenæus, Porphyry, and Suidas; and Eusebius adds that Philo translated one of his works into Greek (φονικικά). Neither the original nor the translation is extant; but Eusebius gives some extracts, which have been collected and edited by Orelli (Leipzig, 1826) and by C. Maeller, in his Fragmenta historicorum graecorum (Paris, 1849, iii. pp. 560-575). The trustworthiness of these fragments, even the very existence of the author, has been much debated. (See LOBECK: Aglaophamus, ii. 1273.) It is now generally agreed, however, that they really contain true historical materials. See EWALD, in Abhandlungen d. Göttinger Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften, 1851, vol. v.; and RENAN: Mémoire sur Sanchuniathon, Paris, 1858; BAUDISSIN: Studien, i., 1876, pp. 1-16 ("Über den religionsgeschichtlichen Werth der phöniciſchen Geschichte Sanchuniathon's"), and his art. in *HERZOG*², vol. xii., pp. 364-372.

SANCROFT, William, D.D., English prelate; b. at Freshingfield, Suffolk, Jan. 13, 1616; d. there Nov. 24, 1693. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship in 1642, which, however, he lost in 1649 for refusing to sign the Solemn League and Covenant. On leaving Cambridge he retired to the Continent; returned at the Restoration; became successively chaplain to Cosin, bishop of Durham (1660), university preacher, D.D. and master of his college (1662), dean of York (1663), dean of St. Paul's (1664), archdeacon of Canterbury (1668), and archbishop of Canterbury (1677). He attended Charles II. on his death-bed (February, 1685), and crowned James II. (May 3, 1685). He would not act on James's ecclesiastical commission, and was one of the famous seven bishops (Sancroft of Canterbury, Turner of Ely, Lake of Chichester, White of Peterborough, Trelawny of Bristol, Ken of Bath and Wells, and Lloyd of St. Asaph) who refused to read James's Declaration of Indulgence, and in consequence were confined in the Tower, and tried, but were triumphantly acquitted. (See STOUTON: Religion in England, new ed., vol. iv. 138-156.) Sancroft also refused to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary, 1688, and was deprived February, 1691. He retired to his native place. His Predestinated Thief (Latin, 1651, Eng. trans., 1814), Sermons (1691), Occasional Sermons (1703), and Nineteen Familiar Letters (1737), have been published. See his life by GEORGE D'OYLY (London, 1821, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1840) and by Miss AGNES STRICKLAND, in Lives of the Seven Bishops (1866, pp. 1-103).

SANCTIFICATION is, according to the Scriptures, the fundamental principle of religious morality. Its roots strike down into the holiness of God, which is the main element in the Old-Testament conception of God. Jehovah is the Holy One (Isa. vi.), who not only is free from all sin and impurity, but institutes a holy people, and develops it through the Holy Spirit. Christ addressed God as the Holy Father (John xvii. 11); and it is because God is holy that we are urged to sanctify ourselves, or become holy (Lev. xi. 44, 45; 1 Pet. i. 16). This vocation to become holy was symbolized in the arrangements and furniture of the temple, which was altogether holy, and consecrated to the Lord. Sanctification consists in withdrawal from the world, and presentation to God. Christ, who was holy from his birth, also sanctified himself for the world (John xvii. 19), completing the work by his self-sacrifice on the cross. Christians are designated "saints" (holy ones, Acts ix. 32; Rom. xv. 26), not only because they are called to become holy, but because they receive with their faith in Christ his holiness or righteousness as their own. Christ is made unto believers sanctification (1 Cor. i. 30). Sanctification is treated of, now as an act of God, or Christ, or the Holy Spirit, now as an act of man. God sanctifies (John xvii. 17), and man enters into the redeeming, justifying, sanctifying economy of God (Eph. i. 4; 1 Pet. i. 15).

The Roman-Catholic Church confounds sanctification with justification. The Council of Trent (VI. 7) says that justification is not only forgiveness of sin, but the sanctification and renewal of the inner man. The Apology of the Augsburg Confession, on the other hand, defines justification to be a forensic act, a declaration that a person is righteous. But inasmuch as this forensic act is an actual forgiveness of sins, and a reception into the new life, it is also a creative act. What the Protestant confessions insist on is the clear distinction between the instantaneous act of justification on the part of God and the continued and gradual process of sanctification. By the act of God's justification the believer is made a creature of God: in sanctification he carries on what God has begun, and realizes the Christ in his own life. Justification is the germ of our new life, a single act: sanctification is a gradual process, the development of this new life. J. P. LANGE.

SANCTION, Pragmatic (Pragmatica sanctio, or simply pragmatica), was in the later Roman imperial times a rescript of the emperor, couched in formal language, particularly one respecting the public law, issued on request of a city, province, or church (Coll. Justin., l. 12, § 1 de ss. eccles. i. 2). It was called "pragmatic" because it was issued after consultation and treaty concerning the matter (πράγμα). The term through the middle age, and down to modern times, has been especially used of laws respecting weighty matters. Of pragmatic sanctions affecting the church, the chief are,— für hist. Theol., 1856, pp. 371-150), the attempt must be given up. See the text of the edict in Mansi, 23, 1259.

1. That of Louis IX. of France (1268), which was the first ordinance of the thirteenth century designed as a check to the undue extension of Papal power and to the misuses of the curia, particularly to the excessive demands for tithes, and to the enlargement of Papal reservations respecting benefices. It consists of six articles. It allows all prelates, patrons, and ordinary collators of benefices, the fullest exercise and unhindered preservation of their jurisdiction, and forbids simony. This sanction was the first important law on the side of "Gallican liberty." The opponents of Gallicanism have, therefore, always endeavored to show that it is a forgery (comp. R. ROSEN: Die pragmatische Sanction, welche unter dem Namen Ludwigs IX., etc., München, 1853); but, after SOLDAN's exhaustive essay (Zeitschr.

2. That of Charles VII. of France (La pragmatique de Bourges), issued July 7, 1438, in consequence of a national council which indorsed the reform edicts of the Council of Basel, but offered certain modifications respecting the French Church. The edict consists of twenty-three articles, and enforces the decrees of the council. It asserts the superiority of œcumenical councils to the Pope, and confirms the admired usages, observances, and statutes of the French Church. It forbids Papal encroachments. It was, however, an invasion of the ecclesiastical by the civil power. No account was taken of the Pope in the issuing of the edict. Accordingly, Pius II. (1458-64) declared it to be an infringement of the Papal prerogatives, and demanded of the French bishops to bring about its repeal. Charles VII. replied by an appeal to a general council. It was, indeed, repealed by Louis XI. in 1461, to get the Papal assistance in making good his claims upon Naples; but the Parliament of Paris refused to assent to the king's action; and, as he did not get the desired Papal help, he let the matter drop. In 1499 Louis XII. renewed the sanction, and it has not been since really withdrawn. See the text in DE VILERAULT: Ordonnances, 13, 267 sqq.; and comp. HEFELE: Conciliengeschichte, vii. 762; P. HINSCHUS: Kirchenrecht, 3, 409 sqq.

3. The so-called German Pragmatic Sanction of the diet of Frankfort in 1439. The designation is misleading. It is not a law; since it was not approved by the kings present, and never proclaimed as a law of the empire: it is rather a provisional act of union between some German princes who took exception to the findings of the Council of Basel respecting certain alterations in the affairs of the German nation and its component parts. Comp. PICKERT: Die kurfürstliche Neutralität während des Baseler Concils, Leipzig, 1858.

SANDEMAN and the SANDEMANIANS. Robert Sandeman — b. at Perth, Scotland, 1718; d. at Danbury, Conn., America, 1771 — was a son-in-law of John Glass (see art.), and an elder of the Glassite Church in Edinburgh, but removed in 1760 to London, where he formed a congregation, and in 1764 to America, where he continued active for the propagation of his ideas. The sect, however, called "Glassites" in Scotland, and "Sandemanians" in England and America, never attained any high degree of prosperity, and at present it hardly numbers more than two thousand members. Doctrinally they distinguish themselves by defining faith as a mere assent to the teachings and workings of Christ. With respect to liturgy, ritual, and discipline, their differences are more pronounced. They celebrate the Lord's Supper once a week; hold love-feasts, which consist in a common dinner, every Sunday between morning and evening service; abstain from blood and every thing strangled; and practise a kind of communism, so far as the members hold their property subject to the call of the church. Their ideas are best learned from the writings of Sandeman: Letters on Theron and Aspasio (Edinburgh, 1757), Thoughts on Christianity, Sign of the Prophet Jonah, Honor of Marriage, etc. See also FULLER:

Letters on Sandemanianism. JOHN GLASS'S Treatise on the Lord's Supper (Edinburgh, 1743) was reprinted, London, 1883.

SANDWICH (or HAWAIIAN) ISLANDS, The, a group of eight inhabited and four uninhabited islands in the Northern Pacific Ocean, were first discovered by the Spanish navigator Gaetano, 1512, and visited by Capt. Cook, 1778, and Vancouver, 1792-94. The largest island is Hawaii, one hundred by ninety miles, with two active volcanoes, Kilaua and Mauna Loa; the last eruption being in 1868. Mauna Kea, the highest mountain, rises 13,805 feet above the sea. The capital, Honolulu, situated on the Island of Oahu, is 2,100 miles from San Francisco, and has a population of about 15,000. The city has a good harbor and water-works, is well laid out, and has a number of churches and public buildings. The Hawaiians belong to the Polynesian race, and are allied to the New-Zealanders, Tongans, etc. The population was estimated by Capt. Cook at 400,000, and in 1823 at 142,000. The census of 1836 gave 108,579; of 1860, 69,700; of 1872, 56,897; of 1878, 41,088. The religion of the Hawaiians, before the arrival of the missionaries, was indistinct, but superstitious, permitting human sacrifices, the worship of idols, etc. Polygamy was universal. No word was found in the language for chastity. Infanticide was very prevalent, and Dibble calculated that two-thirds of the children were killed by their parents. The tabu system, by which things and days were set apart as sacred, and individuals were refused contact with each other, was a prominent feature of the life on the islands, and a source of great power to the reigning family and priesthood. The reigning king, Kalakaua, was elected by ballot in 1874.

The first missionaries arrived in the Sandwich Islands March 30, 1820. They were Hiram Bingham and Asa Thurston, both graduates of Andover Seminary, at whose ordination, at Goshen, Conn., Sept. 29, 1819, Rev. Heman Humphrey preached from Josh. xiii. 1, "There remaineth yet very much land to be possessed." The Sandwich Islands had been before the eyes of the Christian public before this. A native, Obookiah by name (b. 1795), was brought to New Haven in 1809. He there met Samuel Mills, and became one of the first pupils at the Missionary Institute at Cornwall, to whose opening his presence had contributed. Obookiah died a Christian in 1818. Nine Hawaiians were educated in the school before its discontinuance in 1826, and some of them returned to their native land as teachers. Much to their surprise, Bingham and Thurston found that the idols had been destroyed, the priesthood abolished, and human sacrifices discontinued. They had ready access to the people, and by 1822 had reduced the language to writing. That year a printing-press was set up. Mr. Ellis, the devoted Polynesian missionary and traveller, visited the islands, and rendered the American missionaries valuable assistance in acquiring the native tongue. In 1823 the missionaries Bishop, Stewart, Richards, Ely, and Goodrich arrived from the United States. The queen-dowager, Keopulani, was baptized in 1823. The king and queen died, of measles, on a visit to England in 1824. The first Roman-Catholic missionaries arrived in 1827, were banished at a later time, but reinstated in 1839 by the French guns. By 1830 twenty books had been printed in the Hawaiian language. In 1834 there were 50,000 learners in the schools. The translation of the Bible was completed on Feb. 25, 1839. Revivals have swept through the island at various times. In 1853 the natives sent missionaries to the Marquesas. In 1863 the Hawaiian Evangelical Association was formed; the churches being declared independent, so far as government was concerned, of the American Board. The entire expense of the mission up to 1869, when the aid of the American churches was declared no longer necessary, was $1,220,000. The total number admitted to communion up to 1870 was 55,300. At the present time the entire population is Christian. The Roman Catholics have made some headway. The Church of England has a bishop of Honolulu and a handful of converts. The Congregational Church is still dominant. On June 15, 1870, a jubilee celebration was held in the large stone church of Honolulu; three thousand crowding into the building, and as many more unable to get admittance. The eloquent Rev. Mr. Kualea preached in Hawaiian, the king being present. Leprosy prevails upon the islands. The Island of Molokai has been set apart for them, and has a population of 800 lepers.

SANDYS, Edwin, archbishop of York; b. near Hawkshead, Lancashire, 1519; d. at York, July 10, 1588. He was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; was converted to Protestantism; elected master of Catherine Hall (1547); was imprisoned in the Tower for espousing the cause of Lady Jane Grey, and then went into voluntary exile until Elizabeth's accession; was bishop of Worcester (1559), of London (1570), and archbishop of York (1576). He took part in the preparation of the Bishops' Bible, and in the revision of the Liturgy. See T. D. WHITAKER: Life of Edwin Sandys, prefaced to an edition of the Archbishop's Sermons, London, 1812; also the Sketch by JOHN AYRE, in his edition of the Sermons for the Parker Society, Cambridge, 1841.

SANDYS, George, son of an archbishop of York; b. at the palace there in 1577; d. at Bexley Abbey, Kent, March, 1644; was educated at Oxford; travelled in the East, 1610-12; was in Virginia, 1621-24, as colonial treasurer, building there "the first water-mill, the first iron-works, and the first ship;" and was for some years an attendant of Charles I., and ended life in scholarly retirement. He published a much-valued Relation of his Oriental journey, 1615; translated Ovid's Metamorphoses, partly at Jamestown, Va., and Grotius' Christ's Passion, 1640; and paraphrased the Psalms (1636), Job, Ecclesiastes, etc. (1638), and the Song of Solomon (1641). These were nearly inaccessible till H. J. TORR issued in 1839 a Selection from them, with prefatory Life:

a complete edition was prepared 1872 by R. HOOPER. In James Montgomery's opinion "his psalms are incomparably the most poetical in the English language, and yet they are scarcely known." Charles I., when a prisoner in Carisbrooke Castle, "vastly delighted to read" them. Fragments of one or two of them may be found in some of the hymn-books. Dryden called Sandys "the best versifier of the former age," and Pope thought English poetry much indebted to his translations. F. M. BIRD.

SANHEDRIN (Matt. v. 22, xxvi. 59; Mark xiv. 55, xv. 1; Luke xxii. 66; John xi. 47; Acts iv. 15, v. 21, 27, 34, vi. 12, 15, xxii. 30, xxiii. 1, 6, 15, 20, 28, xxiv. 20) was the supreme council of the Jewish nation [in and before the time of Christ]. There were two kinds of Synedria, viz., the supreme or metropolitan Sanhedrin, called the Great Sanhedrin, and provincial councils called the Small Sanhedrin, of which we shall speak farther on. We begin with

1. Number of Members, and their Classification in the Sanhedrin. — It consisted of seventy-one members: hence it is also called the Sanhedrin of seventy-one, to distinguish it from the provincial Sanhedrin, which consisted of twenty-three. The members were in part priests (Matt. xxvii. 1; John vii. 32, xi. 47, xii. 10), in part laymen, the elders of the people, and in part scribes (Matt. xxvi. 3, 57, 59, xxvii. 41; Mark viii. 31, xi. 27, xiv. 43, 53, xv. 1; Luke ix. 22, xx. 1, xxii. 66; Acts v. 21, vi. 12, xxii. 30, xxv. 15). The members belonged either to the Pharisees or Sadducees: the scribes probably belonged to the former (Acts v. 17, 34, xxiii. 6). Included in the seventy-one was the president, the Nasi, but not the notaries. The king was not to be president; but the high priest could be, as may be seen from Acts v. 21, 27, xxiii. 2, not, however, because of his dignity as priest. On the right hand of the president sat the ab leth din [i.e., the father of the house of judgment, probably the vice-president]; on the left, the hachani, the sage [referee]. Without the assent of the vice-president, the president could not ordain. The other members of the Sanhedrin sat to the right and to the left, in a semicircle; while the two notaries stood before them, one to the right, and the other to the left. Before them sat three rows of disciples, in places appropriate to their respective attainments. The president assembled the council through his messengers; and, when he entered with his assistants he was received with special ceremony. Qualifications for membership were, that the applicant had already been a member of the smaller council, and that he was morally and physically blameless. He had to be a father of children, good-looking, and learned.

2. Time of Sessions. — The Sanhedrin sat every day, from the termination of the daily morning sacrifice till the daily evening sacrifice, with the exception of the sabbath and festivals.

3. Place of Session. — They generally met in the Hall of Squares, which was built by Simon ben-Shetach. It was a basilica twenty-two ells long and eleven ells wide. Forty years before the destruction of the temple, the sessions of the Sanhedrin were removed from the Hall of Squares to the Halls of Purchase (Aboda Sara, fol. 8, col. 2). After the destruction, the Sanhedrin was removed to Jamniah or Jabneh: it was thence transferred to Usha [under the presidency of Gamaliel II., ben-Simon II., A.D. 80-116], conveyed back to Jabne, and again to Usha, to Shafran [under the presidency of Simon III., ben-Gamaliel II., A.D. 140-163], to Beth-shearim and Sephoris, under the presidency of Jehudah I., the Holy [A.D. 163-193], and finally to Tiberias, under the presidency of Gamaliel III., ben-Jehudah I. [A.D. 193-220], where it became more of a consistory, [but still retaining, under the presidency of Jehudah II., ben-Simon III. (A.D. 220-270), the power of excommunication]: while under the presidency of Gamaliel IV., ben-Jehudah II., it dropped the appellation Sanhedrin, and the authoritative decisions were issued under the name of Beth Hamidrash. Gamaliel VI. [A.D. 400-425] was the last president. With the death of this patriarch, who was executed by Theodosius II., for erecting new synagogues contrary to the imperial inhibition, the title Nasi, the last remains of the ancient Sanhedrin, became wholly extinct in the year 425.

4. Mode of Conducting Trials, Punishments, etc.—Occasional intimations in the Gospels (Matt. xxvi. 62 sq.; Mark xiv. 60 sq.; Luke xxii. 67; John vii. 51, xviii. 19 sq.; Acts iv. 7 sq., v. 27 sq., xxiii. 1), and the canons laid down in the Talmudic treatise Sanhedrin, chaps. iii.-v., give us an idea of the mode of procedure of the Sanhedrin. In capital offences, it required a majority of at least two to condemn the accused, and the verdict of guilty had to be reserved for the following day. The verdict of acquittal could be given on the same day.

5. Jurisdiction of the Great Sanhedrin.—This body had, (1) charge over all matters pertaining to religion and the different religious institutions, and (2) to give decisions in matters concerning a whole tribe [when it was accused of having departed from the living God], a high priest, a disobedient Sanhedrist, false prophets and seducers of the people, blasphemers, etc. It determined whether a war with any nation contemplated by the king was to be waged, and gave the sovereign permission to do so. It also appointed the provincial Sanhedrin, or courts of justice, and regulated the calendar. It inflicted not only bodily punishments (Acts v. 40), but also capital punishments, as stoning, burning, beheading, and strangling. According to the Gospel of John, however, the Jews declare "it is not lawful for us to put any man to death" (John xviii. 31), which agrees with the remark (Sanhedrin, fol. 24, col. 2), "Forty years before the destruction of the temple, the power of inflicting capital punishment was taken away from Israel," which means, that, without the confirmation of the sentence on the part of the Roman procurator, the Jews had not the power to carry the sentence of the Sanhedrin into execution. This is not only confirmed by Josephus (Ant. XX. 9, 1), but by the appeal of Paul to the chief captain (Acts xxii. 25-30), and especially by the whole manner in which the trial of Jesus was conducted. The stoning of Stephen (vii. 54 sq.) was the illegal act of an enraged multitude.

6. Origin and Date of the Great Sanhedrin.—According to the Talmud, the Sanhedrin was instituted by Moses (Sanhedrin, 1, 6) when he appointed seventy elders, who, together with him as their president, were to act as magistrates and judges (Num. xi. 16). According to the Talmud (Moid Katon, 26 a), King Saul was president of the Sanhedrin in his reign, and his son Jonathan was vice-president. After the exile, the Sanhedrin, which existed even in the Babylonian captivity, was re-organized by Ezra. Whatever may be the claims of tradition, there seems to be little doubt that this supreme court, as it existed during the second temple, developed itself while the Greeks ruled over Palestine; and to this fact points the name συνέδριον, synedrion, by which it has come down to us, as this word belongs to the Macedonian period. It is true that Josephus does not mention the Sanhedrin before the conquest of Judaea by Pompey (B.C. 63); but the very fact that it had such power in the time of Hyrcanus II. as to summon Herod to answer for his unjust conduct (Jos. Ant. XIV. 9, 4) shows that it must then have been a very old institution to have acquired such development and authority.

7. The Small Sanhedrin.—Any town or village which had no less than a hundred and twenty representative men had a provincial court, which consisted of twenty-three members. In Jerusalem there were two such courts. They had the power to judge such capital offences as came not within the jurisdiction of the supreme court. They sat every Monday and Thursday, being market-days, in a room adjoining the synagogue. Before the exile, these courts of justice were held in the market-place. There was no appeal to the Great Sanhedrin against the decision of this lesser Sanhedrin. Only when the opinion of the judges was divided did they themselves consult with the supreme court. The stripes to which offenders were sentenced were given in the synagogue by the sexton (cf. Mark xiii. 9 with Matt. x. 17, xxiii. 34). Besides these two courts, there was also one consisting of three judges. There were in Jerusalem alone three hundred and ninety such Sanhedrins. Within the jurisdiction of this court came suits for debts, robbery, bodily injuries, compensation for damages, thefts which involved a twofold, fourfold, or fivefold value to the proprietor.

SARCERIUS, Erasmus, b. at Annaberg, 1501; d. at Magdeburg, 1559. He studied at Leipzig and Wittenberg; was very active in introducing the Reformation in Nassau (1538-48); and was appointed pastor at Leipzig in 1549, and at Magdeburg in 1553. He was a very prolific writer. His principal works are, Conciones annue (1541, 4 vols.), Loci communes Theologie, Von einer Disziplin (1555), Pastorale (1559), etc.

SAR'DIS, the magnificent capital of Lydia, stood in the rich and fertile plain watered by the Pactolos, with its acropolis built on an almost inaccessible rock, a spur of the Tmolos, and was, in the Lydian and Persian period, one of the principal cities of Western Asia in military, commercial, and industrial respects. After the conquest by Alexander the Great, it lost its prominent position, and under the Romans it began to fall into decay. During the reign of Tiberius it was almost completely destroyed by an earthquake, but was rebuilt by the aid of the emperor. Under the Mohammedan rule its ruin became complete, and it is now only a heap of débris. Jews settled early in the city (JOSEPHUS: Antiquit., 11, 10, 21), and it was the seat of a Christian congregation (Rev. i. 11, iii. 1).

SAR'GON (Heb., סַרְגֹּן, better סַרְגִּין — so Baer and Delitzsch; LXX., Ἀρᾶ, corrupt form, cf. Ἀρκείων, Can. Ptol.; Assy., Sar-akin, "He [a god] established the king"), a powerful Assyrian king, successor of Shalmaneser IV., and father of Sennacherib, who reigned B.C. 722-705, is mentioned only once in the Bible (Isa. xx. 1): "In the year of [the] Tartar's coming to Ashdod, when Sargon, king of Assyria, sent him, and he fought against Ashdod and took it," etc. In contrast with this solitary and incidental notice, the Assyrian inscriptions dating from Sargon's reign are numerous, and our knowledge of his achievements fairly complete.

From the facts that he never calls his predecessor his father, and yet that he, his son Sennacherib, and his grandson Esarhaddon, all speak of royal ancestors, it is probable, that, while not in the direct line of descent, he belonged to a branch of the royal family. An ancient Babylonian king bore the same name, so that the Assyrian Sargon is often called Sargon II. He succeeded Shalmaneser IV. during the siege of Samaria, and it was in the first year of his reign (B.C. 722) that the city fell. (See 2 Kings xvii. 6, where nothing indicates that "the king of Assyria" is different from the one mentioned in v. 7. See SHALMANESER.) His inscriptions mention this conquest repeatedly; and in one account there seems to be a reference to the establishment of foreign colonies in the territory of Samaria, in place of the Israelites who were carried away captive (cf. 2 Kings xvii. 24). A confirmation of this appears in the Annals of Sargon, according to which, in B.C. 721 he transported inhabitants of Babylonia to the land of Hatti (properly Hittites, but under Sargon of wider application). Another inscription speaks of his sending colonists from other places to "the land of the House of Omri" (Samaria); and the Annals are authority for the further statement that still other colonists were transported to "the city of Samaria" in B.C. 715. It was in the year 721 that Sargon conquered for the first time Mero-dach-baladan of Babylon (see the art.). 720 was a famous year for Sargon. He conquered Ja-u-bi'di of Hamath in a battle near Karkar, he overthrew Humbanigas of Elam, he defeated Seveh (So), king of Egypt, at Raphia, and took prisoner Hanno of Gaza. The years 719 and 718 were employed in successful campaigns against little known princes, — "Mitatti of Zirkirtu" and "Kiakku of Sinuhita." In 717 occurred a campaign against Pisiri of Gargamis (Karkemish). 716 was spent in subduing a revolt of tributary princes in Armenia. In 715 the king's attention was divided between Armenia, where disturbances continued, and Media; and in this year occurred one of the transportations of colonists, that to Samaria, referred to above. In this year, also, Sargon came for the second time in contact with the Egyptian kingdom, which in the person of its Pharaoh paid him tribute. The Arabian prince Samsich and the Sabeian It'amar did the same. B.C. 714 found Armenia again in revolt, but the result was not successful. In 713 and 712 there were less important campaigns in the East and the West, followed in 711 by the expedition against Azuri, king of Ashdod, resulting in the fall of the city, to which Isaiah refers in the passage cited above (xx. 1). Sargon dwells on this at some length, and it was doubtless a critical campaign for his dominion in south-western Asia. The occasion of it was the refusal of Azuri to pay tribute to Assyria, backed by a league with neighboring princes. This dangerous movement called down the speedy vengeance of the Assyrian king. Azuri was dethroned, and his brother, Ahimit, made king in his place. "The men of Hatti" (the term used here also in a wide sense, see above) rejected this new ruler, and made a certain Jaman their king. Forthwith the Assyrian army came. Jaman fled to Egypt, and Ashdod was captured. We are told further that the king of Ethiopia was terrified at this success of the Assyrians so near the Egyptian frontier, and that he not only commissioned ambassadors to sue for peace for himself, but also gave up the fugitive Jaman, and even sent him in chains to Assyria. It is quite in keeping with the overweening vanity of an Assyrian monarch, that Sargon, in this account, gives no credit to the Tartan, or general, who commanded the army before Ashdod, and narrates this conquest in the first person. But at all events his record gives us a welcome light on the relation of the fall of Ashdod to the prophecy contained in Isa. xx. 2-6. It intimates a close connection between the Philistines and Egypt at the time of the revolt of the former. It was doubtless in dependence upon help from Egypt that the revolt had been undertaken. It is probable that Ashdod had attempted to draw Jerusalem into the conspiracy, and Isaiah's prophetic act and word were designed to show the reckless folly of any such combination in view of the overwhelming power of Assyria. The Egyptian party at Jerusalem had always an uncompromising opponent in the prophet.

In the years 710, 709, Sargon's attention was called to Babylonia again by the hostilities of the indefatigable Merodach-baladan. The result was the second overthrow of the latter, and Sargon's assumption of the title "King of Babylon" in 709. From this year and the three years following, clay tablets are in existence bearing a double date,—"13th (14th, 15th, or 16th) year of Sargon, king of Assyria, and 1st (2d, 3d, or 4th) year (as) king of Babylon." This is very important, because the Canon of Ptolemy also gives the first year of "Ἀρσάκης," king of Babylon, as 709; and we thus have one point in the Assyrian chronology fixed with absolute definiteness. Sargon's name continued to inspire terror far and wide; and we have especial record of a Cypriote embassy which waited upon him this year in Babylon, and brought him tribute. He graciously replied by the present of an inscribed block of stone, which has been discovered in the Island of Cyprus.

In B.C. 703 a campaign against Kummuch (Comagene) took place, and this was followed by military expeditions of less consequence. The later years of Sargon's reign, beginning even as early as 712, were largely occupied with the building of a great city, Dur-Sarrukin ("Fortress of Sargon"), modern Khorsabad, about fifteen miles north-east from Mosul. The chief building in this city was his own magnificent palace, where most of the records of his deeds were preserved. By this splendid work he raised a monument to the enduring memory of the conqueror of Babylon.

After a reign of seventeen years he died—perhaps by violence, but we do not certainly know—in B.C. 705, and was succeeded by his son Senacherib. (See the art.)

SARPI, Paolo, generally known as Fra Paolo, or Padre Paolo; b. at Venice, Aug. 11, 1552; d. there Jan. 15, 1623. He entered the order of the Servites in 1566, and was ordained a priest in 1574, and in 1579 elected provincial of his order. In the controversy between Venice and Pope Paul V. he took a prominent part. He excited the ire of the curia by his views of the secular government as divinely instituted, of ecclesiastical exemption as merely a privilege granted by the king, of papal excommunication as depending for its validity upon its justice, etc., which he developed in his Considerazioni sopra le censure di P. Paolo V. (Venice, 1606), Storia particolare delle cose passate fra Paolo V. e la repubblica di Venezia (Lyons, 1621), De interdicti Veneti historia (Eng. trans. by Bedell, 1626). He was summoned before the Inquisition of Rome, but refused to come. He was excommunicated, but freed from the ban by the peace between the Pope and the Republic in 1607. He was, nevertheless, persecuted as long as he lived, and attacked by assassins even in his own monastery. His most celebrated work, however, is his History of the Council of Trent, which first appeared at Geneva, 1619, and was translated into English (1676), French, and German. It is written with pronounced opposition to the Roman system, and, if not Protestant, is at least reformatory in its fundamental principles. Collected editions of his works appeared at Venice, 1677 and often, Geneva, 1687, Naples, 1790. His life was written by BRANCHI GIOVINI (Zurich, 1836), CORNET (Vienna, 1859), A. CAMPBELL (Florence, 1875), and GAETANO CAPASSO, in Rivista Europea, 1879-80. Besides the works mentioned above, there is an English translation of his History of the quarrels of Pope Pius V. with the state of Venice (London, 1626), History of the Inquisition (1655), and of his History of ecclesiastical benefices and revenues (Westminster, 1727).

SARTORIUS, Ernst Wilhelm Christian, an able and learned theologian of the Lutheran Church; b. at Darmstadt, May 10, 1797; d. at Königsberg, June 13, 1859. He studied theology at Göttingen, and was appointed professor at Marburg in 1821, and at Dorpat in 1824, and superintendent-general of the province of Prussia in 1835. His principal writings are Beiträge zur evangelischen Rechtgläubigkeit (1825), Lehre von Christi Person (1831), Die Lehre von der heiligen Liebe (1840-56), Soli deo gloria, posthumously published in 1860. He was also a steady contributor to Hengstenberg's Evangelische Kirchenzeitung.

SARUM USE, the liturgy put forth (A.D. 1087) by Osmund, bishop of Sarum, based on the Anglo-Saxon and Norman liturgies, which was gradually incorporated into the ritual books of various parts of England, more particularly in the south; "was used a good deal in France, and until quite lately in Portugal." It is supposed that the bloody opposition of the monks to the style of chanting invented by William of Fescamp, when Thurstan, abbot of Glastonbury attempted (1083), to introduce it, called Osmund's attention to the varieties of use, and led him to revise the ritual upon the occasion of opening his new cathedral. SAUL, the first king of Israel, was a son of Kish the Benjamite (cf. 1 Sam. ix. 1), of Gibeah. Saul, i.e., the "desired," is described as "a choice young man, and a goodly: and there was not among the children of Israel a goodlier person than he: from his shoulders and upward he was higher than any of the people" (ix. 2). At the desire of the people for a king, Samuel is illuminated by the Spirit of the Lord as to whom he was to anoint. Saul, who had gone out to seek the asses of his father, is advised by his servant to consult the "seer" at Ramah as to the fate of the asses. At the gate they met the seer for the first time. It was Samuel. A divine intimation had indicated to him the approach and future destiny of the youthful Benjamite. Surprised at his language, but still obeying his call, they ascended to the high place; and in the inn, at the top, they found a company, in which Saul was especially distinguished. When Saul was about to return home, Samuel poured over Saul's head the consecrated oil, and with a kiss of salutation announced to him that he was to be the ruler of the nation. From that moment on, a new life dawned upon Saul; and at every step homeward it was confirmed by the incidents, which, according to Samuel's prediction, awaited him (x. 9, 10). As only Samuel and Saul knew of what had taken place among themselves, Samuel convened an assembly at Mizpeh, and lots were cast as to who was to be king. Saul was named, and by a divine intimation found hidden in the circle of baggage around the encampment (x. 17-24). His stature at once conciliated the public feeling; and the people shouted, "God save the king!" (x. 23, 24.) The murmurs of the worthless part of the community, who refused to salute him with the accustomed presents, were soon hushed by an occasion arising to justify the selection of Saul. He was on his way home, driving his herd of oxen, when tidings reached his ears of the threat issued by Nahash, king of Ammon, against Jabesh-gilead. "The Spirit of the Lord came upon Saul," and in this emergency he had recourse to the expedient of the earlier days. He sent throughout Israel as a message the bones of two of the oxen which he was driving. All the people "came out with one consent" (xi. 7) at Bezek; and Saul, at the head of a vast multitude, totally routed the Ammonites, and obtained a higher glory by exhibiting a new instance of clemency, which those experienced who had formerly despised him. Under the direction of Samuel, Saul and the people betook themselves to Gilgal, where with solemn sacrifices the victorious leader was reinstalled in his kingdom (xi.). At Gilgal Samuel resigned his office as judge, and warned both the people and Saul of the danger of disobedience to the commands of God (xii.). In the third year of his reign Saul collected a standing army of three thousand men, of whom two thousand were at Michmash with the king, and a thousand, under the command of his son Jonathan, at Gibeah. Israel's old foe, the Philistines, had again lifted up his head, and tried to regain the former supremacy. Even a Philistine officer had been stationed in Saul's own land (x. 5, xiii. 3). This officer was slain by Jonathan; and the Philistines now marched against Israel, and encamped at Michmash. The people panic-stricken fled to rocks and caverns for safety. Saul called the people together at Gilgal, and waited there for Samuel. When the seventh day had come, Saul at last ordered sacrifices to be offered. Just after the sacrifice was completed, Samuel arrived, and pronounced the first curse on his impetuous zeal (xiii. 5-14). Samuel, having announced the displeasure of Jehovah and its consequences, left him, and Saul returned to Gibeah. Meanwhile the adventurous exploit of his son brought on the crisis which ultimately drove the Philistines back to their own territory. Jonathan having assaulted a garrison of the Philistines, Saul, aided by a panic of the enemy, effected a great slaughter; but by a rash and foolish denunciation he impeded his success, and, unless prevented by the more enlightened conscience of the people, would have ended with putting Jonathan to death for an act, which, being done in total ignorance, could involve no guilt. The expulsion of the Philistines at once placed Saul in a position higher than that of any previous ruler of Israel. Saul was at the zenith of his glory. He was now able not merely to act on the defensive, but to attack the neighboring tribes of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Zobah, and finally Amalek (xiv. 47). The war with Amalek is twice related,—first briefly (xiv. 48), and then at length (xv. 1-9). Its chief connection with Saul's history lies in the disobedience to the prophetic command of Samuel, shown in the sparing of the king and the retention of the spoil. This rebellion against the directions of Jehovah was now visited by that final rejection of his family from succeeding him on the throne which had before been threatened (xiii. 13, 14, xv. 23). Samuel, after having slain Agag, withdraws to Ramah, mourning for Saul (xv. 35). David, whom Samuel had secretly anointed as king, was filled with the Spirit of God, which departed from Saul to make room for an evil spirit (xvi. 14). David, who was a cunning player on the harp, is brought before the king in order to divert his melancholy. David's music had such a soothing effect upon the king that he loved him greatly. When, however, after the victory which David had gained over Goliath, the people shouted, "Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands," Saul's love towards David was turned into hatred,—a hatred which wished David's death under any circumstances (xix. 1). Saul would have carried out his murderous intentions, were it not for the intercession of his son Jonathan, the intimate friend of David. Indeed, Jonathan succeeded for a time in bringing about a friendly relation between his father and his friend; but this was of but a short duration. David was compelled to assume the position of an outlaw. A portion of the people were base enough to minister to the evil passions of Saul (xxiii. 19, xxvi. 1); and others, perhaps, might color their fear by the pretence of conscience (xxiii. 12). But his sparing Saul's life twice, when he was completely in his power, must have destroyed all color of right in Saul's conduct in the minds of the people, as it also did in his own conscience (xxiv. 3-7, xxvi.). At last the monarchy itself which he had raised up broke down under the weakness of its head. The Philistines re-entered the country. Saul, forsaken of God, who gave him no oracles, had recourse to necromancy and divination, although he had formerly executed the penalty of the law on all those who practised these things (xxviii. 3). He consults a woman living at Endor, who conjures up the spirit of Samuel. From Samuel he hears that his doom is sealed. In the battle which took place on Gilboa, Saul, after his three sons had been killed, perished by his own sword (xxxi. 4). The body, on being found by the Philistines, was stripped and decapitated. The armor was deposited in the temple of Astarte; the head was deposited in the temple of Dagon (1 Chron. x. 10). The corpse was removed from Beth-shan by the gratitude of the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead, who carried off the bodies, burned them, and buried them (1 Sam. xxxi. 13). After the lapse of several years, his ashes and those of Jonathan were removed by David to their ancestral sepulchre at Zelah in Benjamin (2 Sam. xxi. 14). The Old Testament says nothing about the length of Saul's reign, but Acts xiii. 21 states it as forty years. Comp. SCHLIER: Die Könige in Israel (Stuttgart, 1855), p. 35; EWALD: *Geschichte d. SAUMUR, a town of France, on the Loire, in the department of Maine-et-Loire, now famous for its manufactures of rosaries; was the seat of the celebrated Protestant academy founded in 1598 by the national synod of Montpellier, and suppressed by a royal edict of Jan. 8, 1685. The academy, which developed the first fertile school of criticism in modern theology, owed to a certain extent both its existence and its scientific character to Duplessis-Mornay, who was the governor of the place, and watched the young institution with great tenderness. The Scotchman Cameron became one of its first professors, and he brought with him that spirit of free and independent research which afterwards characterized the academy during the whole course of its life. Three of his disciples became professors there nearly at the same time, — Moyse Amyraut (Amyraldus), 1633-64, Josué de la Place (Placcæus), 1633-65, and Louis Cappel, 1614-58. Amyraut is the father of the system of hypothetical universalism, based upon the two propositions, that God has by an absolute and arbitrary decree excluded no one from being saved by the death of Christ, but has only made persevering and unflinching faith in the Saviour an indispensable condition of salvation. The system was denounced by Pierre de Moulin, professor of the academy of Sedan, as an attack upon the divine majesty of God; but the national synods of Alençon (1637) and Charenton (1645) supported Amyraut. Placcæus maintained that original sin consists simply in that corruption to which the offspring of Adam is heir, and that the first sin of Adam is not imputed to us. The national synod of Charenton condemned those propositions; but several provincial synods held that the national synod had acted a little hastily, and refused to carry out its decree. Of still greater importance were the researches of Louis Cappel concerning the integrity of the various documents of the Old Testament. The strict Calvinists were fully aware, that, if the results of those researches were to be accepted, the doctrine of the literal inspiration of Scripture had to be given up, and a hot contest ensued. After the death of Amyraut, Placcæus, and Cappel, it was apparent that the fame of the academy of Saumur had passed its zenith: still men like Étienne Gausson, Claude Pajon (the father of Pajonism), and Étienne de Brais, continued to throw lustre over the academy, and attract great numbers of students. SAURIN, Élie, b. at Usseau, in Dauphiny, Aug. 28, 1639; d. at Utrecht, Easter-Day, 1703. He studied theology at Die, Nîmes, and Geneva, and was appointed pastor of Delft in 1665, and of Utrecht in 1670. He is best known on account of his controversy with Jurieu, which grew so hot that the synod of Leuwarden (1695) forbade both parties, though in vain, to write any more on the matter. His principal works are *Examen de la théologie du M. SAURIN, Jacques, the greatest orator of the French-Reformed Church; b. at Nîmes, Jan. 6, 1677; d. at The Hague, Dec. 30, 1730. He was educated at Geneva, served four years in a regiment of volunteers in the coalition against Louis XIV. (1694-97), studied theology at Geneva, and was appointed pastor to the French-Reformed Congregation in London (1700) and at The Hague (1705), where he gathered immense audiences by the earnestness, energy, and eloquence with which he preached the gospel. Besides his Discours (Amsterdam, 1720), whose second volume (Amsterdam, 1728) gave occasion to some disagreeable misunderstandings, he published five volumes of Sermons (1707-25), and after his death seven more volumes were published by his son. Collected editions were several times issued. The best is that of The Hague, 1749; the latest, that of Paris, 1829-35. One volume of an English translation of his Discours appeared in London, 1723. The best English translation of his sermons is edited by BURDER, London, 1824, 6 vols., New York, 1860, 2 vols. SAVONAROLA, Hieronymus, often called Fra Girolamo, b. at Ferrara, Sept. 21, 1452; d. at Florence, May 23, 1498; the originator and the victim of an ecclesiastico-political reform movement, sometimes wrongly represented as an inspired prophet, and wonder-working saint, but sometimes, also, as an ambitious demagogue and deluded fanatic. He was by his parents destined to study medicine: but a steadily deepening impression of the corruption of the world in general, and the church especially, concentrated the whole force of his character on the one point, the salvation of his soul; and in 1475, in the twenty-third year of his age, he left the parental home, and sought refuge in a Dominican monastery at Bologna. The conversion was in strict harmony with the mediæval ideas of monasticism, and involved no reformatory impulse at all. He simply wanted to become a lay-brother, and do the mean work of the house; but his superiors determined that he should study theology, and in course of time he became thoroughly conversant with the Bible, — which he knew almost entirely by heart, and of which especially the Old Testament and the Revelation inspired him with passionate sympathy, — and also with the writings of Thomas Aquinas the great Dominican doctor, of St. Augustine, and others. He also began to preach, but at first without any success. Suddenly, however, at Brescia, his powerful eloquence broke forth in all its wealth; and in 1490 he was sent as lector to the Dominican monastery of San Marco in Florence.

He taught first in his cell, then in the garden of the cloister, finally in the cathedral; and immense audiences thronged to hear him expound the Revelation. "Your sins make me a prophet," he said to them; and from the depths of that stirring, brilliant, half-pagan life which the Medicis had called forth in Florence, he conjured up a stinging sense of its emptiness and desolation. The reformer began to work. A radical, doctrinal reform, however, as was achieved by Luther and Calvin, Savonarola never dreamed of: in all essential points he agreed with the traditional system of the Church of Rome. What he wanted was simply a moral regeneration of the church, hand in hand with a political regeneration of Italy, more especially of Florence. In 1491 he was elected prior of San Marco, and Lorenzo the Magnificent soon became aware of the strong fascination the prior exercised upon the people. But Lorenzo died, April 8, 1492; and his son Pietro had neither his sagacity nor his self-control. When in August, 1494, Charles VIII. of France crossed the Apennines at the head of a powerful army, Savonarola believed that the moment for action had come. The Medicis were expelled from the city, and the re-organization of the state after a theocratical model was intrusted to him. He seemed to succeed. With the new constitution a new spirit awakened. Love to Christ seemed to have become the predominant impulse. Deadly foes fell upon each other's bosoms. Property illegitimately held was returned. All profane amusements ceased. The monasteries filled up. The churches were thronged. "Indeed," says a contemporary writer, "the people of Florence seem to have become fools from mere love of Christ."

It was the idea of Savonarola, with Florence as a basis, to push the reform farther through all Italy, and he consequently soon began to direct his attacks against the chief seat of the corruption, Rome. In 1492 the monster Alexander VI. had ascended the Papal throne. He was afraid of the preacher, and offered him the archbishopric of Florence and a cardinal's hat, if he would keep silent; but the offer was declined. Then he changed tone, and summoned the reformer to Rome to defend himself; but the summons was not obeyed. Finally, in the fall of 1496, he issued a brief, forbidding, under penalty of excommunication, the prior of San Marco to preach, because he had undertaken to prophesy and reform without any authorization from the church. But Savonarola entered the pulpit with the Papal brief in his hand, and demonstrated, by a singular train of reasoning, that it came, not from the Pope, but from the Devil. Meanwhile, political affairs began to give trouble. The campaign of Charles VIII. proved a failure. Famine and the plague visited Florence in 1497. The jealousy of the Franciscans broke out into open opposition. The intrigues of the banished Medicis became more and more active, and a re-action set in against the popular enthusiasm for the reformer. Alexander VI. was not slow in utilizing these difficulties. In May, 1497, he formally excommunicated Savonarola; in October of the same year he forbade all Christians to hold any kind of converse with him; and towards the close of the year he threatened to lay the interdict on the city, unless the people delivered up the seducer.

In this critical moment Savonarola challenged an ordeal. Standing on the balcony of the cathedral, with the host between his hands, he asked God to destroy him by fire, if he had preached or prophesied lies. A Franciscan monk accepted the challenge. Savonarola hesitated, but was pressed onwards by the enthusiasm of his party. On April 7, 1498, the ordeal was destined to take place. Two pyres were formed in the market-place. They were even lighted, when a quarrel between the Franciscans and Dominicans, whether the combatants should carry the cross or the host through the fire, caused some delay. A rain-storm, in the mean time, put out the fires; and the whole disappointment of the frenzied multitude of spectators fell upon Savonarola. From that moment he completely lost his power over the people, and even became an object of pity and contempt. Arrested by his enemies, and put to the torture, he confessed whatever he was demanded to confess; and, though he afterwards retracted, he was by the Papal commissioners condemned as a heretic, and surrendered to the civil authorities for punishment. He was burned at the stake, — erected in the form of a cross, — together with two of his most zealous adherents. The Dominican order, however, has since taken great pains to have him canonized. He left several works in Latin and Italian. The treatise on Ps. li., which he wrote during his imprisonment, was republished by Luther in 1523. Of special interest for his own life is his Compendium Revelationum, written in 1495. His principal theological work is his Trionfo della Croce, a defence of Christianity against the sceptical tendencies of the Medicean epoch, written in 1497 (English Translation, Triumph of the Cross, London, 1868). In 1882 a bust of Savonarola was placed in the Hall of the Five Hundred at Florence.

SCALIGER, Joseph Justus, b. at Agen, on the Garonne, Aug. 4, 1510; d. at Leyden, Jan. 21, 1609. He studied in Paris, and was in 1592 appointed professor at Leyden. He was the most learned man of his age, understood thirteen languages, and was well versed not only in philology and history, but also in philosophy, theology, jurisprudence, mathematics, etc. Most of his writings are philological; but his Thesaurus temporum (Amsterdam, 1655), the first system of chronology ever formed, and his Expositio numismatis Constantini (Leyden, 1604), have considerable interest to the church historian.

SCAPEGOAT. See ATONEMENT, DAY OF.

SCAPULARY (from the Latin scapula, the "shoulder-blade") means a narrow shoulder-band, of various colors, and adorned with a picture of the Virgin, or a cross, which is worn by several monastic orders and religious fraternities of the Roman-Catholic Church. As a piece of dress it has no particular purpose, but it is believed to be a preservative against death by water or fire. According to the bull Sabbatina the Virgin has personally promised Pope John XXI. that any one who wears a scapulary with her image shall be delivered from purgatory on the first Saturday after death.

SCHADE, Georg, b. at Apenrade in Sleswick, May 8, 1711; d. at Kiel in Holstein, April 10, 1795. He was practising as an advocate in Altona, Holstein, when in 1760 he published in Berlin and Leipzig Die unannehmliche und ewige Religion, in which he gave strict mathematical evidence that metaphysics was the only true theoretical, and morals the only true practical, religion. Immediately after appeared a refutation of that book by Rosenstand Goisce, professor at the university of Copenhagen; but the refutation was evidently a mere trick by which to draw attention to the book. Frederik V. of Denmark, to whose dominion Holstein at that time belonged, did not relish the joke, however, but put the author in Christiansoe, the Danish Bastille, from which he was not released until 1775, under Christian VII., when he was allowed to settle as an advocate at Kiel. See J. A. BOLTEN: Historische Kirchen-Nachrichten von der Stadt Altona, which also contains a full list of Schade's other writings. L. HELLER.

SCHADE, Johann Caspar, b. at Kühndorf in 1666; d. in Berlin, July 25, 1698. He studied at Leipzig, where he became an intimate friend of Francke; and was in 1690 appointed preacher at the Church of St. Nicholas, in Berlin, where Spener was provost. In 1697 he published Praxis des Beichtstuhls und Abendmahls, which occasioned a rescript from the government, according to which, private confession ceased to be obligatory in the Prussian Church.

SCHAEFFER, Charles Frederick, D.D., b. Sept. 3, 1807; d. Nov. 23, 1889; an eminent theologian of the Lutheran Church, son of Frederick David Schaeffer, D.D., pastor in Philadelphia; was a graduate of Pennsylvania University; pursued his theological studies under his father and the Rev. Dr. Demme; served, 1832 to 1855, congregations at Carlisle, Hagerstown, Red Hook (N.Y.), Easton (Penn.). From 1840 to 1845 he had charge of a professorship in the theological seminary, Columbus, O.; was in 1855 called to the German professorship in Pennsylvania College, and in the theological seminary at Gettysburg, Penn., and in 1861 to the chair of dogmatic theology in the newly established theological Lutheran seminary at Philadelphia, where he conscientiously performed his duties until 1879. He was a representative of the strictly conservative tendency, adhering to the symbols of the Lutheran Church according to their original meaning. Of his solid scholarship his publications bear witness,—historical, homiletical, and doctrinal articles in the Gettysburg Evangelical Review; translation of LIEHLER'S Commentary on the Acts, in Schaff's edition of LANGE'S Bible-work; translations of JOHN ARND'S True Christianity, and of II. KURTZ'S Sacred History. W. J. MANN.

SCHALL, Johann Adam, b. at Cologne, 1591; d. in China, Aug. 15, 1666. He was educated in the Collegium Germanum in Rome; entered the order of the Jesuits, and was in 1628 sent as a missionary to China, where he remained to his death. He acquired the confidence of the Chinese Government (which proved of great advantage to the mission), and translated into Chinese many mathematical treatises, interlarded with religious and Christian discussions. He also wrote Historica missionis Societatis Jesu apud Chineses, Vienna, 1665, and Ratisbon, 1672. G. H. KLIPPEL.

SCHAUFFLER, William Gottlieb, D.D., LL.D., missionary and Bible-translator; b. at Stuttgart, Württemberg, Germany, Aug. 22, 1798; d. in New-York City, Friday, Jan. 26, 1883. In 1801 his father removed to Odessa, South Russia. At fifteen he was confirmed in the Lutheran Church; at twenty-two, converted. He then determined to be a missionary. But his educational advantages had been small, though diligently improved, and the way seemed hedged up. But in 1826 he met the famous missionary, Joseph Wolff, who took him to Constantinople, there to be fitted for missionary labors; and from there he went to Smyrna, where Jonas King induced him to go to America. For five years he studied at Andover, became an American citizen, and then, under the care of the American Board, went to Constantinople (1831), where, with the exception of a few years spent elsewhere, he resided and labored. He was particularly interested in the conversion of the Jews, and for their benefit revised and superintended the publication of the Old Testament, in Hebrew-Spanish, at Vienna, 1839-42. But his great work was the translation of the whole Bible into Osmanli-Turkish, the language of the educated Turks. This occupied him eighteen years. In 1867 Halle gave him the degree of D.D., in express acknowledgment of this work. In 1861 his peace-making between two high dignitaries at Constantinople was acknowledged by a decoration sent him by King William of Prussia. In 1877 he was made a doctor of laws by Princeton College. He was a remarkable linguist, being familiar with some nineteen languages, and able to preach extemporaneously in six (German, Italian, French, English, Spanish, and Turkish). He published Meditations on the Last Days of Christ (Boston, 1837, several editions).

SCHEFFLER, Johann (Angelus Silesius), b. at Breslau in 1624; d. there July 9, 1677. He studied medicine at Strassburg, Leyden (where he first became acquainted with Jacob Boehme's writings), and Padua (where he took his degree), and was in 1649 appointed body-physician to the Duke of Wurtemberg; but he remained only three years at the court of Oels. In 1653 he returned to Breslau, and embraced Romanism. In 1657 he published his two most celebrated works: Cherubinische Wandersmann (a collection of minor poems, almost of the character of proverbs), and Geistliche Hirtenlieder (a collection of hymns), both characterized by a peculiarly deep and sweet mysticism. His polemical writings show quite a different character. In 1661 he was ordained a priest; and from that time he spent the rest of his life in a series of violent, sometimes almost unseemly, attacks on the Reformers and the Reformed churches; which (thirty-nine treatises) were collected under the title Ecclesiologia, and appeared at Glatz, 1677, 1 vol. fol. See KAHLERT: Angelus Silesius, Breslau, 1853. — DRYANDER.

SCHELHORN, Johann Georg, b. at Memmingen, Dec. 8, 1694; d. there March 31, 1773. He studied at Jena, and settled then in his native city as preacher and librarian. Of his writings the following have great interest to the church historian: Amœnitates historice eccl. (Leip., 1737-46, 3 vols.), Acta hist.-eccl. Sæc. XVI. et XVII. (Ulm, 1762-64, 4 vols.), De vita Camerarii (1710, etc.).

SCHELLING, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von. I. LIFE AND WRITINGS. — He was b. Jan. 27, 1775, at Leonberg, near Stuttgart, where his father was pastor; d. in Ragatz, Switzerland, Aug. 20, 1854. In his sixteenth year he entered the university of Tübingen to study theology, together with Hegel and the unfortunate poet Hölderlin. Lessing, Herder, and Kant were the leaders of these young men; and especially the influence of Herder is seen in Schelling's academic dissertation, Antiquissimi de prima malorum origine philosophematis explicandi Gen. iii. tentamen criticum (1792), as well as in the essay on Myths, Historical Legends, and Philosophemes of the earliest times (1793). In the year 1796 he went to Leipzig to study natural science and mathematics, and began in 1798 to lecture at Jena as a colleague of Fichte, whose doctrines had so far been of the most decisive influence upon the development of his own philosophy. Here he came also in contact with Goethe and the other great men of literature. In 1801 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Würzburg, where he remained till 1806. In 1807 he was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences at Munich; lectured in Erlangen, 1820-26, in Munich, 1827; was called, 1841, to Berlin to lecture on mythology and revelation. His principal writings are, Idea of a Philosophy of Nature, 1797; Of the World-Soul, etc., 1798; System of Transcendental Idealism, 1800; Lectures on the Method of Academic Study, 1803; Philosophical Inquiries concerning the Nature of Human Freedom, 1809; Lectures on Mythology and Revelation, in his complete Works, published after his death.

II. SCHELLING'S DOCTRINE IN ITS GRADUAL DEVELOPMENT. 1. Schelling as a Follower of Fichte. — Schelling, in whose philosophy two great periods may be distinguished, cannot be fully understood without a precise knowledge of the preceding philosophers; and, because his first philosophical endeavors are based entirely on the ground of Kant-Fichte's idealism, it is necessary to sketch this in a few lines. Kant, who calls his own philosophy "criticism," had by a thorough scrutiny of our faculty of knowledge come to the conclusion that our knowledge of the world exterior to us is merely subjective, that we never know the "things in themselves," but only through the forms of space and time which we add to them as the only medium of our perception. But, while our faculty of knowledge is thus very limited in regard to objects of experience, we enjoy a realm of freedom as moral beings. Pure practical reason has therefore the primacy over the speculative reason. On our moral consciousness only, our convictions of freedom, of immortality, and of the existence of God, are founded. An ethical theism was thus the result of Kant's doctrine.

This idealism was carried to its furthest consequences by Fichte. He accepts the critical result of Kant, that the Ego is theoretically limited in regard to the object as the Non-Ego. But this Non-Ego has no reality without us: it is, as well as the forms (space and time) by which we perceive it, the result of the activity of the Ego, the production of an unconscious intuition. This creative Ego is not the individual, but the absolute Ego. The Non-Ego is therefore the same with the Ego, which is thus not limited by an outward reality, but by itself. Yet every limit is a contradiction to the infinite nature of the Ego, its independent, free activity; and so an infinite striving at every hinderance is revealed to us. In this striving the nature of practical reasoning consists; and the antithesis of both — the limited theoretical and the infinite practical reason — constitutes the empirical Ego, the individual. This, however, could not be understood if the true nature of the Ego was not absolute activity. Under the ground of all actions of the individual lies the activity of the absolute Ego, in which both subject and object are yet one. This pure, absolute Ego may only be comprehended by an intellectual intuition. It is, according to Fichte, the highest principle of philosophy, the moral order of the world, without personality and self-consciousness, — God. And this, the absolute, he made his point of departure in his later speculations.

With the enthusiasm of youth, Schelling accepted this ethical Pantheism in the earliest period of his thinking; but very soon we see him taking his own ways.

2. Schelling's "Philosophy of Nature" and "Transcendental Idealism," 1796-1800. — It is in this period that Schelling creates a new epoch in German philosophy, a new form of dogmatism with a creative knowledge, instead of the critical one of Kant-Fichte. To Schelling's rich mind, open to the impressions of nature, it could not remain concealed that nature took only a subordinate position in Fichte's system, — the position of an ethical medium of the individual. The great new thought which Schelling introduced now was this, that nature is a form of the revelation of the absolute Ego as well as intelligence. Nature is visible mind, and mind is invisible nature. The highest end of Nature (i.e., to reflect herself) is manifested through all nature, but is reached only in man, where she becomes wholly objective to herself. Philosophical reasoning can therefore not end with nature; it is driven to the other pole of the absolute, — to Ego, the intelligence. In his System of Transcendental Idealism, Schelling tries to give a history of the Ego, or the development of self-consciousness. Similar to that process of nature, to come to self-consciousness, there are different stages of development in the life of the Ego, the highest of which is art. Here the harmony of the conscious and unconscious is reached, and the Ego comes to the highest intuition.

The absolute identity of subject and object, which Schelling found embodied in the works of art, begins now to be the starting-point of his thinking in

3. The Period of the System of Identity. — At the head of this system he places the notion of the absolute, and defines it as absolute reason, the total indifference of subject and object. The highest law of its existence is absolute identity ( $A = A$ ). Every thing that exists is this absolute itself: nothing exists outside of it; and so it is the universe itself, not the cause of it. As both subject and object are contained in the absolute, and the absolute must posit itself as subject and object, there may be a preponderance of either the subject or of the object, although the absolute will always be contained in both of them. In this way he obtains mind on one side, nature on the other: the different stadia of mind and nature are potencies of the subject-object.

It is in this period, and especially in his Lectures on Academic Study, that Schelling for the first time brings religion and Christianity into the realm of his system. Corresponding to the antithesis of real and ideal, of nature and history in the universe, there is a similar antithesis in history itself. The ancient world and ancient religion represent to us the preponderance of nature (polytheism); while in Christianity the ideal is revealed in mystery. In the progress of history are three periods to be distinguished, — the period of nature, which found its bloom in Greek religion and poetry; the period of  fate, at the end of the ancient world; and the period of  providence, which entered with Christianity. God became objective for the first time in Christ. This incarnation is not a temporal, but an eternal act. Christ sacrifices in his person the finite to enable by this the coming of the Spirit as the light of a new world. By speculative knowledge alone, Schelling expects a regeneration of esoteric Christianity and the proclamation of the absolute gospel.

Thoughts similar to these are expressed in the essay on Philosophy and Religion (1804). This and his Philosophical Inquiries concerning Human Freedom show us,

4. Schelling in the Transition to his Later Doctrine, which is characterized by his inclination to theosophic speculation and the influence of Christian mysticism, especially of Jacob Böhme.

Kant-Fichte's idealism had, according to Schelling, not given a sufficient notion of freedom, because it lacked the basis of realism. Such a realism is contained in his philosophy; because he distinguishes in God a basis, the nature in God, in which all beings, and therefore man also, have their cause. This nature in God, a dark, blind will, is an eternal yearning to produce itself, and rests also at the ground of our existence. But God produces in himself a perception of himself, which is understanding, the expression of that yearning. Both together, eternal yearning and understanding, are then in God that loving, almighty will which creates all things. In man we find both principles united, — the principle of nature, and the principle of light and understanding. As a part of that dark will, he has a will of his own: as gifted with understanding, he is an organ of the universal will. The separation of both principles is the possibility of good and evil, which presupposes human freedom. The predominance of man's particular will is the evil. The decision of man for the evil is an act, but an eternal act, because it was done before time. Only through God can the particular and the universal will be united again. And it is done by revelation, or by God's adopting of man's nature.

The philosophy of religion, which Schelling has given here in broad outlines, is finally completed in —

5. Schelling's Later Doctrine. — Schelling begins with a distinction of negative and positive philosophy. As negative philosophy he describes the philosophy of Hegel, which is unable to give us a full knowledge of reality.

Because it is the desire of human reason, as well as the object of true philosophy, to find the absolute Being, and because Schelling wants to obtain the notion of an absolute Spirit, he distinguishes three potencies in the divine essence, — the possibility of being (Sein-Können), pure being (reines Sein) without the possibility of being (actus purus), and absolute free being, which is neither of the two, but their unity, i.e., subject-object. Yet these three forms of being are not being (Sein) itself: they are only attributes of the general being, which is one, or the absolute Spirit.

This absolute Spirit, which has the freedom of existing outside of himself, reveals himself, according to his three potencies, in the world, as causa materialis, causa efficiax, and causa finalis of the world. Only through creation, which is an act of his will, not of his nature, God comes to a full knowledge of himself.

Schelling believes that his notion of God is also the original notion of monotheism; and, based upon his theory of the three potencies in God, he develops also the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. The three persons of the Trinity, who proceed from the potencies by a theogonic process, are, the Father as the creator, who gives matter to the creatures; the Son, begotten of the Father, who contributes the forms; and the Spirit, who is the completion of creation. But only at the end of creation Son and Spirit become perfect personalities, yet both are in God, so that we have only one God in three personalities.

In man, as the image of God, we have the same three potencies and a similar freedom, which may separate the harmony of the potencies. The separation of the potencies has become actual in the fall of man. In order to restore the harmony, and bring the fallen world and man back to the Father, the Son himself must become man.

But the Son can at first realize this only as a natural potency, which is done in the mythological process. After having overcome here the anti-divine principle, he can act also according to his will, as the ideal potency; and this free personal acting is revelation.

It is impossible to follow Schelling here into his elaborate construction of mythology, which is rich in deep and grand thoughts.

Revelation finally broke through mythology, as it appears even in the Old Testament, by Christ's incarnation. The person of Christ is the centre of Christianity. Here the second potency divests itself of the "form of God," which it had in the mythologic consciousness (Phil. ii. 6-8), and becomes man, suffers and dies, not only to bring freedom to men, but to become by obedience one with the Father (1 Cor. xv. 28).

Schelling closes his philosophy with a glance at the history of the church. He distinguishes three great periods, and names them after the characters and names of the three apostles, — The Petrine Period, or Catholicism; The Pauline Period, or Protestantism; and The Johannean Period, or the "church of the future."

[While Schelling stands, on one side, in the most intimate connection with the great poetic and philosophic movements of the last century; while especially his earlier philosophy is but a philosophic expression of that yearning to comprehend the absolute as it appears above all in Goethe's Faust; and while his system is the highest glorification of genius as celebrated by the romantic school, — we have on the other side, in Schelling's later philosophy, the greatest endeavor of modern philosophy to construct the system of Christian doctrine. His thoughts have had great influence upon modern German theology (and upon Coleridge), especially his idea of the three ages of church history. His philosophy is an illustration of his own saying, "The German nation strives with her whole nature after religion, but, according to her peculiarity, after a religion which is connected with knowledge, and based upon science."]

SCHEM, Alexander Jacob, b. in Wiedenbrück, Westphalia, March 16, 1826; d. at West Hoboken, N.J., May 21, 1881. He studied philology and theology at Bonn and Tübingen, 1843-46; was a priest of the Roman Church, but became a Protestant and emigrated to America, 1851; did literary work, and taught ancient and modern languages; was professor of the same at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Penn., 1851-60; was regular contributor to APPLETON'S New American Cyclopædia from 1859 to 1863; to the Annual Cyclopædia, in the foreign and religious departments, from its first number (1861) to 1872; and to MCCLINTOCK and STRONG'S Cyclopædia, 1867-81; foreign editor of the Tribune (newspaper), 1864-66; editor of the Deutsch-amerikanisches Conversations-Lexicon, 1869-74, 12 vols.; assistant superintendent of public schools, New-York City, 1874 till his death; with Henry Kiddle edited a Cyclopædia of Education, 1877, and the supplements, Year-Book of Education, 1878 and 1879. He also published the American Ecclesiastical Year-Book, 1860, and an Ecclesiastical Almanac, 1868 and 1869.

SCHINNER, Matthäus, b. at Müllibach, in the canton of Vaud in Switzerland, in 1470; d. in Rome, Oct. 2, 1522. He was educated at Zürich and Como, and became bishop of Sitten in 1509. Employed by Pope Leo X. in Swiss politics, he was very successful in bringing about an alliance between the Pope and the Union against France, and received as a reward the cardinal's hat, in 1511. In 1514 he went as legatus a latere to England to stir up a war between Henry VIII. and Francis I., and the latter acknowledged that Schinner had been one of his worst enemies, not only in the diplomatic, but also on the battle field. Zwingli's works give several striking descriptions of the great impression the cardinal made on the soldiers. When the Reformation broke out in Switzerland, he seemed to be in perfect harmony with the movement. He offered Luther a place of refuge and support in 1519, and continued for a long time to befriend Zwingli. But his close connection with the Church of Rome, and worldly regards, at last got the better of him, and he turned against the Reformation. When Faber met him in Rome in 1521, he agreed with him that the Reformation should be put down by force.

CARL PESTALOZZI.

SCHISM, from the Greek σχίσμα, has, according to canon law, a double sense: one, more general, simply denoting a deviation from the orthodox church, with respect to organization or discipline, such as the schisms caused by Felicissimus, Novatian, Melitius, and others; and one more special, denoting a split in the highest authority of the church, such as the great Papal schism, 1378-1429. See URBAN VI., BONIFACE IX., BENEDICT XIII., etc., and the COUNCIL OF CONSTANCE.

SCHLATTER, Michael, missionary, and founder of the synod of the German-Reformed Church in the United States: was b. of a respectable family in St. Gall, Switzerland, July 14, 1716; d. near Philadelphia, October, 1790. He studied in the gymnasium of his native town, and probably also at Helmstädt; was for some time a teacher in Holland, where he was ordained to the ministry; and in 1745 was assistant minister at Wigoldingen, in his native country. In 1746 he was commissioned by the deputies of the synod of North and South Holland a missionary to the destitute German churches of Pennsylvania, with special directions to visit the scattered settlements, to organize pastoral charges, and, if possible, to form a coetus, or synod.

Schlatter arrived in America on the 1st of August, 1746. Before the end of the year he was called to the pastorate of the Reformed Church of Philadelphia. Though he accepted the call, he continued to prosecute his special mission with extraordinary energy. From the year 1747 to the beginning of 1751 he travelled, as he informs us in his Journal, a distance of not less than eight thousand miles, — not reckoning his passage across the ocean, — and preached six hundred and thirty-five times. According to his own estimate, there were at this time thirty thousand German-Reformed people in Pennsylvania, with fifty-three small churches, and only four settled pastors. Schlatter formed the congregations into pastoral charges; and on the 29th of September, 1747, the pastors and delegated elders met, at his instance, in Philadelphia, and organized the German-Reformed coetus, or synod.

In 1751 Schlatter went to Europe, at the request of the coetus, to solicit aid for the destitute German-Reformed churches of America. He was very successful, especially in Holland, where a fund was established from which the churches received much assistance. In 1752 he returned to America, accompanied by six young ministers. He brought with him seven hundred large Bibles for distribution to churches and families.

While Schlatter was in Europe, he published, in Dutch, a Journal of his missionary labors, containing a tender appeal in behalf of the Germans in America. It was translated into German, and published in Fresenius Pastoral Nachrichten, and also separately. Rev. David Thomson, English minister in Amsterdam, translated the book into English, and became the chief promoter in England of a movement for the establishment of schools among the Germans in America. A large sum of money (Muhlenberg says twenty thousand pounds sterling) was collected for this purpose, and placed in the hands of a Society for the Promotion of the Knowledge of God among the Germans. Unfortunately, in the effort to enlist sympathy, the picture of German destitution was greatly overdrawn, and the Germans were represented in a manner that could not fail to be painful to a high-spirited people. In 1755 Schlatter was induced to resign his church in Philadelphia, and to become superintendent of the proposed "charity schools." This was a mistake; for by this time the movement had to some extent become political. An attempt was made to use the "charity" as a means of breaking the tacit alliance which had hitherto subsisted between the Quakers and the Germans, and of inducing the latter to support the favorite measures of the government party. Christopher Sauer, the celebrated German printer, exerted his immense influence in opposition to the "charity schools," which, he claimed, were intended to prepare the way for an established church. The Lutheran and Reformed ministers for a while supported Schlatter in his work; but at last the popular feeling of opposition became irresistible, and the undertaking proved an utter failure. The manner in which the charity was offered had caused it to be regarded as an insult. Seidensticker says, "Schlatter's failure was due to his connection with the cause after it had assumed this unfortunate complexion. If the affair had remained on the basis on which he had with honest zeal and decided success originally placed it, the history of these schools would have been very different."

On the failure of the school-movement, Schlatter, in 1757, accompanied an expedition to Nova Scotia against the French, as chaplain of the Royal American regiment, and was present at the taking of Louisburg. He subsequently lived in retirement at Chestnut Hill, near Philadelphia. During the American Revolution he was an earnest patriot, and was for some time imprisoned for refusing to resume his position of chaplain in the British army.

SCHLEIERMACHER, Friedrich Daniel Ernst, b. in Breslau, Nov. 21, 1768; d. in Berlin, Feb. 12, 1831.

1. Life. — Schleiermacher's father was chaplain of a Prussian regiment in Silesia, and belonged to the Reformed communion. To his mother, a very intelligent and pious woman (as her few letters embodied in Schleiermacher's correspondence abundantly prove), he confesses himself mainly indebted for his early training, his father being frequently absent on professional journeys. Subsequently the family removed to the country, where he lived from his tenth to his fourteenth year, mostly under the instruction of his parents and of a teacher who first inspired him with enthusiasm for classical literature. At that time he had already commenced the struggle against a "strange scepticism," which he calls a "peculiar thorn in the flesh," and which made him doubt the genuineness of all the ancient writings. In 1783 his parents sent him, his brother, and sister, to an excellent Moravian school at Niesky in Upper Lusatia. Two years afterward he entered the Moravian college at Barby. The childlike piety, the wise mixture of instruction and amusement, and the rural quietness of these institutions, made a deep and lasting impression on his mind. He ever remembered that time with gratitude, and kept up a familiar intercourse with the society through his sister Charlotte (who had become one of its regular members), and through his intimate friend and classmate, Von Albertini, of the Grisons, subsequently bishop of the fraternity, and a distinguished hymn-writer. The type of Moravian Christianity can be clearly traced in his enthusiastic personal devotion to the Saviour, and in the strongly christological character of his dogmatic system. In his Wohnachtsfeier, 1813 (an imitation of the Platonic Symposium), Christ appears as the living centre of all faith and true religion. But his constitutional scepticism seriously tormented him, and led to a temporary rupture with his teachers, and even with his father. The correspondence between them is highly honorable to both. With all his filial reverence and affection, the son refused to yield to mere authority, and insisted on his right of private judgment and personal investigation. The father learned to respect the manly independence and earnest mental struggles of the son. Both were at last fully reconciled. With the consent of his father, he left Barby, and entered the university of Halle in 1787. His studies were rather fragmentary. He attended the lectures of Senler, the father of German neology, and of Wolff, the celebrated Greek scholar, studied modern languages and mathematics, and read the philosophical works of Spinoza, Kant, Fichte, and Jacobi. His mind was very impressible, yet too independent to follow any one teacher or system. The age was thoroughly rationalistic, and German theology was then undergoing a revolution as radical as the political revolution of France. He left the university, after a two-years' course, without a fixed system of religious opinions, yet with the hope of "attaining, by earnest research, and patient examination of all the witnesses, to a reasonable degree of certainty, and to a knowledge of the boundaries of human science and learning." In 1790 he passed the examination for licensure, and accepted a situation as private tutor in the family of Count Dohna, where he spent three years. In 1794 he was ordained to the ministry, and became assistant to his uncle, a superannuated clergyman at Landsberg on the Warta. In 1796 he was appointed chaplain at the Charité (hospital) in Berlin, and continued in this position till 1802. During these six years he moved mostly in literary circles, and identified himself temporarily with the so-called romantic school of poetry as represented by Friedrich and Wilhelm Schlegel, Tieck, and Novalis. In 1799 he published his first important work, the Dis- courses on Religion. It had a stirring effect upon the rising generation of theologians (as Neander and Harms from different stand-points testified from their own experience), and marks the transition of German theology from an age of cold speculation to the restoration of positive faith. He appears here as an eloquent high priest of natural religion in the outer court of Christian revelation, to convince educated unbelievers that religion, far from being incompatible with intellectual culture, as they thought, was the deepest and the most universal element in man, different from knowledge and from practice, — a sacred feeling of relation to the Infinite, which purifies and ennobles all the faculties. Beyond this he did not go at that time. His piety was strongly tinged with the pantheism of Spinoza. His Monologues followed in 1800, a self-contemplation in the face of the world, and a description of the ethical ideal which floated before his mind, and was influenced by the subjective idealism of Fichte. In 1802 he broke loose from his æsthetic and literary connections, much to his own benefit, and removed for two years to Stolpe in Pomerania, as court-preacher. There he commenced his translation of Plato, which he had projected with Friedrich Schlegel in Berlin. The completion of this great undertaking in six volumes (1804-26) gave him a place among the best Greek scholars in Germany. His searching Criticism of all Former Systems of Moral Philosophy, which opened a new path in this science, belongs to the same period (1803).

In 1804 he was elected extraordinary professor of philosophy and theology in Halle. After the temporary suspension of this university in 1806, he spent some time on the Island of Rügen, then returned to Berlin as minister of Trinity Church, and married the widow of his intimate clerical friend Willich (1809), with whom, notwithstanding the great disparity of age (he might have been her father), he lived happily to the close of his life.

He took an active part in the organization of the university of Berlin, which was founded in 1810. He was elected its first theological professor, and also pastor of Trinity Church. In this double office he continued to the close of his life, and unfolded his greatest activity to an ever-widening circle of pupils and admirers. For a quarter of a century he and his colleague and former pupil, Neander, were the most influential teachers of theology, and the chief attraction in the university of the literary metropolis of Germany. At the same time he felt a lively interest in public affairs. He roused from the pulpit the sense of national independence during the deepest humiliation of Prussia, and urged the people to the war of liberation against Napoleon. He advocated liberal political opinions after the Congress of Vienna (1815), and ran the risk of sharing exile with his friends De Wette and Moritz Arndt. He was no favorite with Frederic William III.; but a few years before his death he received from the king the order of the red eagle, which he never wore. They agreed, however, in zeal for the union of the Lutheran and Reformed churches, which was inaugurated in 1817, at the third tercentenary celebration of the Reformation. Schleiermacher did all he could to promote it.

He was free from all sectarian bigotry. "Christ," he said, "is the quickening centre of the church. From him comes all; to him all returns. We should, therefore, not call ourselves Lutherans, or Reformed (Calvinists), but Evangelical Christians, after his name and his holy gospel." He favored the introduction of the Presbyterian form of government. He was one of the compilers of the new Berlin hymn-book (1829), which, with all its defects, opened the way for a hymnological reform. Notwithstanding this extraordinary activity, he mingled freely in society, and was the centre of a large number of friends at his fireside. Many of his witty sayings and charades, in verse and prose, were transmitted by oral tradition in Berlin, and are still remembered.

In the beginning of February, 1834, he was seized by a severe cold, which fell on his lungs, and in a few days terminated in death. In his last hours he summoned his family around his bed, and with clear consciousness and calm serenity celebrated the holy communion. He himself distributed the elements, and solemnly confessed his implicit faith in Christ his Saviour, and in the atoning efficacy of his death. It was a worthy close of his religious career, which began in the bosom of Moravian piety. It was felt throughout all Germany that a truly representative man, and one of the brightest luminaries of the age, had departed. The funeral-orations of Steffens (a Christian philosopher), Strauss (his colleague and court-chaplain), and Marheineke (a speculative theologian of the Hegelian school, and his antagonist), gave public expression to the universal esteem and regret. His literary remains were intrusted to his friend and pupil, Dr. Jonas. He lost his only son, Nathanael, in his early youth; and the funeral-address which he himself delivered at the grave is one of his most remarkable and touching compositions. He bases there his hope of immortality solely on Christ as the resurrection and the life.

Schleiermacher was small of stature, and slightly deformed by a humpback; but his face was noble, earnest, sharply defined, and expressive of intelligence and kindly sympathy; his eye keen, piercing, and full of fire; his movements quick and animated. In his later years his white hair made him appear like a venerable sage of olden times, yet his mind retained its youthful vitality and freshness to the close. He had perfect command over his temper, and never lost his calm composure. His philosophy and theology were violently assailed by orthodox and rationalists; but he kept aloof from personal controversy, and secured the esteem even of those who widely differed from his views. He was the Plato and Origen of Germany in the nineteenth century.

II. His Character and Works.—Schleiermacher was a many-sided man, and a master in several departments of intellectual and moral activity. He was a public teacher and writer, a preacher, a classical philologist, a philosopher, and a theologian.

As academic teacher he had that rare personal magnetism which drew the students at once into an irresistible current of thought, and roused all their mental energies. They saw the process of a great genius and scholar unfolding his ideas, and building up his system. He usually lectured two hours a day: first, on every branch of theology except the Old Testament and the Book of Revelation, and then, by way of recreation as it were, on every branch of philosophy in a certain order. He used brief notes, and allowed his genius to play freely under the inspiration of the lecture-room filled with attentive students. All his posthumous works are based on fragmentary notes.

As a preacher, he gathered around him in Trinity Church, every Sunday morning, the most intellectual audiences of students, professors, officers, and persons of the higher ranks of society. Wilhelm von Humboldt says that Schleiermacher's speaking far exceeded his power in writing, and that his strength consisted in the "deeply penetrative character of his words, which was free from art, and the persuasive effusion of feeling which moved in perfect unison with one of the rarest intellects." He never wrote his sermons, except the text, theme, and a few heads, but allowed them to be taken down by friends during delivery, and to be published after some revision by his pen.

As a theologian he ranks among the greatest of all ages. His influence is seen among writers of different schools; and will long continue, at least in Germany, as a suggestive and stimulating force. He was a unique combination of mysticism and criticism, of religious feeling and sceptical understanding. He believed in his heart while he doubted in his head. He was a pantheist as a philosopher, but a theist as a praying Christian. He built up as a divine what he destroyed as an historian, yet he knew somehow how to harmonize and to adjust these antagonistic tendencies. He learned from Plato, Spinoza, Calvin, Fichte, Schelling, Jacobi; but he digested all foreign elements, and worked them up into an original system of his own. He can be classed neither with rationalists, nor supernaturalists, nor mystics; but he had elements from all. He rejected the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity and Christology, of inspiration and the canon; and he taught an ultimate restoration, which he ingeniously reasoned out from the Calvinistic election theory, by an expanding process from the particular to the general. His errors are as numerous as those of Origen. He was bold and unsparing in his criticism. He dissected historic documents with the sharpest knife, and sacrificed almost all the miracles of the Gospel history as unessential to faith. Yet he ever held fast to Christ as the greatest fact in history, as the one only sinless and perfect man in whom the Divinity dwelt in its fulness, and from whom saving influences emanate from generation to generation, and from race to race. In this central idea lies Schleiermacher's chief merit in theology, and his salutary influence. He modestly declined the honor of being the founder of a school; and his best pupils, as Neander, Twستن, Nitzsch, Lucke, Bleek, Ullmann, Julius Muller, went far beyond him in the direction of a positive evangelical creed. He was willing to decrease, that Christ might increase.

The works of Schleiermacher, including his posthumous publications, cover nearly all the departments of philosophy and theology,—ethics, dialectics, psychology, politics, aesthetics, pedagogics, dogmatics, Christian ethics, hermeneutics, biblical criticism, life of Jesus (posthumous lectures, exceedingly unsatisfactory), church history (likewise posthumous, and almost worthless), and a large number of philosophical, exegetical, and critical essays, and sermons. But the books which he published himself are by far the most finished and important, especially his masterly outline sketch of the course of theological study as an organic whole (1811), and his Christian Dogmatics (1821, 3d ed., 1835), which stands next to Calvin's Institutes as a masterpiece of theological genius. It is an original reconstruction of the evangelical system of faith on the basis of practical experience and the consciousness of absolute dependence on God: it is in matter independent of all philosophy, yet profoundly philosophical in dialectical method and conclusive reasoning. But more of this in the next section. We only add, that it is Protestant to the backbone, yet remarkably conciliatory in spirit and tone towards diverging types of Christianity. It reduces the differences between Catholicism and Protestantism to this formula: "Catholicism makes the relation of the believer to Christ to depend on his relation to the church; Protestantism makes the relation of the believer to the church to depend on his relation to Christ." PHILIP SCHAFF.

III. Theology.—Schleiermacher's Reden über die Religion was a strong word spoken to his time, and it suited the moment. At every point except one the German spirit was rallying from that debility and barrenness into which it had sunk; in every direction except one the German mind was stirring with new issues: only religion seemed to have been entirely abandoned by the educated portion of the nation as a kind of self-contradiction. But the contradiction, the book said to its readers, between piety and culture, is a lie fabricated by people who know neither the one nor the other. That which they reverence as education is not education, but simply school-pedantry; and that which they despise as religion is not religion, but its shadow, its caricature. They consider religion as a means of maintaining social order, an instrument for the inoculation of good morals, an expression of a trite and vulgar view of nature and history. But religion is no such thing. Religion is that feeling of the universe in which man discovers his own destination, that feeling of the infinite in which man discovers his own immortality, that feeling of the presence of a supreme power in which man discovers the existence of God, though he may still shrink from ascribing the forms of the human personality to that being. Religion is a part of human nature. Every one has religion, whether he knows it or not; and every one is compelled to recognize the truth of his religion, whether he will or not. So far the book is admirable. By its exposition of the true nature of religion it forces the reader out of his religious indifference. But then it undertakes an exposition of religion considered as an historical fact; for, although it admits that not every one may feel called upon to join one of the historically developed religions, development towards a positive form is, nevertheless, an inherent demand in the religious feeling. And here the question arises: Does this book really point in the direction of Christianity and the Christian church? It does, though not in the common sense of those words, nor in that in which the author later on came to use them, but when compared with the stand-point of the readers whom it addressed. When Schleiermacher wrote the preface to the third edition of the book, in 1821, he observed that there was at that moment more reason for addressing the bigoted than the indifferent.

To the Reden correspond the Monologen as their ethical complement. They are written in a more lyrical style, giving freer scope to a merely subjective pathos; and they have a somewhat lighter character, in spite of the profound researches they contain concerning human freedom.

From Schleiermacher's philosophy of religion, as developed in his Reden and Monologen, to his systematic representation of the positive doctrines of Christianity, a transition is formed by his critico-exegetical writings, and more especially by his famous little book, Kurze Darstellung des Theologischen Studiums, 1811. It was not any remarkable grasp of historical and antiquarian materials which distinguished him as an exegete: but he was a good philologist and an excellent translator; and his marvellous power of understanding, and, so to speak, reproducing the whole mental process by which a literary monument has been produced, makes his criticism in the highest degree suggestive. For the Old Testament he had very little sympathy, and its close connection with the New Testament he did not understand. But his Sendschreiben an J. Chr. Gass, 1807, concerning the First Epistle to Timothy, is the first thorough-going examination of that remarkable document, and has led the exegetes to appreciate the intimate relation between the pastoral epistles, — a relation so intimate, indeed, that they must be accepted or rejected together. Of still greater importance was his Kritische Versuch über die Schriften des Lukas, 1821, though only the first volume of the work on the Gospel of Luke ever appeared. Not that Schleiermacher here really achieved what he intended, viz., to represent the Gospel of Luke as a mosaic of a great number of different, previously existing narratives; but he contributed much to concentrate the interest of biblical scholars on the questions of the origin and formation of the Gospels. More successful was his hypothesis concerning the testimony of Papias (Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., iii. 39). It has been used by many, accepted by more, and hardly neglected by any.

In the Kurze Darstellung des theologischen Studiums, the theological stand-point of Schleiermacher is clearly defined. The fundamental facts of the Christian faith he accepts, not because he feels compelled by any philosophical demonstration, but simply because he finds them as facts in the consciousness of the Christian congregation. He then goes on to give an encyclopedic survey of those facts and their reciprocal relations, dividing the theological science into philosophical (apologetics-polemics), historical (exegesis-dogmatics), and practical theology. The book is neither a mere sketch nor an elaborate picture: it is a drawing executed with consummate skill, and rich in illustration and suggestion.

The ripest fruit of Schleiermacher's genius is Der christliche Glaube nach den Grundsätzen der evangelischen Kirche im Zusammenhange dargestellt, 1821, 2 vols. (2d ed., 1831, revised and improved). It made an extraordinary, not altogether favorable, impression at its first appearance. But it gradually grew upon scholars; and it now stands as a monument of religious enthusiasm and philosophical reasoning which has no equal in the theological literature, after Calvin's Institutiones. It consists of a series of small paragraphs connected with each other by intervening explications of a more elaborate character. The feeling from which religion springs is here further defined as a feeling of absolute dependence on God; and that feeling—not the demonstrations of a dialectical reasoning, nor the letter of a scriptural text—is made the touchstone on which the dogma must be tried. He rejects the doctrine of the Devil and the doctrine of the fall of the angels; because, as he alleges, they do not aid in solving the problem of the existence of evil, but rather make it more difficult. He also rejects the doctrine of miracles, at least in the sense of a breach upon natural law; because, as he protests, it is not demanded by true Christian piety. It must not be understood, however, that, when he thus declines to bow before the literal evidence of Scripture, he in any way gives in to the postulates of non-religious science. By no means! Few theologians have been so successful as he in keeping the doctrines of Christian faith separate from the propositions of natural science, without either bringing them into conflict with each other, or mixing them together in an incomplete harmony. In the centre of the whole system stands Christ and that which he has done for the salvation of man. The development runs between a double christological (Ebionism and Docetism) and a double anthropological heresy (Pelagianism and Manicheism): but the power of salvation is in no way bound up with the church, which by itself is nothing but the community of the faithful; it resides solely and fully in the intimate union between the faithful and the Saviour. Thus while the idea of God is, so to speak, presupposed as given in the very feeling of absolute dependence on him, and no special regard is paid to its aberrations into deism or pantheism, the idea of Christ is developed with a completeness and minuteness which testifies to the inner passion from which it sprang. Generally the work may be characterized as a combination of syncretism and pietism. Syncretism means the overthrow of all ecclesiastical exclusiveness by a deeper conception of the doctrines in question: pietism means the careful cultivation of the religious organ in which faith manifests itself, and by which it works. Originally these two tendencies, as represented by Calixtus and Spener, touched each other but slightly; but later times came to understand that an actual combination of them was necessary, and it was accomplished by Schleiermacher: hence his practical standpoint,—though belonging to the Reformed Church, he labored for its union with the Lutheran Church; and hence his scientific character. Syncretism developed into rationalism, and pietism into supernaturalism. But Schleiermacher is neither a rationalist nor a supernaturalist: he is a union of both. The ethical complement to the work may be found in a number of exquisite minor treatises on duty, on virtue, on the highest good, etc., foreshadowed by his Kritik aller bisherigen Sittenlehre, SCHMALKALD, League and Articles of. The League of Schmalkald was formed on Feb. 27, 1531, by nine princes and eleven imperial cities of Germany, under the leadership of the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Hesse, for the purpose of defending Protestantism. It was soon after joined by five other princes and ten imperial cities, and comprised, indeed, the whole of Northern Germany and a large part of Central and Southern Germany. The immediate effect of the formation of the league was the religious peace of Nuremberg in 1532; but it was evident to all that the emperor, Charles V., yielded, only because he was too occupied at that moment with France and the Turks to carry through his own views. The league acted in the beginning with considerable vigor. At a meeting on Dec. 24, 1535, it was determined to raise and maintain a standing army of ten thousand foot and two thousand cavalry; and at another meeting, on Feb. 15, 1537, a common confession, the so-called Articles of Schmalkald, was signed by all the members of the league. It was occasioned by the bull of Paul III., convoking a general council at Mantua, and is a vehement protest against the primacy of the Pope. It was drawn up by Luther, and became afterwards one of the symbolical books of the Lutheran Church. But soon internal jealousy between the princes began to weaken the actions of the league, and at Muhlberg its army was completely routed, April 21, 1547. It was Maurice of Saxony, and not the league of Schmalkald, which finally secured religious freedom by the treaty of Passau, July 31, 1552. See HORTLEDER: *Kaiser Karl V. wider die Schmäl. SCHMID, Christian Friedrich, b. at Bickelsberg in Württemberg, 1794; d. at Tübingen, March 28, 1852. He studied theology at Tübingen, and was appointed repetent there 1818, extraordinary professor in 1821, and ordinary in 1826, and given the degree of D.D. He lectured on exegesis and practical theology. He was a very modest scholar, and published very little. The two books by which he is widely known, his Biblische Theologie des Neuen Testaments (ed. C. Weizsäcker, Stuttgart, 1853 [4th ed. by A. Heller, 1868, Eng. trans., Biblical Theology of the New Testament, Edinburgh, 1870]), and Christliche Moral (ed. by A. Heller, Stuttgart, 1861, 2d ed., 1867), were published after his death. But he exercised a great and powerful influence on the side of positive Christianity, and as a counterpoise to his colleague, F. C. Baur; and through his pupils, especially Oehler and Dorner, he wields it still. Schmid's work upon the biblical theology of the New Testament is distinguished by its union of the historic sense and the thoughts of organic development with the most decided faith in the absolute revelation in Christ. It will long maintain its present high position. For further information respecting Schmid, and for a list of his own publications (only essays), see the preface to his Biblical Theology. CARL WEIZSÄCKER.

SCHMID, Konrad, b. at Küssnach, in the canton of Zürich, 1476; was educated in the house of the Johannites in his native city, and became an inmate there, 1519, after studying theology at Basel. Soon after, he became acquainted with Zwingli. In 1522 he began to preach in German, and against the Pope. In 1525 he presided at the disputation of Zürich, in 1528 at that of Bern, and throughout he proved himself the true friend and co-worker of Zwingli. Like him, he fell in the second Capel war, October, 1531. HAGENBACH.

SCHMIDT, Oswald Gottlob, D.D., Lutheran divine, b. at Kaditz, near Dresden, Jan. 2, 1821; d. at Werdau, Saxony, Dec. 26, 1882. He studied at Leipzig; in 1842 was licensed to preach; taught in private families until 1845, when he became pastor, first at Schönfeld, then, in 1856, at Greifenhain; and in 1866 he was elected pastor and superintendent at Werdau. He wrote, besides numerous articles in newspapers and reviews, Nicolaus Haussmann, der Freund Luthers, Leipzig, 1860; Caspar Crüger (ii. 2) and Georg der Gottseliger, Fürst zu Anhalt (iv. 2), in Leben der Altväter der lutherischen Kirche, 1861 sqq.; Petrus Mosellanus. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Humanismus in Sachsen, 1866; and the lecture, Blicke in die Kirchengeschichte der Stadt Meissen im Zeitalter der Reformation, 1879; Luther's Bekanntschaft mit den alten Classikern, 1883 (ed. W. Schmidt). For his contributions to this Encyclopædia, see Analysis.

SCHMOLKE, Benjamin (more accurately SCHMOLCK), one of the sweetest and most productive of the German hymn-writers; was b. in Brauchitschdorf, Liegnitz, Dec. 21, 1672; d. at Schweidnitz, Feb. 12, 1737. In 1693 he entered the university of Leipzig; four years later became his father's assistant as pastor; and in 1702 became co-pastor at Schweidnitz, and pastor primarius in 1714. The parish was a large one, and Schmolke's position was rendered difficult by the machinations of the Jesuits. His earnestness and sweetness of disposition, however, not only won the hearts of his parishioners, but disarmed the Jesuits. In 1735 he was obliged by physical infirmities, induced by paralytic strokes, to forego active labor. Schmolke's hymns were published in small collections during his lifetime, and soon found a permanent place in German hymn-books. They are pervaded by Christian piety and fervor, and are written in a simple and dignified style. They breathe a warm, personal love to Christ, and were written without effort. [The one best known in English is Mein Jesu, wie du willst, translated by Miss Jane Borthwick, "My Jesus, as thou wilt." She has also translated his fine lyric, "My God, I know that I must die." His Was Jesus that das ist wohlgethan has been rendered by Sir H. W. Baker (1861), "What our Father does is well."] Schmolke's works appeared at Tübingen, 1740-41, in 2 vols. A selection from his hymns and prayers has been published by Grote (2d ed., Leipzig, 1860), to which is prefixed a good memoir. DRYANDER.

SCHMUCKER, Samuel Simon, D.D., an American Lutheran divine, son of Rev. J. G. Schmucker, D.D.; b. at Hagerstown, Md., Feb. 28, 1799; d. at Gettysburg, Penn., July 26, 1873. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1817, and at the Princeton theological seminary, and was admitted into the ministry by the Lutheran ministerium of Pennsylvania in 1820. He was pastor at New Market, Va., 1820-26. He took a leading part in the organization of the General Synod and of the theological seminary at Gettysburg, in 1826. He was chosen its first professor, and continued to be chairman of its faculty till 1864, when he retired from official activity. The degree of D.D. was given him in 1830, simultaneously by Rutgers College, New Jersey, and the University of Pennsylvania. In 1846 he visited Germany, in company with Drs. B. Kurtz and J. G. Morris, with the double purpose of establishing, if possible, some communication between the church there and the Lutherans in the United States, and of obtaining books for the library of the seminary.

His doctrinal teaching was marked by indifference to the distinctive features of symbolical Lutheranism, which he held to be non-fundamental, and by laying stress on the common doctrines and principles of Protestantism, which he called fundamental. He accepted substantially the Augsburg Confession, but disliked the Formula of Concord. His mind was strongly impressed with the importance of mutual recognition and co-operative union among the various Protestant denominations. By his Fraternal Appeal to the American churches, first published in 1838, and circulated in England as well as here, he aided in preparing the way for the organization of the Evangelical Alliance, and attended its first meeting in London, 1846.

Dr. Schmucker was for many years the theological champion of Low-Church American Lutheranism, and one of the most active and influential ministers of the General Synod of his church. He was better known outside of his denomination than any other Lutheran minister. He prepared in all more than four hundred young men for the ministry, and was highly esteemed for his personal character, self-denying labors, and Christian spirit. But some of his ablest pupils forsook his theological stand-point, and adopted a stricter type of Lutheranism, which is represented in the General Council. When he entered upon public life, he found the Lutheran Church almost exclusively German, and in a comparatively stagnant condition. He helped to revive, educate, and to Anglicize it, and prepared the way for its present advanced position.

Among his numerous publications, the following are the most important: Biblical Theology of Storr and Platt, trans. from the German, Andover, 1826, 2 vols. (reprinted in England in 1845); Elements of Popular Theology, Andover, 1834 (9th ed., Philadelphia, 1860); Fraternal Appeal to the American Churches on Christian Union, New York, 1838; Psychology, or Elements of a New System of Mental Philosophy, New York, 1842; Dissertation on Capital Punishment, Philadelphia, 1845; The American Lutheran Church, historically, doctrinally, and practically delineated, Philadelphia, 1851; The Lutheran Manual on Scriptural Principles, or the Augsburg Confession illustrated and sustained by Scripture and Lutheran Theologians, Phila., 1855; The Lutheran Symbols, or Vindication of American Lutheranism, Baltimore, 1856; The Church of the Redeemer as developed within the General Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church, Baltimore, 1867; True Unity of Christ's Church, New York, 1870.

SCHNECKENBURGER, Matthias, b. at Thalheim in Wurtemberg, Jan. 17, 1804; d. at Bern in Switzerland, June 13, 1848. He studied theology at Tübingen, and was appointed preacher at Herrenberg in 1831, and professor of theology at Bern in 1834. His principal works are, Über den Zweck d. Apostelgeschichte, Bern, 1811; Vergleichende Darstellung des lutherischen und reformirten Lehrbegriffs, edited by Güder, Stuttgart, 1855, 2 vols.; Neutestamentliche Zeitgeschichte, edited by Löhlein, Frankfurt-am-M., 1862; Die Lehrbegriffe der kleineren prot. Kirchenparteien, edited by Hundeshagen, 1863. The reason why his works appeared so long after his death was the eccentricity of his widow, who kept his papers under lock and key. His chief merit lies in his historical criticism, and comparative dogmatics or symbolics. He most ably set forth the difference between the Lutheran and Reformed Confessions. See, for further information, the full art. by HUNDESHAGEN, in the first edition of HERZOG, xiii. 609-618.

SCHÖBERLEIN, Ludwig Friedrich, b. at Kolmburg, near Ansbach, Sept. 6, 1813; d. at Göttingen, July 8, 1881. He was successively repetent (1841), privatdocent (1849), and ordinary professor of theology (1855, till death) in the university of Göttingen; but from 1850 to 1855 he was extraordinary professor at Heidelberg. In 1862 he was appointed Consistorialrath, and in 1878 abbot of Bursfelde. He was an orthodox Lutheran, but with a mystical tendency. His principal writings relate to liturgies; but he also produced D. Grund-lehren d. Heils, entwickelt aus dem Prinzip der Liebe (1848), Die Geheimnisse des Glaubens (1872), Das Prinzip u. System der Dogmatik (1881).

SCHOLASTIC THEOLOGY is often identified with mediæval theology, and placed over against patristic theology as the theology of the primitive church. It is undeniable, that, with the close of the sixth or the beginning of the seventh century, Christian theology changed character; and it is perfectly correct to designate the period from that time, and down to the Reformation, as the theology of the middle ages. But it is, nevertheless, inadmissible to use the terms "scholasticism" and "mediæval theology" as synonymous; for there is a most important difference between Isidore of Seville, Beda, Alcuin, Rhabanus Maurus, Paschasius Radbertus, and Scotus Erigena on the one side, and Anselm, Abelard, Peter the Lombard, Thomas Aquinas, and Duns Scotus on the other. Scholasticism forms only one period of the theology of the middle ages,—from the close of the eleventh century to the Reformation.

The teachers of the primitive church are justly called the Fathers (patres). They produced the dogmas. Through their manifold doctrinal controversies and discussions they unfolded and developed the whole contents of the Christian faith, and by the decisions of their great œcumenical councils they formulated and fixed the dogmas. But with the close of the sixth century the theological productivity ceased. The work was done. All the materials for the formation of a doctrinal system of Christianity were present. No essential element of Christian faith was left undefined. Then there came a time,—the attempt at building up new state organizations on the ruin of the Roman Empire, the exertions of the Germanic Barbarians to adopt and assimilate the Romano-Christian civilization,—a time of confusion and chaos,—national, social, political,—during which it was the task of the theologian to gather together the doctrinal materials acquired, to sift them, to preserve them. The theologians of that time, the first period of mediæval theology, from the seventh to the eleventh century,—a Cassiodorus, an Isidore of Seville, a Beda, an Alcuin,—are not men of creative genius, but of encyclopedic knowledge, compilers, though compilers of enormous industry and deep conscientiousness. But of course the materials could not be gathered and kept together in a merely mechanical way, without any trace of individual treatment; and towards the close of the period complaints are heard, that people put more faith in Boëthius—that is, in dialectics, in philosophy—than in Holy Writ. Indeed, Scotus Erigena is often mentioned as the father of scholasticism; though he was a philosopher rather than a theologian, and though he lacks one of the essential characteristics of scholasticism,—recognition of the tradition of the church as absolute authority. In reality scholasticism begins with the controversy between Berengar of Tours and Lanfranc; and Anselm is the first who fully represents its principles.

Scholastic theology is something more than a mere preservation, or arrangement, or application of the dogmas: it is an actual treatment. But the treatment is merely formal. New dogmas were not added. Even those which received a farther development under the hands of the schoolmen — such as the doctrine of the offices of Christ, or the doctrine of the sacraments — had been fully defined by the preceding ages, at least with respect to their fundamental outlines. Nor were the dogmas altered with respect to their essential contents. The problem which the schoolmen undertook to solve was simply to give each dogma a rational substructure sufficient to elevate it from a mere matter of faith to a matter of science, and to form the whole mass of dogmas into a consistent and harmonious totality, a system. They were not patres: they were only doctores et magistri. The very name "scholasticism" shows the character of the movement. The dogma was transferred from the church to the school: the university became the hearth of scholasticism. A truly speculative conception of Christianity was not produced, however. It may be that the schoolmen really hoped to create the philosophy of Christianity; to demonstrate Christianity as rational, and the rational as Christian; to fuse faith and science, theology and philosophy, into a perfect unity. But, if so, they failed. The principles of their theology prevented them from succeeding, no less than the principles of their philosophy. Theologically the schoolmen proceeded from the supposition that the whole contents of the Christian faith, that is, each single dogma, is absolute, divine truth; and the warrant for this supposition is sought for, not in the very essence of Christianity or in the inner nature of man, but in the authority of the Church and her tradition. The fault is here not the application of the principle of authority, but the external and superficial character of the authority appealed to. Of course, an attempt is made to demonstrate and prove the absolute and divine authority of the Church. But again mere externalities are resorted to, — her miracles; and at every point this authority, rationally and philosophically so poorly established, bears the sway. Scholastic theology recognized a double rule of faith, — Scripture and tradition. Some of the schoolmen use the rules promiscuously, as, for instance, Anselm, Hugo of St. Victor, and Peter the Lombard. Others, as for instance, Abelard, Thomas Aquinas, and Duns Scotus, make a distinction between the two rules, and give Scripture the precedence, but it is only theoretically, not in their practice. And how could they have done otherwise? They had not the original text of the Old and New Testament, but only the Latin translation, the Vulgate, and in their exegesis they were again fettered by the tradition, beyond which they were not allowed to make one step. To these theological principles the philosophical principles corresponded exactly. Having established the dogma on an external authority, that of the church, and made it absolutely transcendental to human reason, the schoolmen could employ philosophy only for subordinate purposes, — philosophia ancilla theologiae, — to analyze the contents of its dogma through definitions, distinctions, and questions; to find out all the arguments pro et contra; to form by means of the syllogism a bridge from one dogma to another, and to bring them all together in a visible, schematic combination. Anselm hoped by the syllogistic method to elevate the truths of faith into true scientific knowledge. But, in accordance with its very nature, the syllogism refers only to the formal relations between two given ideas: of their inner truth and necessity it can tell us nothing.

Anselm (1033–1109) was the first who clearly set forth the principle of scholasticism, and also the first who successfully employed it. That fusion of faith and knowledge, of theology and philosophy, which was the great aim of scholasticism, he tried to accomplish in opposition, on the one side, to a faith which simply excluded reason, on the other, to a reason which forgot its own natural bounds. The former stand-point was represented by the old positive theology of the preceding age, which never dreamed of a rational demonstration of the contents of faith; the latter by Roscelin, whose nominalism seemed to point in another direction than that indicated by the church. Among the successors or continuators of Anselm, Bernard of Clairvaux (1091–1153) leaned towards traditionalism; and Abelard (1079–1142), towards rationalism. But though Bernard considered the speculations of Abelard to be dangerous novelties, liable to bring the tradition of the church into contempt, he was himself by no means satisfied with the pure traditionalism of the old theologi positivi. He demanded a fuller and deeper assimilation of the contents of the tradition; and he found it in the mystical contemplation, which, with its ecstasy, is an anticipation of the life to come. Abelard, on the other hand, was very far from being a rationalist in the modern sense of the word. A pupil both of the nominalist Roscelin and the realist William of Champeaux, he was also an adversary of both, and tried to form his own philosophical principle, the so-called "conceptualism." But though he complained very much of people who despised the dialectico-philosophical treatment of the dogmas, because they were liable to fall into superstition and fanaticism, and though his famous book, Sic et non, seems intended to undermine the authority of tradition, he submitted unconditionally to the verdict of the church, and that both theoretically and practically. A fine and harmonious union between the mysticism of Bernard and the dialectics of Abelard was effected by the Victorines, — Hugo of St. Victor (1097–1141), and his disciple, Richard of St. Victor. The stand-point of Anselm is still retained so far as the church and the tradition are accepted as rules of faith, and the necessity is recognized of progressing from faith to reason in order to reach certainty. But Hugo of St. Victor differs from Anselm by his distinction between necessaria, probabilia, mirabilia, and incredibilia, of which he placed the first and the last group entirely without any relation to faith: while of the two middle groups, the true domain of faith, only the probabilia, that is, the truths of the so-called natural religion, can receive any affirmation from reason; the mirabilia, or alia supra rationem, are completely inaccessible to reason. This, the first departure of scholasticism, reached its point of culmination with Peter the Lombard, the magister sententiarum (d. in 1160). He united the positive and the dialectical tendencies which he found combating each other on the theological arena, and employed dialectics as a means by which to solve such contradictions as might occur in the positive statements of the authorities. His book recommended itself by its ecclesiastical correctness and its dialectical adroitness, and it became the most used and most admired scholastic text-book ever produced. But a true reconciliation between reason and revelation, philosophy and theology, it does not give; and, indeed, it seems as if the author studiously tried to avoid touching the point. The doctrines of Scripture, tradition, and the church, he does not treat at all: he presupposes their absolute authority as an incontrovertible axiom.

Down to this time, only some of the logical writings of Aristotle were known to the West in Latin translations, but none of his works on physics and metaphysics. The more intimate intercourse, however, which sprang up between the East and the West on account of the crusades, and more especially on account of the establishment of a Latin empire in Constantinople in 1204, and the introduction of the Arabian philosophy to the Christian world, soon put the schoolmen in possession of the whole of Aristotle. The Arabs had not only translated and commented on all his works, but they had even developed a philosophy of their own on the basis of Aristotle and the Neo-Platonists; and, towards the end of the twelfth and in the beginning of the thirteenth century, the Christian scholars of Western Europe became acquainted with this Arabian philosophy through the Spanish Jews. At first the Aristotelian writings were looked upon with some suspicion. The heretical eccentricities of an Amalric of Bena or a David of Dinanto were referred back to them as their true source, and the Pope repeatedly forbade the study of them (1209, 1215, 1231). But the inner affinity between scholasticism and Aristotle conquered all opposition; and the influence of the renewed study of his works soon became visible on scholastic theology. The old questions of the true relation between reason and revelation, science and faith, philosophy and theology, were deeper put, and better answered; and new questions arose, — of the true nature of Christianity in comparison with other religions; of the true character of theology, — whether a science or not, whether a theoretical or a practical science, etc. Not only ethics, but also physics, was incorporated with the doctrinal system, so that the materials gradually swelled into immensity. The form was generally that of a commentary on the Sententie, though sometimes, also, that of an independent summa, but in both cases the dialectical method was carried out in the minutest details, with its thesis et antithesis, its pro et contra, its resolutio et conclusio, etc.

The first great representative of this the second departure of scholastic theology was Alexander of Hales (d. 1245); but he was completely eclipsed by Albert the Great (1193-1280), in whose works all the principal characteristics of the age are palpably present. By his enormous erudition, encompassing all sciences, he impressed people in general as a kind of magician: on account of his close imitation of Aristotle, he was by scholars often called simia Aristotelis ("the ape of Aristotle"). But, though he certainly lacked critical power, he was by no means without speculative ideas; and his definition of theology as a practical science, the science of God and his works, elaborated, not for the sake of knowledge, but for the sake of salvation, exercised a lasting influence. A complete theological system, however, he did not produce; but his fundamental ideas were taken up and developed by his pupil, Thomas Aquinas (1227-74), (the greatest of the schoolmen, [and recommended by Pope Leo XIII. as the greatest of all the doctors of the church]). The contemplation of God, he teaches, is the highest good which can fall to the lot of man, the very acme of blessedness; but, on account of the incommensurability of the divine and the created, man can never reach that goal by his own natural reason. By reason man can only acquire an indirect knowledge of God, such as can be demonstrated from his works. In order to obtain any direct knowledge of God, man needs a supernatural aid, a revelation; and just as philosophy starts from the natural fact, and proceeds towards knowledge of God by the light of reason, so theology starts from the revealed fact, and proceeds towards knowledge of God by the light of faith. Theology and philosophy have the same method and the same goal, only the starting-points and the spheres are different. Bonaventura (1221-74), a friend of Thomas Aquinas, added, perhaps, nothing to the common stock of ideas; but the calm repose of his character and the sweet mysticism of his mind procured for his teaching a great influence; while the fantastic formalism of Raimundus Lullus (1235-1315) had no other effect than the formation of a small school, which soon died out. With Duns Scotus (1260-1308) the great controversy between Thomists and Scotists broke out. Thomas Aquinas belonged to the Dominican order, Duns Scotus, to the Franciscan; and more than once the whole controversy between their adherents has been described as caused by mere jealousy and rivalry between their orders. It is true that it contributed nothing to the further development of scholastic theology; but the scientific dissension between Thomas Aquinas and Duns Scotus is, nevertheless, fundamental and decisive. Duns Scotus dissolved that unity between faith and science, between theology and philosophy, which was the pride of scholasticism; and in its stead he placed a positivism which has only to take one step in order to reach scepticism, — a step which Duns Scotus himself can justly be said to have taken by his peculiar quodlibet method, placing the pro and the contra over against each other without any mediation, and leaving the reader to make the decision for himself.

After Duns Scotus the decay of scholasticism begins, soon to end in complete dissolution. One of the reasons was the adoption of nominalism. Even Duns Scotus gave up the reigning realism, turning it into the so-called formalism. Durandus de Sancto Porciano (d. 1334) abandoned it altogether, and adopted nominalism; and with Occam (1280-1347) the effects of this change of principle become visible. Realism — the doctrine that the general ideas were really present in the individual things, universalia in re — was indeed the band between theology and philosophy. As soon as nominalism — the doctrine that the universalia are merely the products of the human reason, nothing but forms of reasoning, voces, nomina — became prevalent, and was actually carried through in the system, the band snapped, and theology and philosophy separated. From that time theology reigned alone, but it ceased to be a science: it became a mere commandment. The change is painfully apparent in the writings of Occam. When he undermines the Christian dogmas from end to end by his logic, and then ostentatiously retires to the faith of the church; when from the doctrines of the church he draws logical inferences which directly run out into absurdity, or indirectly lead into self-contradictions; when he connects the most sublime ideas with scurrilous problems or ludicrous problems, — what is that all but frivolity? The invention of a double truth, or the axiom that something can be true in philosophy though it is false in religion, and vice versa, cannot be fastened on Occam, nor on any of the schoolmen in particular. Nevertheless, when Roman-Catholic historians and critics ascribe it to the anti-scholastic philosophers of the fifteenth century, and quote its condemnation by the Fifth Council of the Lateran (1513) as an argument, they are certainly mistaken: it was openly avowed and violently attacked already in the fourteenth century. At all events, it became the stumbling-block of scholasticism: for, however firmly and decidedly repudiated, it is a simple and natural consequence of nominalism; and, after Occam, nominalism reigned uninterruptedly in scholastic theology. It was the principle of Gabriel Biel (d. 1495), generally styled the last of the schoolmen.

SCHOLIUM, The, occupies a middle position between the gloss or marginal note on a single passage and the commentary, or the full interpretation of the whole work. It may be defined as a string of notes made for the use of the school, and it occurs in that sense in the works of Cicero. As instances of scholia may be mentioned the commentaries of Nicholas of Lyra, the notes of Hugo Grotius, and more especially the Gnomon of J. A. Bengel (5th ed., Tübingen, 1835, 2 vols.).

SCHÖNHERR, Johann Heinrich, b. Nov. 30, 1770, at Memel; was the son of a Prussian sergeant; in his fifteenth year he was apprenticed with a merchant at Königsberg, but soon abandoned commerce, and, after preparatory studies, entered the university of that city as student of theology, 1792; turned from theology to metaphysics, and finding the views of Kant unpalatable, and unable to satisfy his eager thirst for light on the momentous themes of immortality and the destiny of man, made independent inquiries designed to harmonize nature and reason with the declarations of Holy Scripture, and published the results of his investigations in two pamphlets (Sieg der Göttlichen Offenbarung, Königsberg, 1804). He was wont to unfold his views to a small circle of friends: and the attempt to suppress their meetings as inimical to the teachings of the church, and sectarian, proved unsuccessful; for the Ministerium for Cultus declared (1814) that his notions, being clearly meant to sustain the doctrines of the Bible, were ethically not only not dangerous, but beneficial. The presentation of his unsystematic system in different German universities had but little encouragement; and after six years spent as a private tutor he returned (1800) to Königsberg, and settled there, lecturing in private on his favorite themes, and died in Spittelhof, Oct. 15, 1826. He and his philosophy were soon forgotten; but, in consequence of the Religious Suit (1835–42), the whole subject came up again, and gave rise to numerous publications, of which a fuller account is given in EBEL (q.v.). The whole literature, with full particulars of the cosmogony and peculiar teaching of this theosophist, may be seen in Faith Victorious, being an Account of the Life and Labors, and of the Times, of the Venerable Dr. Johann Ebel, etc., N.Y., 1882, by the present writer. SCHOTT, Heinrich August, b. at Leipzig, Dec. 5, 1780; d. at Jena, Dec. 29, 1835. He studied theology in his native city, and was appointed professor there in 1805, at Wittenberg in 1809, and at Jena in 1812. His principal work is his Theorie der Beredsamkeit, Leipzig, 1815–28, 3 vols.

SCHÖTTGEN, Christian, b. at Wurzen, March 14, 1687; d. at Dresden, Dec. 15, 1751. He was school principal in Francfort (1716), Stargard (1719), and of the "Kreuzschule" at Dresden (1727). He wrote De secta Flagellantium comment., Leipzig, 1711; Vom Ursprung des Gregorius-Fests, Francfort-am-O., 1716; Horæ Ebraicæ et Talmudicæ in universum N. Testamentum, Dresden and Leipzig, 1733, 1742, 2 vols.; Jesus der wahre Messias, Leipzig, 1748 (in great part merely a German reproduction of the preceding); Novum lexicon gr.-lat. in N. T., Leipzig, 1746, last edition by Spohn, Halle, 1819; Trituræ et fulloniæ, Leipzig, 1763. (reprinted from UGOLINO's Thesaurus).

SCHRÖCKH, Johann Matthias, a distinguished church historian: was b. of Protestant parents in Vienna, July 26, 1733; d. at Wittenberg, Aug. 2, 1808. In 1751 he entered the university of Göttingen, where he came under the moulding influence of Mosheim and Michaelis. After spending several years in literary labors in connection with his uncle, Professor Karl Andreas Bell, at Leipzig, and in lecturing as docent until he was appointed professor in 1761, he left Leipzig to accept a call to the professorship of poetry at Wittenberg, from which he was transferred to the chair of church history in 1775. He gave three lectures a day in his department, and to these labors added a rare diligence of authorship. He died in consequence of a fall from a step-ladder while he was reaching up for some books in his library. His great work, a monument of immense industry (Leipzig, 1768-1812), was his Ausführliche Gesch. d. christl. Kirche (Complete History of the Christian Church), in 45 vols. The last two volumes of the ten upon the period since the Reformation were completed by Tzschirner. They cover the history of eighteen centuries. Other church historians have written in a better style, and have understood certain periods and movements more fully; but up to this time we have no other work covering such a long period, combining so many excellences. A handbook of church history (Historia relig. et eccles. Christi adumbrata in usum lectionum) appeared in Berlin, 1777, passed through five editions (fifth, 1808) during the author's lifetime, and was issued by Marheinecke for the seventh time, 1828. He also prepared the Allgemeine Biographie, 1767-91, 8 vols. See K. L. NITZSCH: Ueber J. M. Schröckh's Studienreise u. Maximen, Weimar, 1809; TZSCHIRNER: Ueber Johann M. Schröckh's Leben, Charakter, und Schriften, Leipzig, 1812. G. H. KLIPPEL.

SCHULTENS, Albert, the father of modern Hebrew grammar; was b. at Gröningen, in 1686, and early destined to a theological career. He studied the original languages of the Bible, Hebrew and Greek, with which he afterwards combined the study of Chaldee, Syriac, and Rabbinic. The first-fruit of these studies was a public disputation, which he held with Gusselius when only eighteen years of age, and in which he maintained that the Arabic is indispensably necessary to a knowledge of Hebrew. After completing his studies, he visited Leyden and Utrecht, and became acquainted with Reland, who edited his Annotaciones Philologicae in Jobum, Utrecht, 1705. In the year 1709 he was promoted as doctor of theology, and in 1711 he took charge of the pastorate at Wassenae, which, however, he soon exchanged for the chair of Oriental languages at the academy in Franeker. In 1729 he was called to the theological seminary at Leyden, and died there Jan. 26, 1759.

The services which Schultens rendered to philology are of great value. He was the first to overturn the notion that Hebrew is the original language given to man by God, and showed that the Hebrew was nothing but a branch of the Shemitic stem, and that Arabic was an indispensable means for the understanding of the Hebrew. Thus he opened a new path in Hebrew grammar and biblical exegesis, advancing at the same time the study of Oriental languages. Of his works which pertain to Hebrew grammar and biblical literature, we mention, Origines Hebraeae, etc., Franeker, 1721-38, 2 vols., and a preliminary work, De Defectibus Hodiernae Linguae Hebraeae, Franeker 1731 (new edition of both works, Leyden, 1761); Institutiones ad fundamenta linguae Hebraicae, etc., Leyden, 1737, 1756; Vetus et regia via Hebraizandi, etc., Leyden, 1738 (a rejoinder to his opponents, which he carries further in Eccursus ad caput primum viarum veteris et regiae Hebraizandi, etc., Leyden, 1739); Liber Jobicum nova versione, Leyden, 1737, 2 vols.; Proecibia Salomonis, etc., Leyden, 1748, an abridgment of which was published by G. J. L. Vogel, Halle, 1769. Ten separately printed dissertations and addresses were collected and published by his son, in Opera minora, etc., Halle, 1769. In manuscript he left commentaries on different books of the Old Testament, a Hebrew lexicon, and an Aramaean grammar. Comp. SCHWARTZ, Christian Friedrich, b. at Sonnenburg, Prussia, Oct. 26, 1726; d. at Tanjore, Feb. 13, 1798; one of the most energetic and successful missionaries of the eighteenth century. He studied theology at Halle; and, having made himself master of the Tamil language, he was sent as missionary to Tranquebar in 1750 by the Danish Missionary Society in Copenhagen. Having entered the service of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge in London, in 1767, his station was in 1779 removed to Tanjore, where he remained to his death. He founded many congregations among the natives, exercised a most beneficial influence during the war of Hyder Ali, and contributed much to make the name and character of Europe respected and trusted in India. See PEARSON: Memoirs of C. F. Schwartz, 1834; J. F. FENGER: Geschichte der trankebar. Mission, Grinnau, 1845. H. GUNDELT.

SCHWARZ, Friedrich Heinrich Christian, b. at Giessen, May 30, 1766; d. at Heidelberg, April 3, 1837. He studied theology in his native city, held several pastoral charges in Hesse, and was in 1804 appointed professor of theology at Heidelberg. He took a great interest in pedagogy, founded prosperous educational institutions, and published in 1835 his Lehrbuch der Erziehungs- und Unterrichtslehre (3 vols.), which, containing an elaborate history of pedagogy, still is a standard work on the subject. HUNDSEHAGEN.

SCHWEBEL, Johann, b. at Pforzheim in Baden, 1490; d. at Zweibrücken, May 19, 1540. He was educated in the school of his native city, a celebrated institution; entered the order of the Holy Spirit, and was ordained a priest in 1514, but embraced the Reformation, left the order in 1519, began to preach evangelical truths, but was in 1522 compelled to flee, and seek refuge with Franz von Sickingen. In the following year he settled at Zweibrücken in the Palatinate, where he remained for the rest of his life, active in introducing the Reformation. His Latin writings appeared at Zweibrücken, in two volumes, 1595-97; his German, also in two volumes, in 1598.

SCHWEGLER, Albert, the most distinguished representative of the Tübingen school next to Baur; was b. at Michelbach, Württemberg, Feb. 10, 1819; d. at Tübingen, Jan. 5, 1857; studied at the seminaries of Schonthal and Tübingen; devoted himself especially to the study of church history; was for nearly a year pastor at Bebenhausen; became docent in philosophy at Tübingen 1843, professor of Roman literature and antiquities in 1848, and shortly before his death professor of ancient history. He distinguished himself greatly at the university, and studied with zeal the Hegelian philosophy. In 1841 appeared his Montanism and the Christian Church in the Second Century (Der Montanismus u. d. christliche Kirche d. 2. Jahrhundert.). Through Strauss' Leben Jesu and other studies he found himself at variance with the teachings of the church, and in 1846 published (at Tübingen) his Post-Apostolic Age (D. nachapost. Zeitalter). It was written in six months, and exaggerates the Baur hypothesis of the early church, and dislocates the origin of the writings of the New Testament. The work asserts that early Christianity was pure Ebionism, and builds up the history of the early church on this foundation. The author had already declared himself for this theory in his work on Montanism. In 1847 Schwegler edited The Clementine Homilies, and in 1852 Eusebius, and published a translation and exposition of Aristotle's Metaphysics (Uebersetzung und Erläuterung der aristot. Metaphysik), 1847; A History of Philosophy, 1848, [11th ed., 1882, Eng. trans. by J. H. Seelye, New York, and Stirling, London, 1872, etc.]; and a History of Rome, 3 vols., 1853-55. HERZOG.

SCHYN, Hermannus, b. in Amsterdam, 1662; d. there 1727. He studied medicine at Leyden and Utrecht, and began to practise at Rotterdam, but was drawn to the study of theology, and became in 1686 preacher to the Mennonites in Rotterdam, and in 1690 to the Doopsgezinden in Amsterdam. He published sermons and other edifying writings; but his principal work is his Historia Mennonitarum (Amst., 1723, 2 vols.), not a complete or pragmatic history of the movement, yet rich in valuable information. J. J. VAN OOSTERZEE.

SCOTCH CONFESSION OF FAITH. It was drawn up by John Knox and his compeers at the request of the Scotch Parliament which assembled at Edinburgh in August, 1560, after the death of the queen-regent, Mary of Guise (June), and the close of the civil war. It consists of a preface and twenty-five articles on the chief doctrines of religion, which are briefly, tersely, and vigorously stated. It agrees with the other Reformed Confessions of the sixteenth century, but is more pronounced in its opposition to the Roman-Catholic Church than most of them. It was rather hastily composed in four days, twice read, article by article, in Parliament, and adopted by the same as being "based upon the infallible word of God." Only three temporal lords voted against it, for the reason that they believed as their forefathers believed. The Roman-Catholic bishops were called upon to object and refute, but kept silence. Seven years later (1567), after the abdication of Queen Mary, the Confession was re-adopted, and the Reformed Kirk of Scotland formally acknowledged and established. In 1580 the Confession was signed by King James II., and a supplementary confession (sometimes called the Second Scotch Confession) added to it. It continued to be the only doctrinal standard of Scotland recognized by the civil government till the revolution of 1688; but it was practically superseded by the Westminster Confession, which is more logical and complete, and was adopted by the Covenanters and the General Assembly during the Commonwealth. The Scotch Confession is printed in the Acts of the Scotch Parliament for 1560; in KNOX: History of the Scotch Reformation (ed. Laing, vol. ii.); in CALDERWOOD: History of the Kirk of Scotland; in DUNLOP: Collection of Scotch Confessions (vol. ii.); in NIEMEYER: Collec. Confess. Reform. (Latin only); and in SCHAFF: Hist. of the Creeds of Christendom, vol. iii. 437-485 (English and Latin); comp. vol. i. 680-696. PHILIP SCHAFF.

SCOTCH PARAPHRASES. In May, 1742, the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland appointed a committee, consisting of WILLIAM ROBERTSON (father of the historian; minister of London Wall, Borthwick, and Old Greyfriars, Edinburgh; d. about 1743), ROBERT BLAIR (b. in Edinburgh, 1699; d. Feb. 4, 1746; minister of Athelstaneford, East Lothian, 1731; author of The Grave, 1743), and others, to make or collect translations in verse of select passages of Scripture. Their work was sanctioned by the Assembly, 1751, and appeared as Scripture Songs, forty-five in number, and now rare. In 1775 another committee undertook the revision of these, adding twenty-two paraphrases and five hymns. The complete result was approved and printed, 1781. Among the revisers were HUGH BLAIR (author of the well-known Rhetoric, 1783, and Sermons, 1777-1800; b. in Edinburgh, April 7, 1718; d. Dec. 27, 1800; minister of the High Church, 1758; professor in the university of Edinburgh, 1762), JOHN LOGAN (b. near Edinburgh, 1748; d. in London, Dec. 28, 1788; minister at Leith, 1773; author of two volumes of Sermons, etc.), JOHN MORRISON, D.D. (b. County of Aberdeen, 1719; minister of Canisbay, Caithness, 1780; d. there June 12, 1798; translated book ii. of the Æneid, 1787), and WILLIAM CAMERON (b. 1751; studied at Aberdeen; minister of Kirknewton in Midlothian, 1785; d. Nov. 17, 1811; author of sundry poems, etc.). Each of these is believed to have written one or more of the Paraphrases, but the precise authorship cannot be determined in every case. Some twenty were altered or rewritten from Watts, and three from Doddridge; one each was contributed by Dr. Blacklock, Dr. J. Ogilvie, and W. Randall; three are by W. Robertson (1742-51), and several by Morrison. Cameron's name appears chiefly as an improver of other men's verses. The most important share, both for quantity and quality, was taken from the manuscripts of MICHAEL BRUCE (1746-67; see Appendix), intrusted, after the author's death, to Logan, and by him basely used, and published as his own. The Paraphrases are marked by a dry neatness and precision of style, which excludes whatever could offend the most sober taste, and leaves little room for lyrical or devotional fire. Their eminent respectability and long service have made them household words in Scotland, and they have been constantly and largely drawn upon by English and American hymnals. F. M. BIRD.

SCOTT, Elizabeth, the author of many once popular and useful hymns; was b. at Norwich, Eng., probably in 1708; and d. at Wethersfield, Conn., June 13, 1776. She refused the hand, but retained the friendship, of Dr. Doddridge, who introduced to her a distinguished New-Englander, Col. Elisha Williams (1691-1755), once (1726-39) rector of Yale College. Having married him in 1751, she migrated to Connecticut. In 1761 she married Hon. William Smith of New York. After his death, in 1769, she lived with relatives of her first husband at Wethersfield, Conn. Her hymns were begun at her father's suggestion, and most of them written probably before his death in 1740; but they did not see the light till much later. A few of them appeared in Dr. Doob's Christian Magazine (1763-64), twenty-one in ASH and EVANS's Collection (1769), and eight of them, with twelve more, in DOBELL's New Selection (1806). Her entire poetical manuscript is in the library of Yale College. F. M. BIRD.

SCOTT, Levi, D.D., senior bishop of the Methodist-Episcopal Church; b. near Cantwell's Bridge (now Odessa), Del., Oct. 11, 1802; d. there Thursday, July 12, 1882. He was licensed, 1825, and received into the Philadelphia Conference, 1826. From 1840 to 1843 he was principal of Dickinson Grammar-School, Carlisle, Penn.; was a member of every General Conference from 1837 to 1852; in the latter year he was elected bishop, and served the church with great ability and faithfulness.

SCOTT, Thomas, brother of Elizabeth Scott, not to be confounded with his namesake the commentator; was a dissenting minister at Lowestoft in Suffolk, Ipswich (1737-74), and Hopton in Norfolk, where he d. 1775. Apart from some sermons, all his publications were poetical: the chief of them are, The Book of Job in English Verse (1771), and the meritorious and interesting volume of Lyric Poems, Devotional and Moral (1773). These are designed "to form a kind of little poetical system of piety and morals," and cover in careful order the whole ground of what he considered most important in natural and revealed religion. His opinions seem to have been semi-Arian; and his hymns have been chiefly, though by no means exclusively, used by Unitarians. The most familiar of them are, "Hasten, sinner, to be wise," and "Angels, roll the rock away." F. M. BIRD.

SCOTT, Thomas, Church of England; b. at Braytoft, Lincolnshire, Feb. 16, 1747; d. at Aston Sandford, Buckinghamshire, April 16, 1821. He was ordained priest in 1773; and in 1781 he succeeded John Newton, who had converted him to Calvinism, as curate of Olney. In 1785 he became chaplain of the Lock Hospital, London, and in 1801 vicar of Aston Sandford. His first publication was The Force of Truth: a Marvellous Narrative of Human Life, London, 1779 (10th ed., Edinburgh, 1816), an account of his religious change. His most important work, and that for which he is so celebrated, is A Family Bible with Notes, 1788-92, 5 vols., repeatedly re-issued and reprinted, several American editions. This has long been considered a model family Bible, and has been read more widely, perhaps, than any other. It speaks volumes for Scott's industry and skill, that without early educational advantages, oppressed by poverty, and compelled for years before his ordination to earn his living as a farm-laborer, he yet was able to acquire considerable learning, and to present it in so popular a way.

See ALIBONE, s. v., for bibliographical and critical remarks respecting this Commentary. Scott's Essays on the Most Important Subjects in Religion were published in 1793, 15th ed., 1844. His Works, edited by his son, appeared in 1823, 10 vols. See his Life, London, 1822, New York, 1856.

SCOTTISH PHILOSOPHY has several very marked features, determined by the bones rather than by the flesh. First, It professes to proceed by the method of induction, that is, by the observation of facts. In this respect it is like the physical sciences, and differs entirely from the ancient and mediæval systems, which sought to discover truth by analysis and deduction, from the joint dogmatic and deductive method of Descartes and his school, from the critical method of Kant, and the dialectic of Hegel. Second, It observes its facts, not by the external senses, but by self-consciousness. In this respect it differs from physical science and from the materialist and physiological schools of our day. It does look at the brain and nerves (Reid and Brown, and, in our day, Calderwood, looked at these), but it is merely to aid it in investigating purely mental phenomena falling under the eye of consciousness. Third, By the observations of consciousness it discovers principles working in the mind prior to and independent of our observation of them or of our experience: these it calls reason in the first degree as distinguished from reasoning, intuition, common sense (Reid), fundamental laws of thought (Stewart). This is its important characteristic, distinguishing it from Locke, and from empiricists who discover nothing higher than the generalization of a gathered experience; whereas the Scottish school discover principles above experience, and regulating experience. Mental philosophy is in a sense inductive, as it is by induction we discover fundamental laws and their mode of operation; but these laws exist prior to induction, and guide to and guarantee primitive truth.

The influential philosophy, when the Scottish school arose, was that of Locke, whose Essay on Human Understanding was published in 1690. The early Scottish metaphysicians express their great obligations to Locke, and never differ from him without expressing a regret that they are obliged to do so. But, in order to keep his experiential philosophy from drifting into scepticism, they call in certain primitive principles.

Francis Hutcheson (1694-1716), an Irishman of Scottish descent, and professor of moral philosophy in the University of Glasgow, is entitled to be regarded as the founder of the school. In his Inquiry into the Original of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue (1725), and in An Essay on the Nature and Conduct of the Passions and Affections, with Illustrations of the Moral Sense (1728), he calls in a moral sense, after the manner of Shaftesbury, to oppose the defective ethical theory of Locke.

David Hume appeared in the mean time (1711-76). As Berkeley had denied the existence of matter as a substance, so Hume denies the existence of mind as a substance, and reduces every thing to sensation and ideas, with relations discovered between them; that of cause and effect being merely that of invariable antecedence and consequence. (See his Treatise of Human Nature, 1739.) In An Inquiry concerning the Principles of Morals he represented virtue as consisting in the agreeable and useful. The Scottish metaphysicians had now to defend truth from the scepticism of their countryman.

Thomas Reid (1710-96) may be regarded as the fittest representative of the school. He was a professor, first in Aberdeen, and then in Glasgow. He published An Inquiry into the Human Mind on the Principles of Common Sense, in 1761, followed by Essays on the Intellectual Powers of Man, in 1785, and Essays on the Active Powers, in 1788. In these works he opposes vigorously Locke's views as to idea, which had culminated in the idealism of Berkeley, and shows that there is in the mind a reason in the first degree, or a common sense, which gives us a foundation of truth and morality. A number of other writers appeared in Scotland about the same time, such as James Beattie (1735-1802), author of Essay on Truth, and George Campbell (1710-96), author of Philosophy of Rhetoric. — all attacking Hume, and defending the truth on much the same principles as Reid.

Dugald Stewart (1753-1828) was the most illustrious disciple of Reid, and sought to establish what he called the "fundamental laws of human belief." By his clear exposition and his elegant style he recommended the Scottish metaphysics to the English people. Towards the end of the last century and the beginning of this, the philosophy of Reid and Stewart had a powerful influence in France, where it was used to check the sensationalism of Condillac, and in the United States of America, where it was taught in nearly every college, and was employed to defend the great truths of natural, and so to supply evidence in favor of revealed, religion.

Thomas Brown (1778-1820) rebelled against the authority of Reid and Stewart, who were charged by him with introducing too many first principles. He was influenced to some extent by Destutt de Tracy, and the ideologists of France. He allowed to Hume that the relation of cause and effect was merely that of invariable antecedence and consequence, but argued, in opposition to Hume, that the relation was discovered intuitively. He thus kept up his relationship to the genuine Scottish school, and defended the great truths of natural religion. In his lectures on the Philosophy of the Human Mind, published posthumously, he discoursed brilliantly on suggestion and on the emotions.

Thomas Chalmers was a devoted adherent of the philosophy of his country. He expounded with great eloquence the views of Butler as to the nature and supremacy of conscience. None of the Scottish metaphysicians opposed religion — Hume did not belong to the school; but Chalmers was the first who brought the philosophy of Scotland into harmony with the evangelical faith of the nation. He argued from the moral power in man, as Kant did, the existence of God and of man's responsibility and immortality, and, from the nature of the moral law, the corruption of man's nature and the need of an atonement.

Sir William Hamilton is, always with Reid, the most noted philosopher of the Scottish school. As Reid was distinguished for his observation and shrewd sense, Hamilton was for his erudition and his logical power. While he belongs to the Scottish school, he sought to combine with it some of the principles of the philosophy of Kant. In Note A, a dissertation appended to Reid's Collected Works, he shows that common sense, by which he means our primary beliefs, has been held by all the most profound thinkers of ancient and modern times. In his Logic he sought to restore the old system, but sought, after the manner of Kant, to improve it, especially by insisting on the universal quantification of the predicate. In his Metaphysics he has a good classification of the faculties of the mind. Some members of the school do not approve of his doctrine of the relativity of knowledge and the negative doctrines of causation and infinity expounded in his Discussions.

The Scottish school has several excellent qualities in its relation to religion. All its members seek to unfold with care the properties and laws of the mind, and thus furnish the best antidotes against materialism. They find in the mind itself grand laws or principles which guarantee truth, such as the necessary principle of cause and effect, implying the existence of God, and the moral power implying an indelible distinction between right and wrong. While thus furnishing an introduction to religion, and aiding it, it does not seek to absorb it, as do the idealism of Schelling and the dialectic of Hegel. The Scottish metaphysicians have always been somewhat suspicious of the higher speculations of certain German philosophers. Hamilton, in his Discussions, cuts down the idea of the absolute as defended by Schelling and Cousin, by showing that it involves contradictions. (For accounts and criticisms, see Dissertations on the Progress of Metaphysical and Ethical Philosophy by DUGALD STEWART, École Écossaise by COUSIN, and especially The Scottish Philosophy Biographical, Expository, Critical, from Hutcheson to Hamilton, by JAMES McCOSH.) SCOTUS ERIGENA, John. The date and place of his birth cannot be made out with certainty, but it is probable that he was born in Ireland between 800 and 815. He came to the court of Charles the Bald as a man of mature age; and he made there the acquaintance of Prudentius, who left the court in 847. He came from Ireland, in one of whose flourishing cloistral schools he had been educated; and his surname, Scotus or Scotigena, applied to him by his contemporaries, — Pope Nicholas I., in his letter to Charles the Bald; Prudentius, in his De Prædestinatione; the synod of Langres (859), etc., — yields no argument against his being a native of that country, as its original Latin name was Scotia Major. His other surname, first occurring in the oldest manuscripts of his translation of Dionysius Areopagita, points directly to Ireland in both of its derivations, — Ierugena, from the Greek ἱερωῖ ("born in the island of the saints"), and Erigena, from "Erin," the old native name of the country.

Similar uncertainty prevails with respect to the place, date, and circumstances of his death. Ingulf, in his Historia Abbatiae Croylandensis, Simeon of Durham, in his De Regibus Anglorum et Danorum, William of Malmesbury, and others, tell us that he was invited to England by Alfred the Great, probably shortly after the death of Charles the Bald, about 883; that he was appointed teacher at the school of Oxford, and afterwards abbot of Malmesbury; and that he finally, probably about 891, was killed by his own pupils, and in the church. Mabillon, in Act. Sanct. Ord. S. Bened., Natalis Alexander, in his Hist. Eccl. Sacc., ix., the Histoire Litt. de la France, v., and others, reject this report as fabulous; because it seems impossible to them that a man who had been condemned by a pope and a synod for holding heretical opinions should afterwards be made an abbot: but the argument is not of any great weight.

At the court of Charles the Bald he was received with great honor. He enjoyed the particular favor of the king, was made director of the palatial school, and became intimately acquainted with all the scholars of the court, — a Hincmar, a Lupus, an Usuard, a Ratramnus, and others. He appears to have held no ecclesiastical office in France; nor is it probable that he belonged to any of the monastic orders, though he may have received priestly ordination. In France he wrote most, perhaps all, of his works. The translation of Dionysius Areopagita, which became the bridge across which Neo-Platonism penetrated into Western Europe, he undertook on the express request of the king. It gave him a great fame for learning among people in general, but it also made him suspected in the eyes of the Pope. His principal work is his De Divisione Natura, a kind of natural philosophy or speculative theology, which, starting from the supposition of the unity of philosophy and theology, ends as a system of idealistic pantheism; philosophy having, in the course of the development, entirely absorbed theology.

It cannot be made out with certainty what part Erigena took in the controversy concerning the Lord's Supper which had broken out between Paschasius Radbertus, Rabanus Maurus, Ratramnus, and others, before his arrival in France. It is certain that the book De Eucharistia, which for a long time was ascribed to him, belongs to Ratramnus; but it is as certain that he stood entirely on the side of the latter. From some newly discovered fragments of his commentary on the Gospel of John, and from some notices in Hincmar's De Predestinatione (c. 31), it is evident that he considered the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper as mere symbols of the presence of Christ in the sacrament, — a view which is in perfect harmony with his whole system, in which the Lord's Supper is left almost unnoticed. The only thing doubtful is, whether he has written an independent treatise on the subject, or whether he has merely touched it incidentally in his other writings.

Clearer and more important is his participation in the controversy of Gottschalk concerning predestination. When Prudentius, Ratramnus, Servatus Lupus, Remigius, and others took the side of Gottschalk, at least partially, Hincmar summoned Erigena, the celebrated dialectician, to his aid; and Erigena obeyed the summons so much the more willingly, as it gave him an opportunity of developing one of the fundamental ideas of his system, — his idea of evil. In 851, or between the first and the second synod of Chiersy (849 and 853), he wrote his book De Predestinatione, in which he teaches that there is only one predestination, namely, that to eternal bliss. With respect to evil and its punishment, he says there is no predestination, even not a prescience: for evil is a nil, and has no real existence; it is only a lack, a fault in the realization of good. Of course Hincmar was rather frightened by an auxiliary of this character. Soon remonstrances and refutations began to pour in. Venilo, archbishop of Sens, wrote against Erigena; also Prudentius, Florus, and others. The second synod of Chiersy (853) partially indorsed the views of Erigena; but the synod of Valence (855) absolutely condemned them, and the condemnation was confirmed by the synod of Langres (859) and Pope Nicholas. It is not known, however, that the audacious philosopher was subjected to any direct persecution.

LIT. — The collected works of Erigena are found in Migne: Patrol. Lat., vol. 122. Monographs on his life and system have been written by PETER HJORT (Copenhagen, 1823), STAUDENMAIER (Frankf., 1834), TALLANDIER, Paris, 1843), N. MÖLLER (Mayence, 1844), CHRISTLIEB (Gotha, 1860; [R. SCOTUS, Marianus, b. in Ireland, 1028; d. in the monastery of St. Martin, Mayence, 1083. He left Ireland in 1052, studied in Cologne and Fulda, and was ordained a priest at Wurzburg in 1059, but was in the same year shut up in the monastery of Fulda to do penance for sins committed. In 1069 he was released, and removed to Mayence, but was again imprisoned for the same reason. He wrote a Chronicon in three books, — I. The World's History till the Birth of Christ; II. The History of Christ and the Apostles; III. The History of the Church till 1082. Edited by G. SCRIBES IN THE NEW TESTAMENT. The name "scribe," which already occurs in Jer. viii. 8, Ez. vii. 6, 11, is mentioned very often in the New Testament, either in a good, ideal sense (Matt. xiii. 52, xxiii. 34), or, what is more frequently the case, in a bad sense (Matt. ii. 4, v. 20, vii. 29, xii. 38, etc.), and designates those scribes who at the time of Christ, having themselves lost the true knowledge of the law and the prophets, became blind leaders of the people (Luke xi. 52; Matt. xv. 14). The scribes (sopherim, or sofferim) were originally merely writers or copyists of the law; but eventually they became the doctors of the law, and interpreters of the scriptures. According to the Talmud, these teachers were called "sofferim," because they counted every letter, and classified every precept of the law.

The period of the scribes begins with the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity. Though there were popular teachers of the law during the Babylonian captivity, as is evident from Ez. viii. 16, yet the altered state after the return required new enactments, and demanded that an authoritative body of teachers should so regulate the religious life as to adapt it to present circumstances. Hence Ezra, who re-organized the new state, also organized such a body of interpreters, of which he was the chief. It is for this reason, that besides the appellation "the priest," he is also called "the scribe" (Ez. vii. 6, 11, 12). The skilled in the law, both from among the tribe of Aaron and the laity, who with Ezra and after his death thus interpreted and fixed the law, were denominated "sopherim," or "scribes." In synagogues, which probably at this time were built here and there, they expounded the law, either on festival and sabbath days, or on Monday and Thursday, the market-days. The most famous teachers were not only members of the Sanhedrin, but formed also a kind of spiritual college, the so-called "Great Synagogue," the last member of which was Simeon the Just. It is characteristic of the scribes of the earlier period, that, with the exception of Ezra and Zadok (Neh. xiii. 13), and of Simeon, we have no record of their names; and Jost is probably correct in ascribing this silence to the fact that the one aim of these early scribes was to promote reverence for the law, to make it the groundwork of the people's life. They would write nothing of their own, lest less worthy words should be raised to a level with those of the oracles of God (Judenthum und s. Sekten, i. 42). They devoted themselves to the exposition and careful study of the law; and, when interpretation was needed, their teaching was orally only. As these decisions, or halachoth, could not be traced to any certain author, they were called the precepts of the scribes, also of the elders, or sages (παράδοσις τῶν πρεσβυτέρων, Matt. xii. 5, xv. 3 sq.; Mark vii. 2 sq.; also πατρικαὶ παραδόσεις, Gal. i. 11). The scribes of this period probably fixed the canon of the Old Testament and the textus receptus. Thus they became the bearers of the theocratic tradition, as were the prophets in the pre-exile period, but with this difference, that the former, perhaps with the exception of Ezra and those who were with him, represented the letter, which killeth; while the latter were organs of the spirit, which maketh alive. The recorded principle of the men of the Great Synagogue is given in the treatise Aboth, i. 1. "Be cautious in judging, train many disciples, and set a fence about the law." They wished to make the law of Moses the rule of life. But, as the infinite variety of life presents cases which the law has not contemplated, expansions of the old, and additions of new, decisions came in vogue, till finally the "words of the scribes" were honored above the law, and it was a greater crime to offend against them than against the law. Side by side with development of the halachoth, another development took place. The sacred books were not studied as a code of laws only. To search into their meaning had from the first belonged to the ideal office of the scribe. But here also the book suggested thoughts which could not logically be deduced from it; and, where the literal interpretation could not help, recourse was taken to an interpretation which was the reverse of the literal. The fruit of this effort to find what was not there appears in the Midrashim; and the process by which the meaning, moral or mystical, was elicited, was known as Hagalah, i.e., saying, opinion. Room being once left to speculation, mysticism and fanciful speculations, which culminated in the Cabala, developed themselves. Side by side with this esoteric, gnostic, dogmatic tendency of the Hagalah, we also find an ethical, popular one, as is best represented in Ecclesiasticus. The later scribes, better known as the Tanaim, or "teachers of the law," fixed and formularized the views and expositions of their predecessors, and as they accumulated they had to be compiled and classified. A new code grew out of them, a second corpus juris, the Mishna (δενέρεσις, Epiph., Hier. 13, 1; 15. 2). In this time, when the successive ascendancy of the Persians, Egyptians, Syrians, and Romans over Palestine, greatly influenced the habits and conduct of the Jewish people, different views, which finally branched out into different parties, were advanced as to how the law could and should be kept most carefully, and how every thing foreign which was in opposition to it could be eliminated. In the Books of the Maccabees frequent allusions are made to this tendency, which was especially represented in the Chasidim (Χασαΐται, 1 Macc. i., 62, ii. 29, 42, vii. 12 sq., 2 Macc. xiv. 6). To the Chasidim belonged two scribes, — Jose ben-Joeser of Zereda and Jose ben-Jochanan, — both disciples of Antigonus of Soho (about 190 B.C.), himself a disciple of Simeon the Just (Pirke Aboth, i. 1). These two are the first of the five pairs of teachers of the law, who, as propagators of the orthodox tradition, distinguished themselves in the last centuries before Christ. They were succeeded by the two contemporaries of John Hyrcanus, — Joshua ben-Porachja and Nithai of Arbela (between 140 and 110 B.C.), in whose doctrinal views the opposition to Sadduceeism first shows itself. To them succeeded, in the time of Alexander Jannæus and Alexander, Simon ben-Schetai, a hero of Pharisaism, who twice broke the influence of the Sadducees in the Sanhedrin, and Judah ben-Tabai. In the time of the last Maccabæans, and in the first years of the Idumæan rule, the two great doctors of the law were the two sons of proselytes, Shemaja (Sameas, Joseph., Ant., XIV. 9, 4) and Abtalion (Pollio, Joseph., Ant., XV. 1, 10, 4), the two magnates of their day. The last pair was presented by Hillel and Shammai.

The most famous scribes at the time of Christ and the apostles were, besides Nicodemus (John iii.), Simon, the son of Hillel; Gamaliel, the grandson of Hillel; Jochanan ben-Zaccai; and Jonathan, the son of Uzziel, the Chaldee paraphrast. From Mark iii. 22, vii. 1, John vii. 15, we learn that a celebrated high school of the scribes existed at Jerusalem in the time of Christ. The questions which often brought about a conflict between Christ and the scribes and Pharisees, such as concerning divorce, oath, the sabbath, etc., were the same which occupied the scribes, more especially the license to teach and the introduction of new academical degrees. The scribe, who already occupied a high position over and against the unlearned, and even the priests, now rose to greater prominence since the introduction of the ordination, or promotion as teacher of the law, and member of the court. The candidate, having passed through a certain curriculum in the school of famous teachers, was licensed and set apart by ordination; the presiding rabbi giving to him as the symbol of his work tablets on which he was to note down the sayings of the wise, and the "key of knowledge" (comp. Luke xi. 52), with which he was to open or to shut the treasures of divine wisdom. So admitted, he took his place as a chaber, or member of the fraternity. This state of things created not only a fondness for titles (Matt. xxiii. 7), but, above all, a spiritual hierarchy, to which the people had to succumb. The scribes gave the people a new spiritual country, a kingdom of heaven, which was not limited by space. But to give them a kingdom of heaven in which Moses and the prophets are fulfilled was beyond their powers; and, because they did not enter therein themselves, they prevented the people also from entering therein (Matt. xxiii. 13). The influence of the scribes was very far-reaching. They were found in the court-room, in the colleges, but more especially in the synagogues. In the latter places they occupied the uppermost seats (Matt. xxiii. 6), read and explained the law. They were also not wanting in the feasts (Ibid.): in short, they were everywhere; and it was a very easy thing to influence by their own opposition the people against Jesus. For a long time they tried in vain to get hold of him (Matt. ix. 3, xii. 38, xxii. 35; Luke v. 30, vi. 7, x. 25, xi. 54, xv. 2, xx. 19 sq.); but they accomplished at last his condemnation and crucifixion (Matt. xxvi. 57, xxvii. 41). The essence and character of rabbinism were such that it necessarily came in conflict with Jesus. The scribes could not bear to hear the truth out of his mouth, and thus was fulfilled what is written in Isa. xxix. 10-11. That there were also exceptional cases among the scribes, we see in "Zenas the lawyer" (Tit. iii. 13).

SCRIVER, Christian, an author of devotional works; was b. at Rendsburg, Holstein, Jan. 2, 1629; d. at Quedlinburg, April 5, 1693. In 1647 he entered the university of Rostock; in 1653 was made archdeacon of Stendal, and, fourteen years later, pastor of St. James's Church, Magdeburg. Here he continued to labor, in spite of calls to Berlin and to Stockholm, as court-preacher, until a short time before his death, when, at Spener's suggestion, he was appointed first court-preacher at Quedlinburg. Scriver is known as author of some useful works of devotion, as the Seelenschatz (1675), Gotthold's zufällige Andachten, [1671, Eng. trans., Gotthold's Emblems, by Menzies, Edinburgh, 1863], which consists of four hundred parables and meditations, and Siech u. Siegesbette, in which are recorded the experience of his own sick-bed and God's goodness. Pritius edited from his papers Wittventrost. SCUDDER, John, M.D., missionary of the Reformed Dutch Church in India; b. at Freehold, N.J., Sept. 13, 1793; d. at Wynberg, South Africa, Jan. 13, 1855. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey, 1811, and at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New-York City, 1815; and practised medicine until 1819, being meanwhile a most earnest and devoted Christian. In the latter year, while in professional attendance upon a lady, he took up in the anteroom a tract entitled The Conversion of the World, or the Claims of Six Hundred Millions, and the Ability and Duty of the Churches respecting Them. His thoughts were turned more strongly than ever upon his personal duty toward the heathen, and as the result of his deliberations he gave his life to missionary labor. After licensure by the classis of New York, he sailed, June 8, 1819; went first to Ceylon, where he arrived February, 1820; was ordained there May 15, 1821, by clergymen of the Congregational, Baptist, and Methodist denominations; established a hospital at Jaffnapatam; in 1822 was foremost in organizing a college there, and in 1824 was blessed by an extensive revival. In 1836 he and Miron Winslow were transferred to Madras, India, in order that there he might print Scriptures and tracts in Tamil. In the first year they printed six million pages. Dr. Scudder fixed his residence at Chintadrepettah, near Madras, and thus, under his surveillance, there grew up the Arcot mission, which was received under the care of the American Board in 1852, and of the Reformed Dutch Church the next year. From 1812 to 1846 Dr. Scudder was in America, busily engaged, however, in arousing interest in foreign missions. In 1849 he was in the Madura mission; but with this exception he gave his energies to the Arcot mission, and after the death of his wife and son Samuel (1849), wrought with redoubled zeal, as if called upon to make good their loss. Under this pressure his health gave way in 1851, and by medical advice he went to the Cape of Good Hope. Much benefited by the voyage, he was upon the point of returning to India when he was stricken down by apoplexy.

Dr. Scudder is one of the heroes of foreign missions. He was tall, strong, and well-proportioned; slender in youth, he became portly in later years; originally of sound health, he ruined it by unsparing labor. He was a vigorous thinker, decided in his views, though without bigotry. Endowed with great perseverance, he carried through his project at whatever cost. Convinced that he was doing Christ's work, he cared nothing for the opposition of men. He endured hardness, and even severe pain, without complaint. His piety was carefully cultivated. Every Friday till noon he spent in fasting and prayer. The Bible constituted well-nigh his sole reading. He went about doing good to body and soul, like his Master. He preached in almost every large town in south-eastern Hindostan. It was his ambition "to be one of the inner circle around Jesus in heaven."

SCULPTURE, Christian. A marked decline in art, both technically and with respect to its subject-matter, made itself manifest in the ancient world long before the conquest of Corinth by Mummius (B.C. 146). The subjugation of Greece by Alexander the Great signalized the first prostitution of art from the noble ends of patriotism and religious faith to those of ostentation and personal egotism. The degrading of its inspirations seems to have gone hand in hand with its technical decline; and when Greece, which in the Periclean age was the mistress of the world in art and all other cultures, came under the Roman yoke, the spirit of creative genius had perished, and the great masterpieces, which in their extant relics have taught the world through all subsequent centuries, became almost forgotten monuments of the past.

In considering, then, the almost puerile achievements of art in the departments both of sculpture and painting in the early Christian age, its long antecedent decline must not be left out of the account. Irrespective of other causes, presently to be specified, Christian art in Rome, where it had its cradle-life (we can scarcely say its birth-place), lacked both masters and models fitted to cultivate it on a high plane.

Two other causes combined to render the Christian Church in the primitive age, not only indifferent, but absolutely antagonistic, to art-culture.

The first of these, and the most important, was the prostitution of the art of ancient Paganism to idolatry. The Mosaic institutes and traditions, however modified by the early church with respect to many of the elements of a cumbersome ceremonialism, were literally interpreted in their relation to art, especially, it may be added, with respect to sculpture. Graven images contemplating religious ends had ever been the abhorrence of the Jewish, and were scarcely less so of the earliest Christian Church. The substitution, then, of materialism for the spiritual worship of the one invisible God was the one thing which primitive Christianity dreaded; and any compromise with this was regarded with jealousy, and any concession to its demands excited the bitterest intolerance.

We have only to consider, in the second place, the prostitution of contemporary Roman art to the lowest passions of human nature—a fact evidencing itself with the most loathsome details in the relics both of painting and sculpture in Herculaneum and Pompeii—in order to find another powerful influence in the same direction. It is not surprising, that in the welfare of the soul for the subjugation of the body, with its lusts and appetites—the primal end of life according to the teachings of Christ—the early disciples could find little or nothing in contemporary Pagan art which they could contemplate with complacency; and it seems, in the circumstances, only strange, that, at so early a period in the history of the Christian Church, art in any form could have come to be regarded as a possible auxiliary to a pure spiritual faith and worship. Tertullian (d. A.D. 220) went so far as to declare the fine arts, more especially sculpture, to be the invention of the Devil. While this extreme judgment cannot be regarded as literally expressing the universal sentiment of the early church, it nevertheless represented a very prevalent antipathy.

The earliest decided concession is found in the memorials of the dead, sarcophagi, and sepulchral slabs and monuments, on which were carved in relief the simple emblems of Christian faith and the scenes of biblical history, many of which were intentionally employed as symbols of Christian doctrine, especially that of the resurrection of the body.

Of single extant statues representing sacred personages, Dr. Ulrici specifies but four important ones in the whole range of early Christian art down to the tenth century. These are the statue of Bishop Hippolytus, who suffered martyrdom in the first half of the third century, the entire upper portion of which is a modern restoration; the famous bronze image of St. Peter, in the great Roman basilica named after him, a work probably executed in Constantinople in the fifth century; and two marble statues representing Christ as the Good Shepherd, whose date he places in the fifth or sixth century. A certain school of modern German criticism has sought to prove that the form of these latter was borrowed from the Mercury Criophoros (or ram-bearer), well known in the sculpture of ancient Greece. But a careful comparison of the Pagan and the Christian conception scarcely justifies this conclusion. To mention no other considerations, it is to be remarked that the Pagan statue, so far as we are acquainted with it, was always undraped, a characteristic quite unknown in any extant Christian sculpture representing the Pastor Bonus. If some suggestion as regards form might have been derived from Pagan statues with which the early Christians were familiar, there can be no doubt that the statues of the Good Shepherd, a large number of which doubtless existed in the primitive church, were original and deliberate endeavors to give a visible paraphrase of the Twenty-third Psalm, the parable of the lost sheep, and the tenth chapter of John's Gospel.

Of the sepulchral reliefs of early Christian art which have been conserved to the present time, the most important is the famous sarcophagus of Junius Bassus (prefect of Rome, d. A.D. 359), now in the crypt of St. Peter's Church in Rome. It was probably executed in the fourth century, and contains five subjects from the Old and New Testaments. Other examples of kindred character are found in the Christian Museum of the Vatican, in the Campo Santo at Pisa, and in the crypt of the Cathedral of Ancona. Many ancient altar-tablets are found in the churches of Italy, especially at Ravenna (Cathedral, S. Apollinari in Classe, S. Vitale, S. Francesco, etc.).

A remarkable sarcophagus, though of much ruder workmanship than that of Junius Bassus, is in the Church of St. Ambrose in Milan; its principal relief representing Christ teaching, surrounded by his disciples.

In the representation of the scenes of biblical history by means of sepulchral reliefs, the Roman Catacombs furnished the most numerous examples. Most of these have been removed to the Lateran Museum. Both the Old and the New Testaments contributed the materials for these subterranean galleries of early Christian art; and many of the sculptures, for example, those having for their subjects the histories of Noah and Jonah, are so puerile as artistic performances to border on the grotesque.

All, however, have a high and noble moral significance, and were doubtless intended to symbolize great cardinal doctrines of evangelical faith.

Only second to these in importance are the sepulchral reliefs found in the Catacombs of Naples and Syracuse.

The sculptural ornamentation of ecclesiastical furniture, sacramental shrines, crucifixes, episcopal chairs (a fine example is the chair of Archbishop Maximilian in the cathedral at Ravenna), goblets, diptychs, and ivory carvings for movable altars, and the covers of prayer-books and the Sacred Scriptures, constitutes an extensive though subordinate feature in the later art of this first period of Christian sculpture, which we may extend in general limitation over ten centuries.

Some of the most precious of these treasures, containing in the aggregate great wealth in the precious metals, fell a prey to the barbarian invasions of Italy, and are lost beyond recovery. Prominent examples of this vandalism, which robbed the world of some of the most costly relics of early Christian sculpture, were the plundering of the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul in Rome by the Saracens (A.D. 846) and of the churches of Constantinople in the conquest of that city by the Latins (A.D. 1204).

What is called the Romanesque period of Christian sculpture may be said to begin with the eleventh century; and we remark in this period the most striking contrast between its magnificent architectural creations and its limited fruitage in the departments both of sculpture and painting. The beginning of this period produced neither masters nor masterpieces of great importance. In subordinate departments of sculpture we may cite the famous reliefs in Hildesheim,—the bronze door of its cathedral with its sixteen reliefs, and the pillars standing before them, containing scenes from the life of Christ. These works, and others of kindred character (e.g., the magnificent bronze candlesticks in the Magdalene Church at Hildesheim), are ascribed conjecturally to Bishop Bernward (d. 1023).

The magnificent portal of the cathedral at Freiburg in Saxony ("the golden door," so called), with its fine reliefs, taken from a former edifice on the same site, is one of the most important works of this early period. Of similar works in France, the sculptured portals of the cathedrals of Arles, Bourges, and Chartres, must be mentioned.

Italy, however, gave to the church in the thirteenth century a great sculptor, who in technical excellence caught something of the lost spirit of the antique. This was Nicola Pisano, who between 1260 and 1278 executed a series of works which may justly be regarded as foretokenings of the Renaissance age. Foremost of these are the famous reliefs on the pulpit of the baptistery at Pisa, representing the Birth of Christ, the Adoration of the Three Kings, the Presentation in the Temple, the Crucifixion, and the Last Judgment.

A modern German critic naively, but with some justice, observes that the figure of the Virgin in the Nativity reminds one of the Sleeping Ariadne in ancient Roman sculpture.

It need scarcely be said, that in the Gothic period, next following the Romanesque, architecture was the one interest in art which overshadowed all others, and that almost all the sculpture of this age was simply an accessory of architecture. In Northern Europe the earnest spirit of the Romanesque period still prevailed, though the names of no great masters have come down to us through their works.

The noble reliefs in the Strassburg Cathedral, representing the death and coronation of the Virgin, with the allegorical figures of the Christian Church, are worthy of especial mention as being ascribed to Sabina von Steinbach, the reputed daughter of the architect of this magnificent Gothic temple. In Italy the spirit of Nicola Pisano, the great master of the Romanesque age, was conserved in his son Giovanni (circa 1210-1321) and his pupil Andrea Pisano (1273-1349).

The names of Giotto and Orcagna, among the sculptors of this period, must not be omitted, albeit painting was the art in which both excelled, and in connection with which their fame has been perpetuated. The high-altar at Arezzo, and the façade of the cathedral at Orvieto, may be cited as the chief works of Giovanni Pisano. On the southern door of the baptistery at Florence there is a series of panels representing the life of John the Baptist, which show Andrea Pisano to have been a worthy scholar of the great Nicola. The figure of Apelles, on the bell-tower of the Florence Cathedral, is a curiosity, from the fact of its having originated with Giotto, the father of painting in the Gothic age.

It is customary with historians to divide the golden age of art, which in general terms may be said to include the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, into the Early and the High Renaissance. For the purposes of the present article, however, we may include both of these—the quattrocento and the cinquecento—in the third great period of Christian sculpture. As applied both to literature and art, the term "renaissance" signifies the revival of the antique; and Italy was the grand theatre of its development. At the beginning of the fifteenth century but few of the sculptures of antiquity had been unearthed in Rome: but the good work, which was carried to full activity under Julius the Second and Leo the Tenth, and which has exercised such a mighty moulding influence on all subsequent art, even down to the present day, had already commenced; and there is manifest, even in the early masters of this wonderful age, a loyalty to nature and truth, as distinguished from tradition and conventionalism, which sets them utterly apart from the sculptors of the middle ages.

The great master of what may be called the Early Renaissance was Lorenzo Ghiberti of Florence (1378-1455), who between the years 1403 and 1427 was employed on the north bronze doors of the Florence Baptistery, whose reliefs plainly evidence some of the mediæval spirit yet lingering in art. The eastern doors of the same edifice, which he completed in 1552, whose panels contain representations of biblical history, form one of the greatest masterpieces of sculpture which any age has produced. It has been, perhaps, justly criticised as intruding too much upon the province of painting in attempting perspective effects.

Other eminent masters in this period were Donatello of Florence (1386-1466), his pupil, Andrea Verocchio (1432-88), and Luca della Robbia (1400-82), whose terra-cotta reliefs, representing biblical scenes chiefly, are found in the museums and in several of the churches of Florence. Luca della Robbia wrought likewise in marble and bronze; and his famous marble frieze, representing singing and dancing children, originally executed for the organ-gallery of the Florence Cathedral, and now preserved in the Uffizi Collection, is pronounced by Bueckhardt to be one of the finest works of sculpture produced in the fifteenth century.

Among the sculptors of Italy in the beginning of the sixteenth century, the names of Sansovino (Baptism of Christ, in the Florence Baptistery), Lombardi, and Leonardo da Vinci, deserve mention, albeit no work of sculpture by the latter has been preserved.

It need scarcely be said that the one name which glorifies the history of Christian sculpture in the sixteenth century is Michel Angelo Buonarrotti, who was born on the 6th of March, 1475, in the vicinity of Arezzo, and died in Rome on the 17th of February, 1564. His earliest important sculptural work was the well-known Pieta, now in St. Peter's Church in Rome, which he executed at the age of twenty-five. Then followed the colossal statue of David, and lastly the statues which were designed for the magnificent mausoleum of Pope Julius the Second, a project of vast dimensions, which occupied the great master during a period of forty years, with occasional interruptions, but which was never fully carried out.

Besides the two figures of the Captives, now in the museum of the Louvre in Paris, the colossal Moses, in the Church of S. Pietro in Vincoli in Rome, is the one great feature of this famous sepulchre, and is, without doubt, the grandest creation of modern sculpture. The Medici monuments in Florence are among the noblest works of memorial sculpture in the world. His statue of Christ, in the Church of S. Maria sopra Minerva, executed about 1527, is perhaps the least successful of all the sculptural works of this Titan of art. The sculptors contemporary with Michel Angelo, of whom Giovanni da Bologna (1524-1608) and Benvenuto Cellini (1500-70) were the most eminent, occupied themselves more with mythological than with Christian themes. Christian sculpture in Germany during the sixteenth century bears worthy comparison with that of Italy, chiefly through the name and works of Peter Vischer (d. 1529). The great work which has immortalized him is the noble group of bronze statues and reliefs on the monument of St. Sebald in Nuremberg.

Adam Krafft, famous for his reliefs in Nuremberg, representing the sufferings of Christ, and Veit Stoss, the father of wood-carving in the Renaissance age, deserve mention as German masters of only secondary rank.

Various names have been employed to designate that widespread degradation of sculpture in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, from truth to mannerism and ostentation, of which Lorenzo Bernini (1598-1680) was the pioneer and the foremost representative. It is not necessary to specify these names in technical language. Let it suffice to observe, that the same thing which we often witness in the history of literature and oratory, when a numerous horde of feeble aspirants set themselves to the task of imitating a great writer or speaker with extravagant expletives, startling metaphors, and wild gesticulation, came to pass in the domain of art, particularly of sculpture, through the influence of Michel Angelo, when a whole generation of copyists, with large conceit and small faculty, ordained themselves apostles of a new age of pomp and sensationalism. Chiefly through this, among other causes, we look almost in vain, either in the seventeenth or the eighteenth century, for any really great work of Christian sculpture.

The nineteenth century has witnessed, both in Italy and Northern Europe, a revival of Christian sculpture with somewhat of the spirit of its golden age; and the names of Antonio Canova (1779-1822), Bertel Thorwaldsen (1770-1844), and Christian Rauch (1777-1857), representing both extremes of the European Continent, are the glory of modern sculpture, both secular and Christian. With this illustrious trio the name of Ernst Rietchel, the designer of the great Luther Monument at Worms, deserves to be associated, as well as that of his most gifted pupil, Professor Adolf Donndorf of Stuttgart, still living, who, after the death of his master, completed some of the most important figures of the Luther memorial; e.g., Savonarola, Peter Waldo, and the Mourning Magdeburg. Professor Donndorf has executed some of the finest sepulchral memorials in Germany, and has likewise won an enviable fame in America by the beautiful bronze drinking-fountain in Union Square, New York, which he finished about two years since, to the order of Mr. D. Willis James, who presented it to the city of his adoption.

SCULTETUS, Abraham, b. at Grüneberg, Silesia, Aug. 24, 1566; d. at Emden, Oct. 24, 1624. He studied at Görlitz, Wittenberg, and Heidelberg, and was appointed court-preacher in Heidelberg in 1598, and professor of theology in 1618. Entangled in the misfortunes of the Elector Friedrich V., he lost his position after the battle on the White Mountain, 1620, but was appointed preacher at Emden in 1622. He was one of the most distinguished theologians of his time in the Reformed Church. His principal works are, Medulla theologie patrum, 1605-13, 4 vols.; a history of the Reformation, of which, however, only the two first decades (1516-36) appeared, Heidelberg, 1618-20; and De curriculo vite, etc., a kind of self-defence, published after his death, Emden, 1625. SEABURY, Samuel, b. in Groton, Conn., Nov. 30, 1729; d. at New London, Feb. 25, 1796. He was a graduate of Yale College before he was nineteen years of age, and soon after began the study of medicine. In 1752, though he had already devoted himself to the clerical calling, he went to Edinburgh to complete his medical studies, and there became acquainted with a remnant of the ancient Church of Scotland, which, though interdicted by the law, continued to maintain its worship in garrets and out-of-the-way nooks and corners. He was ordained deacon by Bishop

Thomas of Lincoln, ministering on behalf of the aged Sherlock of London, to whose jurisdiction the colonial missions pertained; and two days afterwards the Bishop of Carlisle (Osbaldiston) advanced him to the priesthood (Dec. 23, 1753). He was appointed missionary to New Brunswick, N.J., and arrived there May 25, 1754. In 1757 he removed to Jamaica, L.I., influenced partly by a desire to be near his father, who was rector of St. George's, at Hempstead. But shortly after this, his father dying, he became rector of St. Peter's, Westchester. And now, the spirit of the Colonies being roused by the policy of the king's ministers and the provincial governors, the clergy of the Anglican Church were placed in a very trying situation. Seabury and most of his brethren were missionaries deriving their support from England. They had also, at their ordinations and inductions repeatedly taken the oath of allegiance to the sovereign personally; and how could these obligations be slighted without perjury? There was room for honest difference of opinion, in view of the constitutional revolution of 1688 and the conditional character which was thereby imparted to this oath, in the judgment of many jurists and learned men. But Seabury's habits of thought inclined him to a different opinion; and the rebellions of 1715 and 1745 were yet fresh in the memory of all, as a practical warning. He ardently resisted, therefore, what he considered a rebellion against lawful authority; and he was not the man to adopt such views of the case with passive principle only. He sustained what he supposed to be truth and right very vigorously by word and deed; and The Letters of a Westchester Farmer, which called forth the efforts of Hamilton for their refutation, are commonly ascribed to him. In consequence, he was seized by a company of armed men, on the 22d of November, at his home in Westchester, and with violence and insult was taken into Connecticut, where he remained a prisoner till after Christmas. It was impossible for him, however, to continue his ministrations in Westchester; and he soon made his escape to Long Island. His church was desecrated, and his parishioners reduced to great privations. It is needless to say that Seabury maintained his loyalty to the close of the struggle, and continued his sacred ministrations as well as he could, though forced to maintain himself, in large measure, by his skill as a physician. The acknowledgment of the Colonies as independent States by the king himself absolved him from his oath, and he now entered upon a new and more happy period of his life and labors. He was elected by the clergy of Connecticut to be their bishop, on the 25th of March, 1783, in anticipation of the actual peace, and sailed for England soon after the preliminaries had been signed, arriving in London on the 7th of July. The appeal of his diocese to the Archbishop of Canterbury, which had been made for his ordination to the episcopate, was unsuccessful, however, because somewhat premature in its political bearings; one of the difficulties being a natural fear on the part of the government that such a measure might be regarded as an interference with States now independent of the British crown. The archbishop could not proceed to the consecration without an act dispensing with the oath of allegiance; and this gave a civil aspect to the matter, with which the ministry was not prepared to be concerned. In this dilemma, recourse was had to the bishops in Scotland not yet relieved of their restraints by the death of the Pretender, but tolerated in view of that approaching event and in consideration of their long and patient sufferings. It was on Sunday, the 14th of November, 1784, in the chapel of Bishop Skinner's residence in Aberdeen, that Seabury received the episcopate at the hands of three "nonjuring" prelates, and became the first bishop of the American succession. He always regarded it as an advantage that he was thus consecrated in a primitive and "purely ecclesiastical" manner, as he expressed it, because it assured his countrymen that his future labors had no dependence upon the crown of England, and that he held his order and office without any favor of Prince or Parliament. Before leaving Scotland he signed a Concordat with the Scottish bishops, by which he agreed to promote, so far as in him lay, those restorations of the (Eucharistic) Liturgy, which have accordingly become the characteristic feature of the American Prayer-Book as compared with that of the Church of England.

It has been necessary to give with some detail so much of Seabury's history as is essential to an explanation of his position and influence in the organization of the Protestant-Episcopal Church; but, referring our readers to the lately published memoir (by Dr. Beardsley, 1881) for a full account of his life and labors, it is sufficient to add a brief outline of his episcopate. After a voyage of three months he reached his diocese June 27, 1785, and on the 2d of August following, at Middletown, was received by his clergy with due solemnity. He held his first ordination on the following day. The subsequent consecration of three bishops in England, and the formation of a constitution for the church thus rendered independent and autonomous, occasioned much negotiation and correspondence, before the diocese of Connecticut became duly incorporated under this constitution, with the dioceses south of New England; and in all these agitating preliminaries the learning, piety, and moderation of Seabury, impressed a deep respect for his character upon all his brethren, with the exception of a few whose political prejudices had survived the conflicts of the war. The Johannan qualities of Bishop White were precisely such as were requisite as a complement to the Petrine spirit of Seabury, and to their sincere mutual regard and wise co-operation was largely due the good understanding that soon followed. The episcopate of Bishop Seabury was cordially recognized, and he united with his three brother-bishops of the Anglican line in consecrating the first bishop of Maryland (Dr. Claggett); and consequently no bishop has ever been consecrated in this church without deriving his commission in part through the Scottish line of ecclesiastical ancestry. The bishop's life and labors in Connecticut have left a deep mark on the religious history of the State, and not less deeply has his influence been felt in the entire communion in which he was so conspicuous as an organizer and doctor. Two volumes of his sermons have been collected and published, and others have appeared in a fragmentary shape; but valuable manuscripts remain as yet unedited. They evince a vigorous mind, and intrepid devotion to the doctrinal standards of ancient catholicity.

The writer of this brief notice was active in promoting the final deposit of Bishop Seabury's remains, in 1849, under the new and substantial church in New London, where they now rest; and on that occasion he had the solemn office, in connection with Bishop Williams, now the successor of Seabury, of laying his venerable relics in the place of their ultimate repose. A physician who attended to identify these relics when disinterred remarked on the massive proportions of the skull; and the well-worn mitre preserved in Trinity College, Hartford, corresponds with these proportions so remarkably as to furnish in itself a striking evidence of the fidelity of the half-length portrait of the bishop, from the pencil of Duché, which adorns the library of that college, and from which many popular engravings have been derived.

SEAGRAVE, Robert, an earnest evangelical minister and co-worker with Whitefield; was b. Nov. 22, 1693, at Twyford in Leicestershire, and educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge. Having vainly endeavored to bring the Church of England to his position, he left her, or at least worked outside her pale. Besides sundry sermons and pamphlets, he published in 1742 fifty hymns, which were reprinted by D. Sedgwick, 1860. The best of them is, "Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wings." He was living as late as 1759.

SEAMAN, Lazarus, D.D., a learned English divine; b. at Leicester; d. in 1675. He was educated at Emanuel College, Cambridge. In the civil war he took the Parliamentary side, and in reward of his services was appointed master of Peter House, Cambridge, a member of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, and rector of Allhallows, London, from which living he was ejected in 1662. He was noted for his knowledge of church polity and controversial divinity. Besides sermons, he published A vindication of the judgment of the Reformed Churches and Protestant divines from misrepresentation concerning ordination and laying on of hands, London, 1637. His was the first, or one of the first, libraries disposed of in England by auction (1676), and brought seven hundred pounds. SEAMEN, Missions to. Rev. John Flavel (England, 1627-91) and English contemporaries (Ryther, Jaueway, et al.), as also a few clergymen of the established and dissenting churches in England in the eighteenth century, preached occasional sermons, special and serial, some of which were printed, on behalf of seamen; but the second half of the eighteenth century witnessed the first united efforts for their evangelization. An association, styled at first The Bible Society, was organized in London in 1780, to supply English troops in Hyde Park with the Holy Scriptures, whose field of labor was speedily enlarged to embrace seamen in the British navy. The first ship furnished with Bibles by this society was "The Royal George," sunk off Spithead, Eng.,

Aug. 29, 1782. The society's name was soon changed, becoming The Naval and Military Bible Society. It is still in operation, confines itself to its original specific object, the diffusion of the word of God, and has been of immense service to the army and navy of Great Britain. This society had its influence in originating the British and Foreign Bible Society, and the work of the latter led eventually to the formation of the American Bible Society. (Cf. art. "Bible Societies," Encyc. Brit., 9th ed. vol. iii. p. 649.)

The need for Christian exertion among sailors was urgent. Destitute, as a class, of any access to the Bible, to preaching, or to any service, instruction, or consolations of the church, their lives passed, for the most part, without access to the gospel of Christ. "It would be difficult," says a well-informed writer, "to conceive of a deeper moral night than that which for centuries had settled upon the sea."

Early efforts made in England to furnish sailors with the gospel, however, met with serious opposition from Christian people, as well as from unchristian officers in the royal navy. So late as 1828 the king was petitioned to abrogate an order, then recently issued by the lord high admiral, prohibiting the free circulation of tracts in the navy. But in 1814 the pioneers of the movement for this end, Rev. GEORGE CHARLES SMITH, a dissenting clergyman, once a sailor, and ZEBULON ROGERS, a shoemaker of the Methodist persuasion, established prayer-meetings for seamen, on the Thames, at London; the first being held on the brig "Friendship," June 22 of that year, by Mr. Rogers. These were multiplied and sustained upon the shipping in the river. March 23, 1817, the first bethel flag was unfurled on the "Zephyr," Capt. Hindulph of South Shields, Eng.

The Port of London Society was organized March 18, 1818, to provide for the continuous preaching of the gospel to seamen in London, upon a floating chapel (ship) of three hundred tons' burden, and Rev. Mr. Smith ministered upon it with success during the ensuing year. Nov. 12, 1819, The Bethel Union Society was formed at London, which, in addition to the maintenance of religious meetings on the Thames, established correspondence with local societies that had been started by Mr. Smith's exertions in various parts of the kingdom. These two societies were subsequently united to form what is now known as The British and Foreign Sailors' Society.

The Sailor's Magazine (London) merged, after publication for seven years by Rev. Mr. Smith, into the New Sailor's Magazine, also issued by him, was established in 1820. The monthly magazine now issued by The British and Foreign Sailors' Society is Chart and Compass (pp. 32), established in January, 1879. It has presented the facts, and discussed questions connected with the evangelization of seamen, with fervency and force. Up to April, 1883, Chart and Compass had circulated 128,000 copies.

In 1825 The London Mariner's Church and Rivermen's Bethel Union was organized to provide a church for seamen on shore, Rev. Mr. Smith becoming pastor. This church was for years the centre of an extensive system of labor, including a sabbath school, bethel prayer-meetings, tract and book distribution, magazine publishing, and open-air preaching to seamen on the wharves. Rev. Mr. Smith died at Penzance, Cornwall, Eng., in January, 1863.

Existing seamen's missionary societies in the empire of Great Britain, distinct from local organizations which limit the prosecution of work to their own ports, are, (1) The British and Foreign Sailors' Society (at Sailor's Institute, Shadwell, London, E., with receipts from April 1, 1881, to April 1, 1882, of £10,123 18s. 8d., and expenditures for the same period of £9,510 3s. 7d.), which in its sixty-fifth annual report (1882-83) names the ports of Rotterdam, Hamburg, Antwerp, Genoa, Naples, and Malta, outside England, and London, Milford-Haven, Falmouth, and Barrow-in-Furness (English), as occupied more or less effectively by persons having entire or partial support from its treasury, and devoting themselves to the spiritual and temporal welfare of seamen. (2) The London Missions to Seamen (Established English Church), whose operations are, for the most part, carried on afloat. Its chaplains are at twenty English and three foreign, its Scripture-readers at twenty-nine English and four foreign seaports. Local English societies for seamen are at Liverpool (formed in 1821), Glasgow, and other ports.

Evangelical Lutheran missions to seamen are prosecuted with vigor by societies with headquarters in the Scandinavian countries, whence come, in our day, the larger number of sailors for the world's mercantile marine. The Norwegian society — Foreningen til Evangeliets Forkyndelse for Skandinaviske Sømand i fremmede Harne, or, in English, The Society for the Gospel's Preaching to Scandinavian Seamen in Foreign Harbors — was organized at Bergen, Norway, Aug. 31, 1864, and now (1883) has stations at Leith, Scotland; North Shields, London, Cardiff, Eng.; at Antwerp, Belgium; Havre, France; Amsterdam, Holland; New York, U.S.A.; Quebec, Can.; and at Pensacola, Fla., U.S.A.

Mission-work for seamen is also carried on by this society at Montrose, Scotland. Its aggregate working force consists of eleven ordained pastors, with five or six assistant missionaries, unordained. The society owns churches at all its stations, and publishes a monthly paper, Bud og Hilsen, now in its eighteenth year of issue. Receipts in 1881-82 were 103,555 kroner;<sup>1</sup> expenditures, 58,297 kroner. The Danish seamen's mission society — Dansk Forening til Evangeliets Forkyndelse for Skandinaviske Søfolk i fremmede Harne, or, in English, The Danish Society for the Gospel's Preaching to Scandinavian Seamen in Foreign Ports — has its stations at Hull and Grimsby, London, Newcastle, and Hartlepool (Eng.), and at New-York City, U.S.A., with an aggregate of four ordained pastors. Three other ordained pastors perform some labor for sailors at Frederickstadt and Christianstadt (St. Croix, W.I.), and at St. Thomas and St. Jan, W.I. The same society supports a seamen's pastor at Madras, India; and at Brisbane, Australia, an ordained pastor gives a portion of his time to the interests of Scandinavian sailors. Its bi-monthly paper is Harnen, published at Copenhagen, Denmark. Receipts in 1882, 22,034 kroner; expenditures, 10,421 kroner.

The Swedish society for home and foreign missions — Försterlandsstiftelse — has sustained missionary work for seamen since 1869, and has the following stations where such labor is performed by its agents, — Constantinople, Turkey; Alexandria, Egypt; Liverpool, Grimsby, and Gloucester, Eng.; Boston, Mass., U.S.A.; Marseilles, France; St. Ubes, Portugal, — with five ordained pastors. The State Church in Sweden has three ordained pastors laboring for seamen, at London and Hartlepool (Eng.), and at Kiel in Prussia. The Finland seamen's mission society, Foreningen för Beredande af Sjövärdar af Finska Sjöman i Utländska Hamnar, organized in 1880, has a station at London, Eng., with one ordained pastor in charge, and is about to establish another at Grimsby and Hull, Eng. The Swedish Evangelical Lutheran Augustana Synod in America has a station for Scandinavian seamen, with one ordained pastor, at Philadelphia, Penn., U.S.A. The synod for the Norwegian Evangelical Lutheran Church in America has a mission in Australia, with one ordained pastor. The total of stations occupied by the Scandinavian (Lutheran) societies is thirty-three, with twenty-nine ordained pastors and six unordained pastors as laborers.

No organizations exist in North or South America, outside the United States, for the sole purpose of prosecuting religious labor among seamen. At Boston, Mass., the first society for this object was formed in May, 1812, but soon suspended operations. The first religious meeting on behalf of sailors in New-York City (N.Y.) is believed to have been held in the summer of 1816, at the corner of Front Street and Old Slip. The Marine Bible Society of New-York City was organized March 14, 1817, to furnish sailors with the Holy Scriptures. The Society for promoting the Gospel among Seamen in the Port of New-York, commonly known as The New-York Port Society, a local organization, was formed June 5, 1818. This society laid the foundations of the first mariner's church ever erected, in Roosevelt Street, near the East River, which was dedicated June 4, 1820, Rev. WARD STAFFORD preacher and pastor. In 1823 The New-York Port Society set at work in that city the first missionary to seamen, Rev. HENRY CHASE. This society now sustains a church at Madison and Catharine Streets in New York, and a reading-room for sailors in the same edifice, employing in the year ending Dec. 31, 1882, nine missionaries. Receipts for 1882 were $11,667.04; expenditures, $10,682.07. The New-York Bethel Union, for the establishment and maintenance of religious meetings on vessels in the port (organized June 3, 1821), had but a brief existence.

The movements noted — that at Boston, Mass., issuing in the formation of the earliest society of its kind in the world — led to similar action for the performance of local work for seamen at Charleston, S.C. (1819), Philadelphia, Penn. (1819), Portland, Me., and New Orleans, La. (1823), at New Bedford, Mass. (1825), and elsewhere. In the latter year there were in the United States seventy Bethel unions, thirty-three marine Bible societies, fifteen churches and floating chapels for seamen. There had been many conversions to Christ among sailors, and their evangelization was recognized as among the most prominent and important of Christian enterprises.

Accordingly, after its formal establishment in the city of New York (Jan. 11, 1826), succeeded by a new organization in its board of trustees (May 5, 1828, from which time its birth is dated), The American Seamen's Friend Society (80 Wall Street, New York, N.Y.), unquestionably the most widely operative and efficient of existing missionary societies for seamen, came into being. Its first President was Hon. SMITH THOMPSON, then secretary of the United-States navy; Rev. C. P. McILVAINE, afterwards Protestant-Episcopal bishop of Ohio, was its Corresponding Secretary; and Rev. JOSHUA LEAVITT its General Agent. Article II. of its constitution provides:—

"The object of this society shall be to improve the social and moral condition of seamen by uniting the efforts of the wise and good in their behalf, by promoting in every port boarding-houses of good character, savings-banks, register-offices, libraries, museums, reading-rooms, and schools, and also the ministration of the gospel, and other religious blessings."

Its first foreign chaplain was Rev. DAVID ABEL, who reached his field of labor at Whampoa, the anchorage for ships trading at Canton, China, Feb. 16, 1830. In its fortieth year (1867-68) its laborers (chaplains and sailor missionaries) were stationed at twenty foreign, and thirteen domestic, seaports, as follows: at Caribou Island on the Labrador coast, N.A.; at St. John, N.B.; in Norway, at Christiansand, Kragero, and Porsgrund; in Denmark, at Copenhagen and Odense; in Sweden, at Gottenberg, Warberg and Wedige, Wernersberg, and Stockholm; in Belgium, at Antwerp; in France, at Havre and Marseilles; in the Hawaiian Islands, at Honolulu and Hilo; at the Chincha Islands in Peru, at Valparaiso and at Buenos Ayres, S.A.; and in the United States, at the following seaports: San Francisco, Cal., Norfolk and Richmond, Va., Charleston, S.C., Mobile, Ala., Boston and Gloucester, Mass., and at New York, N.Y. Its missionary work was prosecuted in 1882-83 on the Labrador coast of North America, in the countries of Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, at Hamburg in Germany, at Antwerp in Belgium, in France at Marseilles and Havre, at Genoa and Naples in Italy, at Yokohama in Japan, in the Sandwich and Madeira Islands, at Valparaiso, S.A., and, in the United States, at Portland, Ore., and on the waters of Puget Sound; also in the ports of Galveston, Tex., New Orleans, La., Pensacola, Fla., Savannah, Ga., Charleston, S.C., Wilmington, N.C., Norfolk, Va., and at Boston, Mass., as well as in the cities and vicinities of New York, Jersey City (N.J.), and Brooklyn (N.Y.), including the United-States Navy-Yard, numbering forty-two laborers at thirty-one seaports (eighteen foreign and thirteen domestic) supported in whole or in part by the society.

Its receipts in the first decade of its existence were, in round numbers, $91,000; in the second decade, $165,000; in the third, $229,000; in the fourth, $375,000; in the fifth, $655,000. Receipts for the year ending March 31, 1883, with small balance from previous year, $80,762.60; expenditures for same, $79,155.55 inclusive of an investment of a legacy for permanent fund.

The Church Missionary Society for Seamen in the City of New York (Protestant-Episcopal), in its Thirty-Ninth Annual Report (1882-83), states that the society sustains, as heretofore, two chapels, three mission-houses, with reading and lecture rooms, oversight being in the hands of three clergymen, with the assistance of a colporteur at each station. Its total services for the year were 628; visits to reading-rooms, 5,622; seamen supplied with Bibles, 204, with Testaments, 613, with the Book of Common Prayer, 621. The bishop of the diocese is its president.

Besides the employment of chaplains, residents at seaports, and serving as Christian ministers, of Bible and tract distributors, Scripture-readers, colportors, and helpers, whose titles declare their functions, the missionary societies for seamen have usually wrought for their welfare by establishing, and in part sustaining (temporarily), Sailors' Homes in various ports. In them are resident missionaries, who, besides their services in religious meetings, devote portions of their time to spiritual and charitable visitation among sailors on shipboard and shore, at sailor boarding-houses, and in hospitals, and, in some cases, to such service for the families of seamen. The Wells Street Sailors' Home at London (Eng.) Docks was established by Mr. George Greene in 1830, was opened in 1835, enlarged in 1865. In one year it admitted 5,444 boarders, who, besides a home, had evening instruction, the use of a savings-bank, etc. The Liverpool (Eng.) Sailors' Homes were opened in 1844. The Sailors' Home at 190 Cherry Street, New York, is the property and is under the direction of the American Seamen's Friend Society. It was opened in 1842, reconstructed, refurnished, and re-opened in 1880, and is now unsurpassed by any sailors' home in the world. During the year 1882-83 it accommodated 2,003 boarders. The whole number of boarders since the Home was established is 102,713, and the amount saved by it to seamen and their relatives during the forty-one years since its establishment has been more than $1,500,000. The systematic supply of carefully selected libraries, to be loaned to vessels for use at sea, by their officers and crews, is now largely carried on by these organizations, especially by the American Seamen's Friend Society. Its shipments of such libraries from 1858-59 to March 31, 1883, were 7,764, and the re-shipments of the same, 8,100; the total shipments aggregating 15,864. The number of volumes was 119,420, accessible by original shipment to 301,125 seamen. Of the whole number sent out, 943 libraries with 33,948 volumes were placed upon United States naval vessels and in naval hospitals, and have been accessible to 107,995 men; 106 libraries were in 106 stations of the United States Life-saving Service, containing 3,816 volumes, accessible to 742 keepers and surfmen.

The Sailors' Magazine (32 pp., monthly), organ of the American Seamen's Friend Society, is now the eldest of the periodicals issued on behalf of seamen. It was established in September, 1828, is in its fifty-fifth volume; and of its issues for 1882-83, 81,000 copies were printed and distributed. In the same twelvemonth 18,000 copies of The Seamen's Friend (4 pp., annually), established in 1858, were issued by this society, for sailors; and 115,000 copies of the Life-Boat (4 pp., monthly) for the use of sabbath schools.

Varied help is habitually extended to shipwrecked and destitute sailors by all these organizations. The establishment of savings-banks for seamen has ordinarily been due to their influence. The Seamen's Savings-Bank in New York City (78 Wall Street) went into operation May 11, 1829. Sailors' asylums, orphanages, and "Rests" (houses of entertainment conducted upon temperance principles) are open in many seaports as the fruit of their existence. Miss Agnes Weston, from her "Rest" at Devonport, Eng., was distributing, gratis, by voluntary contribution, in 1882, 15,000 monthly Blue Books (8 pp. temperance and religious tracts) in the English tongue; and these were regularly translated into Dutch and German for the navies of Holland and Germany.

It is impracticable to present detailed statistics as to results of Christian labor for seamen: the best general estimate fixes the number of Christianized sailors at not far from thirty thousand. But to say that during the last half-century these men have been gathered into the church of Christ by thousands, that as a class sailors are now manifestly being lifted out of the ignorance and degradation in which they lived at the opening of the nineteenth century, and to attribute these changes, realized and still progressing, to the exertions of these societies, is to speak with truthful moderation. The corporate and individual efforts of persons connected with them have often originated and made effective beneficent public legislation, in the interest of sailors, in Great Britain and in the United States. It is in place to add, that, with few exceptions, all seamen's missionary societies are administered upon a non-denominational basis.

Of independent spirit, he entered at fifteen on self-support, and at sixteen began teaching school. He was graduated from Brown University in 1825, and from Newton Theological Seminary in 1828. For a short time he was pastor of the First Baptist Church of Hartford, Conn. In 1829 he became professor of ancient languages in Hamilton (N.Y.) In 1833 he went to Europe, spending two years in study in Halle, Leipzig, and Berlin, under Neander, Tholuck, and other great teachers of that period. He stands connected with an important chapter in Baptist history; for in 1834, in the Elbe at Hamburg, he baptized the Rev. J. G. Oncken and six others, forming the first German Baptist Church in communion with the Baptists of England and America. To avoid arrest and imprisonment, the baptism was by night; and from this beginning, through many and severe persecutions, the German-Baptist communion has increased, till it numbers more than a hundred and twenty churches with upwards of twenty-five thousand members. He returned to Hamilton in 1835, but in 1836 became professor of theology in Newton Theological Seminary, where he remained twelve years, being for the last nine years president of the institution. His teaching was broad, comprehensive, scriptural, incisive, suggestive, and apposite. For several years he was the editor of the Christian Review. Deeply interested in general education, he was appointed by Gov. Briggs a member of the Massachusetts Board of Education; and on the resignation of Horace Mann, in 1818, he was made secretary of the board, resigning his position at Newton. In this new service he continued seven years, his energy and enthusiasm, with his dignity, tact, and genial manner, giving him power and popularity with teachers and citizens. In 1855 he succeeded Dr. Wayland in the presidency of Brown University, which position he held for twelve years. In 1867 he was made general agent of the Peabody Educational Fund; and having removed his residence to Staunton, Va., he remained till his death in the successful discharge of the important duties of this position. He was revered and admired by his pupils, honored by his associates, and held in highest regard by all who in any way came into acquaintance with him. He received the degree of D.D. from Harvard in 1841, and that of LL.D. from Yale in 1862.

In addition to many review articles, reports, addresses, etc., he published a Life of Luther (1850), an edition of Roger's Thesaurus (1851), with several translations, compilations, etc. NORMAN FOX.

SEARS, Edmund Hamilton, D.D., b. at Sandisfield, Berkshire County, Mass., 1810; d. at Weston, Mass., Jan. 14, 1876; graduated at Union College, 1834, and at Cambridge Divinity School, 1837; was pastor at Wayland, Mass., 1838-40 and 1847-65, at Lancaster, Mass., 1840-47, and at Weston, 1865-76. Though connected with the Unitarian body, he held Swedenborgian opinions, and often professed his belief in the absolute divinity of our Lord. He wrote largely for the Monthly Religious Magazine, and with Rufus Ellis edited it, 1859-71. He published Regeneration (1851), Pictures of the Olden Time (1857), Athanasius, or Foregleams of Immortality (1858), The Fourth Gospel the Heart of Christ (1872), and Sermons and Songs of the Christian Life (1875). His writings are noted for their great spiritual power and beauty; and his two exquisite Christmas-hymns, "Calm on the listening ear of night," and "It came upon the midnight clear" (1834 and 1849 or 1850), are universally known. SEBALDUS, a Roman-Catholic saint; d., according to some, in 801, to others, in 901 or even later. The son of a Danish king or a peasant, he began his studies in Paris at fifteen. He married the daughter of King Dagobert, but the day after the ceremony was released from his marriage-vows; spent ten years in the practice of an ascetic life, and was commissioned by Gregory II. as a preacher of the gospel in Germany. He is said to have founded many churches in Bavaria, and at last to have settled down at Nurnberg, where the St. Sebaldus Church still preserves his memory. The city has chosen him as its patron, and celebrates his memory Aug. 19. On account of the miracles performed by him alive and by his relics, he was canonized by Martin V., 1425. NEUDECKER.

SE BAPTIST. See SMYTH, JOHN.

SEBASTIAN, a Catholic saint, and protecting patron against the plague; was b. in the third century, in Narbonne, and educated at Milan. Eager to render help to the persecuted Christians under Diocletian, he entered the ranks of the army as a secret Christian, and was appointed by Diocletian to a high position. When it became known that he was a Christian, he was condemned to death, and pierced with many arrows. Left for dead, a Christian, Irene, who was about to bury him, found him alive. He got well, but was again condemned, and flogged to death. A church was built to his memory at Rome, and was followed by the discontinuance of the plague. His day in the Roman calendar is Jan. 20; in the Greek, Dec. 18. Baronius, Tillemont, and others lay particular emphasis on the Acta S. Sebastiani. NEUDECKER.

SECKENDORF, Veit Ludwig von, b. Dec. 20, 1626, at Herzogenaurach, near Erlangen; d. at Halle, Dec. 18, 1692. He was educated at the court of Gotha; studied law and philosophy at Strassburg, and held high positions in the service, first, of Duke Ernst of Gotha, then of Maurice of Saxony, and finally of the elector of Brandenburg. His Compendium historie ecclesiasticæ (Gotha, 1660-64, 2 vols.) was translated into German, and often reprinted. His principal work, however, is his De Lutheranism (Leipzig, 1688), written against Maimbourg's Histoire de Luthérisme. His life was written by SCHREIBER, Leipzig, 1737. G. H. KLIPPEL.

SECKER, Thomas, Church of England; b. at Sibthorpe, Nottinghamshire, 1693; d. in London, Aug. 3, 1768. He was graduated M.D. at Leyden, 1721, but then entered Exeter College, Oxford; was ordained priest, 1723, rector of Houghton-le-Spring, 1724, of St. James's, London, 1733; appointed chaplain to the king, 1732; consecrated bishop of Bristol, Jan. 19, 1735; transferred to Oxford, May, 1737, to which see was added the deanery of St. Paul's, 1750; and finally he was enthroned archbishop of Canterbury, April 21, 1758. He was a popular preacher and a faithful bishop. See Bishop PORTEUS' Review of his life, prefaced to his edition of his Works, London, 1770, 12 vols.

SECULARIZATION means the conversion of an ecclesiastical institution and its property into a secular institution with a secular purpose, or the transformation of a State organization with an ecclesiastical head into a State organization with a secular head, or the legal absolution from ecclesiastical vows. Secularizations of the first kind have occurred from time to time, — in the last days of the reign of the Merovingian dynasty in France, under Henry II. in Germany, during the Reformation in various countries, etc., — though always under the protest of the Church. The first instance of a secularization of the second kind was probably the transference of the Duchy of Prussia from the possession of the Knights of the Teutonic Order to the dominion of a prince of the German Empire (1525). But on a still greater scale secularization of this kind was carried on during the Napoleonic wars, especially by the Peace of Campo Formio (1797) and that of Luneville (1801). The word was first used by the French delegates during the negotiations preceding the Peace of Westphalia (1648). Secularization of the third kind is a Papal prerogative.

SECUNDUS, a gnostic of the school of Valentinus; differed (by teaching, besides the thirty æons, a double tetrad, — one to the right, and one to the left; one of light, and one of darkness) so materially from his master, that he formed a school of his own, — the Secundinians. But the notices of him which have come down to us through Irenæus (Hær., i. 11, 2), Hippolytus (Ref., vi. 38), Tertullian (Prescript., 49), Epiphanius (Hær., 32), and others, do not enable us to form any complete idea of his system. W. MÖLLER.

SEDES VACANS, a term of canon law, — properly speaking applicable only to the papal or to an episcopal see, because sedes (θρόνος) originally was used only in connection with the predicate apostolica, though its use has gradually been extended to abbeys and other high dignities of church, — denotes the interval between the decease or deposition on translation or resignation of the occupant to the full legal instalment of his successor. During such an interval the administration of an episcopal diocese was originally confided to the presbytery, afterwards to an intercessor, interventor, or visitor, and finally to the cathedral chapter. If the vacancy is not absolute, but only partial, as, for instance, on account of the sickness of the occupant, the term sedes impedita (hindered) is applied, and a coadjutor is appointed. H. F. JACOBSON.

SEDGWICK, Daniel, the father of English hymnology; b. in London, 1815; d. there March 10, 1879; was originally a shoemaker, of humble birth and limited education. Being fond of hymns, he bought the old books containing them one by one, and about 1840 began the systematic collection and study of texts and editions. He gradually acquired a unique library, and a knowledge of the subject long unrivalled. The popularity of Sir R. Palmer's (now Lord Selborne) Book of Praise, 1865, and the care Mr. Sedgwick had bestowed in making it a model of accuracy in texts, dates, and ascriptions of authorship, established his reputation; and thenceforth the compilers of nearly every prominent English hymnal, of whatever creed or connection, required his help. His shop in Sun Street, Bishopsgate, was the chief source of hymnologic information for England and America. He published from 1859 to 1865, and usually at pecuniary loss, the only collection of Ryland's hymns, and the only reliable one of Toplady's, besides reprints of Mason and Shepherd's, Steele, W. Williams, Seagrave, Grigg, and several more. His six catalogues, and Comprehensive Index of names and authors, 1863, are valuable for reference. F. M. BIRD.

SEDGWICK, Obadiah, English Presbyterian; b. in parish of St. Peter, Marlborough, Wiltshire, 1600; d. at Marlborough, January, 1657. He was graduated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford; entered holy orders; was chaplain to Sir Horatio Vere, baron of Tilbury; returned to Oxford, where in 1629 he became "reader of the sentences." Soon after, he began to preach at St. Mildred's, Broadstreet, London, and until 1655, with the exception of two years (1639-41) when he was at Coggeshall, Essex, he preached in London, — in Broadstreet until 1646, and afterwards at St. Paul's, Covent Garden. His ministry was popular and fruitful. He zealously defended the Presbyterian cause. He was one of the licensers of the press, and a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines. In 1653 he was appointed by Parliament one of the "tryers" (examiners of the qualifications of ministers), and in 1654 assistant to the commissioners of London for the ejection of "scandalous and ignorant" ministers and schoolmasters. He was succeeded in his parish by his son-in-law, Thomas Manton. Besides numerous printed sermons (enumerated by Wood), he was the author of The doubting Christian resolved, London, 1653; The humbled sinner resolved what he should do to be saved, 1656; The Shepherd of Israel, 1658 (an exposition of the Twenty-third Psalm); Synopsis of Christianity; Anatomy of secret sins, 1660; The bowels of tender mercy sealed in the everlasting covenant, 1661; A short catechism. See Wood: Ath. Oxon., ed. Bliss, iii. 411-414.

SEDULIUS, Cajus Cœlius, or Cæcilius, a Christian poet and priest of the fifth century; lived during the reign of Theodosius II. and Valentinian III. Of his life nothing is known with certainty; but his Carmen paschale, written in hexameters, was printed in 1473, and again in 1499 and 1502. There are also later editions by Gallandi, 1773, and Arevalo, 1794.

SEDULIUS SCOTUS, or SEDULIUS JUNIOR, was a Christian author of the eighth century, who wrote Collectanea in omnes epistolas S. Pauli, found in Bibl. Mac. Lugd., vi.; commentaries on the first three Gospels, edited by A. Mai, in Script. vet. Coll. nova, ix.; and a politico-religious treatise, De rectoribus Christianis, edited by A. Mai, in Spicil. Romanum.

SEEING GOD. It belongs to the deepest endeavors of all religions to make sure of the nearness of the Deity: hence those places are especially sacred where he is said to reveal himself, and the persons are holy who are found worthy of that nearness, or have that higher faculty to bring others in a near relationship to the Deity. The highest degree of that desire is to see the Deity in essential reality. In the Bible also we find such a desire expressed, which is one of the most deeply rooted instincts of the religious man. This instinct is satisfied (even the sensual part of man may partake of it), but the mode of seeing changes itself in the same degree as the manner in which God appears. In this respect we find, especially in the Old Testament, the prevalence of popular views. Thus the main idea is this, that the common man (i.e., one whom no special holiness protects) must die when he sees God in the form peculiar to him. This form shows itself at first in the fiery appearances in heaven. Lot's wife dies, because she curiously sees the fiery judgment of Jehovah (Gen. xix. 26). Gideon and Manoah expect death, because they have seen the angel of the Lord in the fire (Judg. vi. 23, xiii. 22). For the same reason the people removed from Mount Sinai when they saw God in the cloud, smoke, and lightning (Exod. xx. 18, 19; Deut. xviii. 16). The explanation of that incapacity which makes it impossible for man to behold God when he shows himself in his power, lies in the fact of man's frail strength: he is flesh (Deut. v. 26). But the deeper knowledge of the divine will overcomes this hinderance. God will give blessing and grace. His appearances become by degrees the sign of this heavenly grace. The transition is made in the examples of Gideon, Manoah, and Hagar; since that God who promises blessing and salvation cannot let the guiltless die. Yea, it is one of the strongest proofs of the grace of God in the theocratic covenant, that Jehovah himself leads his people in the pillar of fire and smoke: it is a clear proof of Israel's religious superiority above all other nations, that it saw God in his peculiar glory, without dying (Deut. iv. 33, v. 24), or, as it is so emphatically expressed by Moses, "The Lord talked with you face to face" (Deut. v. 4). But the behavior of the people caused a limitation in the seeing of God. The stranger, or unclean, who approached the holy place, must die, as well as the Israelite who entered the sanctuary. Only God's elected, like those seventy elders who saw God (Exod. xxiv. 9, 10), may see God. But the circle becomes smaller still: only the patriarch Israel has seen God face to face (Gen. xxxii. 30); only Moses, the mediator and man of God, speaks with Jehovah as a man speaketh unto his friend (Exod. xxxiii. 11). And, because none else has experienced such fullness of grace, Moses is also the highest prophet. Whereas others see God in visions and dreams, he sees God from face to face, and sees the similitude of the Lord (Num. xii. 8). For God must have some kind of similitude, otherwise he could not be seen with the eye, — a similitude different from the manner in which he appears in the storm and fire. This representation is popular (1 Kings xxii. 19 sq.); but it excludes every corporeity, and in its unreflected form it is rather the concrete expression, in part of the reality, in part of the personality, of God, and forms the necessary basis for the possibility of that seeing. But already in the history of Moses we meet with a peculiar narrative (Exod. xxxiii. 12-xxxiv. 7) which opposes that view which has thus far been advanced. In the first instance we are told that no man shall live who sees God (Exod. xxxiii. 20): in the second instance we are told that God's face cannot be seen at all (Exod. xxxiii. 20, 23). Instead of this, Moses hears an explanation concerning his goodness and his name, his volition full of mercy and grace. With this, the visible seeing of God is made impossible. And thus we find it in the psalms and prophets; and the seeing of God is nothing else than the experience of his helpful presence, which takes the habitation of Jehovah, the temple, for its starting-point (Ps. xlii. 3). Hence, also, the hope of Job (xix. 26), "I shall see God," i.e., I will experience his helpful grace visibly, not in the other life, but in this life; thus, also, Hezekiah (Isa. xxxviii. 11). The highest fulfilment of all religious wishes involves Ps. xi. 7: "His countenance doth behold the upright." Especially interesting and much disputed is the passage Ps. xvii. 15: "I will behold thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness." Here, as in Num. xii. 8, the similitude of God appears as the object of the seeing of God, but only in so far as the strict carrying-out of the image makes it necessary, because it concerns here the real communion with the highest source of blessing. The awakening has no reference to the sleep of death, but is the symbol of the grace of God, which is new every morning. Among the prophets the seeing of God is already so much divested of its externality, that in a free manner it is used to express prophetic vision. In Ps. xviii. the theophany is the mediation for the singer's salvation; but in Isa. vi., Ezek. i. 26, Dan. vii. 9, it connects itself with the illumination of the prophet and his call. The image of the sovereign occupies the foreground; but in Isaiah and Ezekiel it is surrounded by the original appearances of the theophany in cloud, smoke, fire, etc. In Isaiah we also perceive the old fear of death because of the presence of Jehovah: he acknowledges he is "a man of unclean lips, and dwelling in the midst of a people of unclean lips." Human unworthiness is here reduced, not to the fact that man is flesh, but to the idea of uncleanness, which, however, by that addition, receives another signification. The lips mediate the word which comes out of the heart: hence it refers to the sins of the heart and to sins committed by word; they make the presence of Jehovah sitting on his throne, so long intolerable to men, until holy fire has purged him.

By combining this idea with Ps. xi. 7 we approach the word of Christ, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God" (Matt. v. 8): with this the hope of the fulfilment of the highest religious desire, the deepest knowledge of God with the richest enjoyment of grace and blessedness, is given to them, only these goods receive a fuller and more particular meaning in the kingdom of Christ. With this corresponds what John regarded as the highest Christian goal: "For we shall see him as he is" (1 John iii. 2), for only like perceives like (1 Cor. ii. 11). Therefore, also, 1 John iv. 12, 20 makes the real seeing of God impossible: it is a seeing mediated through love; the seeing refers to the Son whom God hath sent. In him we see the Father (John xiv. 9), because in him grace and glory have been personified (John i. 18). Yea, the Son himself is on the Father's bosom: he alone has seen the Father (John vi. 46); what the Father does, he does also; the Father himself shows him the works which he should do. But that seeing of God in the old sense is not predicated even of the only-begotten Son, since the entire sphere of this conception is taken up into the higher spiritual realm. With this also correspond the familiar expressions concerning the invisibility of God (1 Tim. vi. 16; Rom. i. 20).

SEEKERS, a small Puritan sect of the seventeenth century, who professed to be seeking the true church, ministry, and sacraments, but who at the same time comprised, according to Baxter (Life and Times, p. 76), Roman Catholics and infidels, as well as Puritans.

SEGNERI, Paolo, Italian Jesuit; b. at Nettuno in the Campagna di Roma, March 21, 1624; d. at Rome, Dec. 6, 1694. He entered the Society of Jesus in his thirteenth (1638), was ordained priest in his twenty-ninth year; and from then until 1665 he taught in a Jesuit school at Pestoia. From 1665 to 1692 he spent half the year in retirement, and the rest in travelling as a missionary throughout Northern Italy. He became the "foremost preacher among the Jesuits in Italy;" and in power over the multitudes who thronged about him, and who fairly worshipped him, he was like Savonarola. He has been styled the "restorer of Italian eloquence." His sermons were modelled upon Chrysostom's, but without servility. They are, however, frequently marred by trivial remarks and stories. When the Jesuits at Rome perceived that Quietism (see art. MOLINOS) was slowly undermining Romanism, and particularly Jesuitism, they sent him "a bundle of Quietistic books with directions to prepare an antidote to them." So in 1680 he published at Florence a small volume with the title, Concordia tra la fatica e la Quietè ("harmony between effort and Quiet") in which, without naming Molinos, or depreciating the contemplative life, he endeavored to show that the successful prosecution of Quietism was possible only to a few. "He insists that the state of contemplation can never be a fixed or permanent state, and objects therefore to closing the middle way;" i.e., now meditation, now contemplation. His book raised, however, a storm of opposition from the then powerful Quietists, and was put into the Index. He prudently remained away from Rome. In 1692 Pope Innocent XII. called him to Rome as his preacher-in-ordinary, and theologian of the penitentiary.

SEIR, or LAND OF SEIR (Gen. xxxii. 3), also MOUNT SEIR (Gen. xxxvi. 30), is the name of the mountain ridge extending along the east side of the valley of the Arabah, from the Dead Sea to the Elanitic Gulf. The southern part of this range now bears the appellation esh-Sherah. The height of the ridge is from between three thousand and four thousand feet, and the length from the north towards the south about twenty miles, and the breadth from three to four miles. One of the highest points of the western range is Hor, with Aaron's tomb (Num. xxxiii. 38). Wadys break frequently through this mountain, and water fertile valleys, especially in the north-eastern part. The western part, bordering on the Arabah, is rather a desert. Mount Seir was originally inhabited by the Horites, or Tryglodites, who were dispossessed, and apparently annihilated, by the posterity of Esau, who "dwelt in their stead" (Deut. ii. 12). Though the country was afterwards called Edom, yet the older name, Seir, did not pass away (1 Chron. iv. 42; 2 Chron. xx. 10; Ezek. xxxv.). In the post-exile period the country was taken by the Nabathæans, who again were subdued by the Mohammedans in the year 629 A.D. Now the country is inhabited by the Bedawin. In the fertile valleys, peasants, Fellâhin, cultivate the land, and sell their produce to the pilgrims. The pilgrimage route from Damascus to Mecca runs on the eastern border of the country.

LEYRER.

SE'LA, or SE'LAH (rock: so in Greek form, Petra, "rock"), a city of Edom, literally hewn out of the rock, filling a valley three-quarters of a mile long, and two hundred and fifty to five hundred yards wide. It is now entirely deserted, but its ruins amply attest its former grandeur. It is situated halfway between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Akabah, in a deep cleft of the Mount-Seir range, near the foot of Mount Hor. It is approached through a narrow defile on the east, a mile and a half long, called the Sik ("cleft") of Wadi Mûsa, because the Arabs believe it was made by Moses' rod when he brought the stream through into the valley beyond (Num. xx. 8). The rock of red sandstone towers to a height of from one hundred to three hundred feet above the traveller's head as he rides along upon his camel, and in places the way is so narrow that he can almost touch the sides on either hand. Once the way was paved, and bits of the pavement can be seen. Abruptly the traveller comes upon the so-called Khaznet Fir'aun ("treasury of Pharaoh"), really a temple cut from the living rock, with a façade eighty-five feet high, beautifully sculptured, and in remarkable preservation. Two hundred yards farther along the valley, which widens considerably at this point, is the amphitheatre, also entirely from the rock, thirty-nine yards in diameter, and with thirty-three tiers of seats, accommodating from three thousand to four thousand spectators. Farther on there are curious tombs, some very elaborate, other temples, chief of which is the Kasr Fir'aun ("palace of Pharaoh"), and a triumphal arch. But upon the city rests the curse of God (Jer. xlix. 16-18), and the place is desolate.

Selah is only twice directly mentioned in the Bible,—in 2 Kings xiv. 7, as captured by Amaziah, and called Joktheel ("subdued of God"), and in Isa. xvi. 1: "Send ye the lamb to the ruler of the land from Sela to the wilderness, unto the mount of the daughter of Zion;" although in several other passages the word "rock" with more or less probability referred to it (Judg. i. 36; 2 Chron. xxv. 11, 12; Isa. xlii. 11; Jer. xlix. 16-18; Obad. 3). The first wife of Herod Antipas, whom he divorced to marry Herodias (Luke iii. 19), was the daughter of Aretas, king of Petra. In King Amaziah's day, Sela was the capital of Edom; but, after his capture and destruction of it, the headship passed to Bozrah. In this way its striking omission in the Bible is accounted for. But in the fourth century B.C. the Nabathæans pushed their way eastwards, occupied the Arabah, and made Sela, under its Greek form Petra, their capital. The city rose into prominence, being upon the high-road between Arabia and Syria. The Seleucids made vain attempts to take it. Pompey captured the whole region called by Greek writers Arabia Petraea; i.e., Arabia whose capital is Petra. In Petra, Hyrcanus II. and his son Herod, afterwards Herod the Great, found a hiding-place (Joseph., Antiquities, XIV. 1, 4; War, I. 6, 2; 13, 8). In the first Christian centuries Petra was the capital of a Roman province, and it is from this period that the ruins date. It became an episcopal see, and its bishops are mentioned as late as A.D. 536. But it apparently was destroyed by some desert horde shortly after this date; for it sank completely out of notice until Seetzen, in 1867, visited it, and gave the world the wondrous tale. Burckhardt followed him in 1812; Irby and Mangles, in 1818. It is now frequently visited. See the works of the travellers mentioned; ROBINSON: Researches, ii. 712; PALMER: Desert of the Exodus, pp. 366 sqq.; RIDGWAY: The Lord's Land, pp. 139 sqq.; and the guide-books of MURRAY (Porter) and BARDEKER (Socin).

SE'LAH, a musical term which occurs seventy-four times in the Bible (seventy-one times in thirty-nine Psalms, and also in Hab. iii. 3, 9, 13), and has been variously interpreted. In the Targum upon the Psalms it is four times rendered "forever," so also Aquila; while in the Septuagint the word used is αἰὶνᾶν,—itself ambiguous. The rabbins followed the Targum, and explained "Selah" by "forever." Modern scholars are much divided. Gesenius interprets it as denoting a pause in the song while the music of the Levites went on. Hengstenberg also renders it "pause," but refers it to the contents of the psalm,—pause to reflect upon what has been sung. Ewald, and, after him, Prown, render it "strike up,"—a direction to the musician to strike up in a louder strain. Others, again, refer the elevation, not to the music, but to the voice. Alexander thinks it is a pious ejaculation to express the writer's feelings, and to warn the readers to reflect. (See WRIGHT's art. in SMITH'S Dict. of the Bible.)

SELDEN, John, an erudite writer on law and Hebrew antiquities; was b. at Salvington, Sussex, Dec. 16, 1584; d. at White Friars, Nov. 30, 1654. At the age of fourteen he entered Hart College, Oxford, where he took his degree in 1602 and entered Clifford's Inn, and in 1604 the Inner Temple, for the study of law. He attained singular learning in this department, and published several scholarly works upon legal subjects, as England's Epinomis and Jani Anglorum fœcis altera (both 1610). Another fruit of his earlier studies was the Analecton Anglo-Britannicon, relating to the history of England before the Norman Conquest, which was finished in 1606, but not published till nine years later. In 1617 he published his great work, De Dits Syris, which established his reputation on the Continent, and was republished at Leyden (with additions by Le Dieu and Heinsius). 1627, and Leipzig, 1662, 1680. In 1618 appeared the History of Tithes, which denied the divine right of the system, and called forth the wrath of the king, so that the author was obliged to revoke his positions. Selden sustained an intimate relation with the political movements for thirty years. In 1621 he was called by the House of Commons to give his opinion concerning the dispute between it and the Crown, and strongly advised the Commons to insist upon its proper rights. In consequence of this advice he was imprisoned by the king. In 1621 he represented Lancaster in Parliament; 1625, Great Bedwin; and, after that, Lancaster in several Parliaments. He was active in the popular cause, signed the remonstrance for the removal of the Duke of Buckingham, and was a prominent supporter of the Petition of Right. In 1629 he was committed to the Tower, from which he was released in 1631 on bail, and in 1634 without surety. He succeeded in allaying the king's anger by his Mare clausum (1636); and ever after that he seemed to have refused to enter heartily into any measures against royalty, and voted against the majority which condemned the Earl of Stafford. In 1640 he represented the university of Oxford in the Long Parliament. In 1643 he was chosen one of the members of the Westminster Assembly, and the following year subscribed the Solemn League and Covenant, and was made master of Trinity Hall, Cambridge. His funeral sermon was at his request preached by his old friend, Archbishop Ussher.

Selden was a man of immense learning and a prolific author. A tablet at Oxford calls him the corypheus in antiquarian studies (antiquariorum coryphæus). Two of his greatest works were written during the years of his imprisonment (1629-31). — De jure naturali et Gentium juxta disciplinam Hebræorum, in seven books, and De successione in Pontificatum Hebræorum. His last work was De spectrâ et prefecturis juridicis veterum Hebræorum, in three books. Among Selden's other works were the Duello, or Single Combat (1610), Titles of Honor (1611), an elaborate account of king, duke, and other titles. His Table-Talk, which was published thirty-five years after his death, by Milward, who professes to have been his amanuensis for twenty years, is perhaps the best known of Selden's works outside of theological circles. The statement in Selden's will may be taken to indicate his faith. "With all humility of heart," he says, "and with true repentance of my manifold sins and offences, I commend my soul and self into the gracious protection and preservation of my Creator, Redeemer, and Saviour, from and through whom only, with fulness of assurance, I expect and hope for eternal bliss and happiness in the world to come." Lord Clarendon says, "Selden was of so stupendous learning in all kinds and in all languages (as may appear in his excellent and transcendent writings), that a man would have thought he had been entirely conversant amongst books, and had never spent an hour but in reading and writing; yet his humanity, courtesy, and affability were such that he would have been thought to have been bred in courts. In his conversation he was the most clear discourser, and had the best faculty of making hard things easy, and presenting them to the understanding of any man that hath been known." His motto was, "Liberty concerning all things" (περὶ πάντων τὴν ἐλευθερίαν).

A splendid edition of Selden's complete works, furnished with elaborate indexes, was issued by DAVID WILKINS, London, 1726, 3 vols. (the first two containing the Latin writings, the third, the English). For the biography of Selden, see the Life (in Latin) prefixed to this edition; and JOHN ATKIN, D.D.: The Lives of John Selden, Esq., and Archbishop Ussher, London, 1812.

SELEUCIA (with the surname ad Mare, "on the sea," 1 Macc. xi. 3), a city of Syria, stood on the Mediterranean shore, north of the mouth of the Orontes. It was built by Seleucus Nicator in 300 B.C., and was especially celebrated on account of its excellent harbor, from which Paul set out for Cyprus on his first missionary tour (Acts xiii. 4). There were in ancient days ten other cities of the name "Seleucia," of which, especially, Seleucia Ktesiphon, between the Euphrates and the Tigris, at one time was a very flourishing place.

SELNECCER, Nicolaus, b. Dec. 6, 1530, at Hersbruck, near Nuremberg; d. at Hildesheim, May 24, 1592. He studied theology at Wittenberg, and was successively court-preacher at Dresden, professor at Jena, pastor in Leipzig, and superintendent at Hildesheim, but suffered much from the Crypto-Calvinists on the one side, and the Flacians on the other. He was a very prolific writer; but only a few of his works have any interest now,—his Commentary on the Psalms (Nuremberg, 1564, 2 vols.), and his Christliche Psalmen (Leipzig, 1587). See MÜTZEL: Geistliche Lieder aus dem 16. Jahrhundert, Berlin, 1855, 3 vols. HOLLENBERG.

SELWYN, George Augustus, D.D., English prelate; b. at Richmond in 1809; d. at Lichfield, April 11, 1878. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge. While curate at Windsor in 1841, he was appointed first bishop of the Anglican Church in New Zealand. At his farewell sermon before leaving England, John Coleridge Patteson, then a youth of fourteen, was present. Besides attending to the spiritual wants of his colonial diocese, he extended his operations to the South Sea Islands, navigating his own vessel, the "Southern Cross," for this purpose. He brought youths from Melanesia to New Zealand, who, after receiving instruction, returned to enlighten their countrymen. In 1855 this branch of work was intrusted to Bishop Patteson. In 1857 he obtained the division of his diocese, and ten years later became bishop of Lichfield. His administration of this new and trying sphere, which comprised the so-called "Black Country," was very vigorous. His son has succeeded Bishop Patteson in Melanesia. See his Memoir by Rev. H. W. TUCKER, London, 1879, 2 vols.

SEMI-ARIANS. This name occurs for the first time as the name of a party in the period when the decided Arianism of Aetius and Eunomius asserted itself, and such men as Ursacius, Valens, and Eudoxius of Antioch, who were influential with Constantius, favored a modified form of Arianism. At this time men like Basil of Ancyra, Eustathius of Sebaste, and Macedonius of Constantinople, arose, opposing Arianism by declaring the generation of the Son to be a distinct conception from creation, and affirming that the Son resembled the Father in his essence (ὁμοούσιος ὁ πατήρι). In essential particulars this was the view which Eusebius of Caesarea had represented at Nicæa. The Logos is God of god, and Light of light, but at the same time only the brightness of the first light, the image of the first substance, and different from it. The Son was not absolutely eternal (ἀπὸ ἀρχῆς ὄντως), for his existence presupposes the existence of the Father. In fact, the conception of Eusebius was a re-announcement of the subordination view of Origen. After the Council of Nicæa this mediate view prevailed in the East, which refused to accept either Arianism or the Nicene definition. Attempts were made by this party to formulate the doctrine of the sonship of Christ in such a way as to unite all the parties. The statement of the synods of Antioch (310), Philippopolis, and the first synod of Sirmium (351), condemn, on the one hand, the Nicene definition as leading to Sabellianism, and, on the other hand, the Arian doctrine of the creation of the Son as unscriptural. According to the synod of Antioch, God the Father alone has absolute being, and the Son, though begotten before all time, was begotten by the free will of the Father, and not by virtue of necessity, and is subordinate to him. At the second synod of Sirmium, Ursacius and Valens sought — by the suppression of the words in dispute (ὁμοία, ὁμογενής, ὁμοούσιος), the definition that the Son is like the Father, and the statement that the manner of his conception is inexplicable — to put a stop to the controversy. Eudoxius at a synod in Antioch explained this decree in an Arian sense, but all the more positively did the Semi-Arian synod of Ancyra (358) oppose Eudoxius. Constantius wished to settle the dispute by summoning a general council. Dissuaded from this plan, the two synods of Ariminum in Italy, and Seleucia in Isauria, were held, in which the Orientals and Occidentals were kept apart. It was hoped both synods would agree to the so-called third Sirmian formula, which had been agreed to in 358 by Ursacius and Valens on the one hand, and Basil of Ancyra, and Georgius of Laodicea on the other, at the court at Sirmium. Both councils were ready to declare in favor of the Nicene formula, the Seleucian synod, however, excepting the word ὁμοούσιος (of the same substance). But they finally gave way to the court party, and accepted the Sirmian formula. The court influence understood how to render the Semi-Arians harmless, and Eudoxius was raised to the see of Constantinople. The Semi-Arians gradually approached the advocates of the Nicene doctrine; and Basil, Gregory Nazianzen, and Gregory of Nyssa, contributed very much towards the currency of the Nicene views. At the Second Council of Constantinople (381), the Nicene theology was adopted, and Semi-Arian as well as Arian views were condemned. See ARIANISM, MACEDONIUS, etc. W. VÖLLER.

SEMINARIES, Theological, Continental, are divided into four classes: (1) The Roman-Catholic, according to the plan of the Council of Trent, in which boys of twelve years are received, trained in theological and secular studies apart from all worldly influences, and remain until they are ordained priests; (2) The evangelical seminaries in the kingdom of Wurtemberg, which receive boys of fourteen years, train them until they are eighteen, then send them to the university of Tubingen for further theological study, whence they issue as assistant pastors; (3) Institutions which receive the candidates for the ministry after they have finished their theological studies at the universities, and train them in practical ministerial duties; (4) Institutions which give training in homiletics and catechetics.

I. Before the Council of Trent, the institutions of the first class were called "schools," or "colleges." The discipline was monastic. The principal was an abbot, or, in the case of schools directly under episcopal control, a "scholasticus," who was always a clergyman. The rise of the universities destroyed these schools; but the Jesuits restored them, and after Trent they were called "seminaries." Instruction is given in grammar, singing, the ecclesiastical calendar, the Scriptures, service-books, the homilies of the saints, the ceremonies of the sacraments, and other matters relating to the services. Mass must be daily heard, and confession and communion be monthly. Every bishop must have such a school attached to his cathedral or metropolitan church.

II. The first seminary in the Protestant sense was in the Kingdom of Wurtemberg. It was modelled upon the cloister idea. Next to these comes Loccum, in Hanover. In 1593 the entire cloister there went over to Protestantism, but retained its organization intact, except that it undertook the special work of educating ministers. In 1820 it was revived and enlarged. Its head is still called "abbot." In 1817 Frederick William III. of Prussia founded a seminary in Wittenberg, to honor the Luther city, which had been deprived of its university. The Reformed seminary at Herborn replaced the old "Orange and Nassau high-school." In 1837 the seminary at Friedberg was founded. The Moravians have seminaries in Gnadenfeld and Nazareth (Pennsylvania, U.S.A.).

III. In Greece the future priests are instructed by deacons or other clergy, under the supervision of the bishops. In Russia most priests are the sons of priests: if the sons of a layman enter the service of the church, they generally become monks. The schools for the education of priests' sons are of three grades, — schools, seminaries, academies. In the lowest, the scholars enter at seven, and remain until twelve years old. In the latter years of their stay they are taught Latin and Greek; so that, even if they do not go to a seminary, they can serve as reader or chorister in village churches. There may be several such schools in a parish, but there can be only one seminary. The latter is under immediate episcopal direction. The principal is a monk, a chinandrite, or aspirant to a bishopric. The professors are partly monks, and partly lay. Their number is great, for there are sometimes as many as twenty in one seminary: but the number of scholars is also great, since every priest has the right to send his sons thither; and, as there are not enough churches for the priests thus educated, many of the scholars go into other callings. SEMI-PELAGIANISM, a term invented by the schoolmen, denotes a view which was developed within the time of the Fathers, and which tries to follow a middle course between Augustine and Pelagius. In the West the powerful personality of Augustine, the vigorous proceedings of the African Church, the assent of the see of Rome, and the effective aid of imperial rescript, procured the victory for the views of Augustine; but in the East the Greek Church continued its course, unconcerned by what took place in the West, even after the condemnation of the Nestorians, and implicitly also of the Pelagians, by the synod of Ephesus. Soon, however, it became apparent, that, even in the West, there were many people who took offence at the rigorism of Augustine, and still more who believed that they were following him, though they had really no idea of the consequences which his doctrine involved.

The discrepancy became patent before Augustine died. His two pupils and friends, Prosper of Aquitaine, and Hilary, informed him by letters (Aug. Ep. 225 and 226) that the monks of Massilia accused him of having, in his controversy with Pelagius, set forth propositions which contradicted the doctrines of the Fathers and the church in general. In the letters the Massilian monks are described as holding, that by faith and baptism any one can be saved, if he only will; that the will to be saved is implanted in human nature by the Creator himself; that predestination either must presuppose a difference of human nature, or lead into fatalism, etc. It is evident that those monks simply wanted to find a middle way between the Augustinian doctrine of predestination and the Pelagian doctrine of the free will of man. At their head stood John Cassianus, a pupil of Chrysostom, and for some time an inmate of an Egyptian desert monastery, whose writings, glowing with monkish fervor, show marks of influence from the Greek theology. The report of Prosper and Hilary called forth the two treatises of Augustine, De prædestinatione sanctorum and De dono perseverantiæ; but they did not succeed in convincing the Massilian monks. Shortly after (430), Augustine died, and Prosper found himself the chief opponent of the Semi-Pelagian movement. He repaired to Rome, and induced Pope Celestine to address a letter to the bishops of Gaul (Mansi: Coll. Concil., iv. p. 451). The letter is unconditional in its defence of Augustine, and full of reproaches against those bishops of Gaul who introduced novelties, and put forward indiscriminate and useless questions. But it is strikingly silent about the real point at issue. Nor did Sixtus, the successor of Celestine, find it suitable to be more explicit on the matter. Meanwhile Prosper wrote his various books against the Semi-Pelagians (see the respective articles), and others came to his aid. The Deocatione gentium, generally, though hardly on sufficient grounds, ascribed to Leo the Great, and found among his works, is an attempt at reconciliation. The expressions are very much mitigated; but, as nothing of the principle has been given up, it exercised no influence. On the contrary, the Augustinian doctrine of predestination now began to be attacked, even with great harshness, by people who did not belong to the Semi-Pelagian camp; and its adherents, though never condemned by the church as a sect, were marked out by the Semi-Pelagians as prædestinati. Interesting in this respect is the Præ- destinatus sive prædestinatorum hæresis, first edited by Sirmond, Paris, 1613, and by him ascribed to the younger Arnobius. It consists of three books: the first contains a catalogue of heresies ending with that of the prædestinati; the second, a representation of that heresy; and the third, its refutation from a Semi-Pelagian point of view.

For some time the controversy seems to have been brought to rest, or to have been forgotten, on account of the great political disturbances under which Gaul suffered during the fifth century. In the latter half of the century, however, it once more comes to the foreground with Faustus, bishop of Reji (Riez), and the presbyter Lucidus. The latter was a passionate adherent of the doctrine of predestination, and, as friendly expositions led to nothing, Faustus publicly attacked him, and invited him to a disputation in the presence of the assembled bishops. The disputation took place, probably, at the synod of Arles (475); and Lucidus declared himself defeated, and recanted. Shortly after, Faustus published his De gratia et humanæ mentis libero arbitrio, which was received with great applause; so that the whole of Gaul seemed to have been conquered by Semi-Pelagianism. In the beginning of the sixth century, however, a sudden change took place in the state of affairs. Those Scythian monks, who, during the reign of Justin I. and Justinian, preached theopaschitism in Constantinople, were naturally opponents of Pelagius. Having tried in vain to introduce themselves to Pope Hormisdas, they sent a confession of faith to the African bishops who lived in exile in Sardinia. It is found in Bibl. Max. Patri., Lyons, ix., and ends up with a condemnation, not only of Pelagius, but also of Faustus. Fulgentius of Ruspe, the most prominent of the African bishops, responded with his De incarnatione et gratia, in which he completely refuted Semi-Pelagianism, though without mentioning the name of Faustus. The case attracted the attention of the emperor Justinian, and he asked Hormisdas to pronounce his opinion on it. The answer of the Pope (520) is very diplomatic (Mansi: Coll. Concil., viii.). It defends Augustine, it defends Faustus, it defends every thing; but it was very unceremoniously handled by Johannes Maxentius, the leader of the monks, in his Responsio ad epistolam Hormisdæ (Bibl. Max. Patri., Lyons, ix.), who demonstrated, that, if Augustine is right, Faustus must be wrong. The tide was now turning. Even in Gaul, Semi-Pelagianism found influential adversaries; an Avitus of Vienne, a Casarius of Arles, and the synod of Orange (Arausio), actually condemned it (Mansi: Con. Coll., viii.). The decrees of the synod of Orange were afterwards confirmed by Pope Boniface II. and the synod of Valence, and officially Semi-Pelagianism was denounced. This must not be understood, however, as if it had been really extinguished. By the decrees of the synod of Orange, the expressions of Augustine were accepted; but how far people were from really embracing his principles is shown by the controversies of Gottschalk, of the schoolmen and the monastic orders, of the reformers, of Arminius, of the Jesuits and the Jansenists, etc.

LIT. — The sources are found in the writings of CASSIANUS, PROSPER OF AQUITAINE, FAUSTUS OF REJI, FULGENTIUS OF RUSPE, and others.

SEMITIC LANGUAGES. I. NAME.—Up to the latter part of the last century, before Sanskrit was known to Europe, or attention had been directed to the Central and Eastern Asiatic tongues, or those of Africa (except Coptic), the title "Oriental languages" signified only Hebrew and its sister dialects: these alone, with the exception of Coptic, had been the object of scientific study. Up to this time, all study of non-classical languages was connected with the Bible; and it is to biblical students that we owe what was done in Hebrew, Arabic, Ethiopic, and the related tongues, for the preceding three hundred years. But when the linguistic circle began to widen, and attempts were made at classification, the need of special names for the different linguistic groups was felt; and, for the more general divisions, recourse was naturally had to the genealogies in the table of nations in Gen. x. The credit, if such it be, of having originated the name "Semitic" (from Noah's son Sem, or Shem) for the Hebrew group, is to be given either to Schlözer or to Eichhorn, — to which of the two is doubtful. The first known use of the term is in Schlözer's article on the Chaldeans, in Eichhorn's Repertorium, 8, 161 (1781), and he seems to claim the honor of its invention; but a similar claim is made by Eichhorn himself, without mention of Schlözer, in his Allgemeine Bibliothek, 6, 772 (1794). Eichhorn, however, appears to have been accepted as the author of the name: he is so said to be by Adelung (Mithridates, I. 300; 1806), from whose manner of speaking of it we may infer that it had not then come into general use. In a short while, however, it was everywhere adopted, and is now the recognized name of this group of languages. In Germany and France, and to some extent at least in England (so Coleridge, Table-Talk, 1827), the form "Semitic" was employed (after Septuagint and Latin Vulgate, and Luther's "Sem," instead of Hebrew "Shem"); while some English and American writers prefer the form "Shemitic," after the more accurate transliteration of the Hebrew. Between the two there is little to choose. The shorter form, now the more common one, is preferable to the other, because it is shorter, and in so far as it is farther removed from genealogical misconception. The once popular but unscientific three-fold division of all the languages of the world into Japhetic, Shemitic, and Hamitic, is now abandoned by scholars. "Shemitic" is misleading, in so far as it appears to restrict itself to the languages spoken by the peoples mentioned in the table of nations as descendants of Shem; while it in fact includes dialects, as the Phœnician and Philistine, which are assigned in the table to Ham. The form "Semitic" (in English, but not in German and French), as farther removed than "Shemitic" from "Shem," may, perhaps, be more easily treated as in itself meaningless, and made to accept such meaning as science may give it. On the other hand, as meaningless, it is felt by some to be objectionable; and other names, expressing a geographical, or ethnical, or linguistic differentiation of the languages in question, have been sought, e.g., Western Asiatic, Arabian, Syro-Arabian: but none proposed have been definite and euphonic enough to gain general approbation, and it is likely that "Semitic" will retain its place for the present. If a new name is to be adopted, some such term as "Trilateral" would be the most appropriate; since triliterality of stems is the most striking characteristic of this family of languages, and is found in no other family.

II. TERRITORY.—In ancient times (c. B.C. 1000) the Semites occupied as their proper territory the south-western corner of Asia; their boundaries, generally stated, being, — on the east, the mountain range (modern Kurdish) running about forty miles east of the Tigris River, and the Persian Gulf; on the south, the Indian Ocean; on the west, the Red Sea, Egypt, the Mediterranean Sea, and Cilicia; and, on the north, the Taurus or the Masius Mountains. The north and east lines are uncertain, from the absence of full data in the early Assyrian records. Not long before the beginning of our era, Semitic emigrants from Southern Arabia crossed the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb, and occupied the part of Africa lying just south of Egypt, their territory being about that of the modern Abessinia: these were the Geez ("emigrants," "freemen"), or Semitic Ethiopians. The main Semitic region thus lay between the tenth and thirty-eighth degrees of north latitude and the forty-fourth and sixtieth degrees of east longitude, with an area of over a million square miles. Semitic colonies established themselves early in Egypt (Phœnicians in the Delta, and perhaps the Hyksos), and on the north coast of Africa (Carthage and other cities) and the south coast of France (Marseilles) and Spain, but probably not in Asia Minor or in Greece. In modern times, Syrian Semites are found in Kurdistan, as far east as the western shore of Lake Urmi (lat. 37° 30' N.; long. 45° 30' E.); but it is doubtful whether this region was Semitic before the beginning of our era. A large part of the Semitic territory was desert. Only those portions which skirt the banks of rivers and the shores of seas were occupied by settled populations; the desert was traversed by tribes of nomads, whose life was largely predatory. Semitic speech is interesting, not from the size of the territory and population it represents, but from the controlling influence it has exerted on human history through its religious ideas.

The original seat of the Semites is unknown. There must have been a primitive Semitic race and a primitive Semitic language, which existed before the historical Semitic peoples and dialects had taken shape; but of this primitive race we can say no more than that it goes back to a remote antiquity; since of one of its daughters, the Babylonian people, there are traces in the fourth millennium B.C. It has been attempted to determine the habitat of the Semites, before they broke up into separate nations, from their traditions, and from the vocabulary of the primitive tongue made out by a comparison of the existing dialects; but no trustworthy result has been reached. The oldest accounts say nothing definite. In Gen. xi. 2, for example, we have the statement that the whole body of the descendants of Noah journeyed "eastward" (so מִקְרִים is to be rendered), that is, toward the Tigris-Euphrates region; but we are not told from what point they came, nor is there here any thing of a separate Semitic people. Again: in the same chapter, the assembled human race is said to have been scattered from the city Babel, without, however, any indication of the points to which the descendants of Noah's three sons severally went. At most, we may see here a dim feeling that the Semites had once lived together in the Tigris-Euphrates valley; but this might be referred to the fact that the Hebrews knew that they themselves had come from that region to Canaan. No other Semitic people has, so far as we know, any ancient tradition on this point. The evidence from the primitive Semitic vocabulary is equally vague. Its terms for land, mountains, rivers, seas, metals, grains, fruits, and animals, do not allow us to fix on any particular spot in Western Asia as the locality where such terms must have originated. We are obliged, therefore, to reject the hypotheses which make the mountains of Armenia, or the lower Tigris-Euphrates valley, or the Arabian Desert, the cradle of the Semitic race, and to leave the question at present unsolved.

The Semitic territory was enclosed by that of great rival peoples, Indo-Europeans (Persians and Greeks) on the east and the west, and Egypt on the south. In ancient times, however, the language was very little affected by foreign influence, except at one point. According to the view now held by most Assyriologists, the Babylonian-Assyrians, conquering the non-Semitic Accadian-Sumerians, who preceded them as occupants of the Tigris-Euphrates valley, in adopting the civilization of the conquered, adopted a number of their words, some of which are found in Hebrew also, and in others of the dialects. Hebrew made a few loans in early times from the Egyptian, and at a later period, possibly from the Indian, and then from the Persian, Greek, and Latin; and the ecclesiastical Aramaic was naturally greatly affected by Greek and Latin. The loan-words are easily recognized, except those which come from the Accadian-Sumerian.

All the Semitic nationalities, except the Arabian and the Geez (Ethiopia), died out before the second century of our era. The Babylonian-Assyrian disappeared from history in the sixth century B.C., and their language survived only a few centuries. The Phœnicians lingered in Asia till the time of the Antonines, and their language in Africa (Carthage) till toward the fifth century of our era (mentioned by Augustine and Jerome). The Syrian Aramæans lost their independence in the eighth century B.C., but continued to exist, and their dialect revived in the second century A.D. as a Christian language; and the Jewish Aramaic continued for some centuries (up to the eleventh century A.D.) to be the spoken and literary tongue of the Palestinian and Babylonian Jews. The Jewish people, broken up by the Romans in the first century A.D., and scattered over the world, have carried Hebrew with them as a learned, artificial tongue. The Arabians did not appear as a nation till the sixth century. Geez proper died out about the sixth century A.D., remaining, however, as the ecclesiastical and learned language; and the nationality is still in existence.

III. Divisions.—The various Semitic dialects closely resemble one another, there being, for example, between no two of them such dissimilarity as exists between Greek and Latin; but the family is divided into two well-defined groups and several sub-groups, the difference between which, in vocabulary and forms, is considerably greater than that between any two members of the same group or sub-group. The relations of the dialects may be seen from the following table, which is designed to include all Semitic forms of speech that can lay claim to linguistic individuality, except a few modern jargons mentioned below.

I. NORTH SEMITIC.

1. Eastern.
  - a. Babylonian.
  - b. Assyrian.
2. Northern.
  - Aramaic.
    - a. East Aramaic.
      - a. Syriac (Dialect of Edessa).
      - β. Mandaean.
      - γ. Nabathean.
    - b. West Aramaic.
      - a. Samaritan.
      - β. Jewish Aramaic (Daniel, Ezra, Targums, Talmud).
      - γ. Palmyrene.
      - δ. Egyptian Aramaic.
3. Western.
  - a. Phœnician.
    - Old Phœnician.
    - Late Phœnician (Punic).
  - b. Hebrew.
  - c. Moabitish and other Canaanitish dialects.

II. SOUTH SEMITIC.

1. Northern.
  - Arabic.
2. Southern.
  - a. Sabæan, or Himyaritic.
    - Mahri.
    - Hakili (Ehkili).
  - β. Geez, or Ethiopic.
    - a. Old Geez.
    - β. Tigre.
    - γ. Tigrîna.
    - δ. Amharic.
    - ε. Harari.

Of these the following are now spoken: (1) Aramaic, by the Nestorian and Jacobite Christians in Upper Mesopotamia, near Mosul, thence eastward to the western shore of Lake Urmi, and northward in the Kurdish Mountains (Nöldeke, Neusyr. Gram. Einleitung); and by the remnant of the Mandeans in Lower Mesopotamia (Nöldeke, Mand. Gram. Einleitung). (2) Arabic is the only Semitic dialect that has now any real life. It is spoken in various sub-dialects,—by the Bedawin of the Arabian Desert; in Egypt, and, as ecclesiastical language, in Turkey; in the Magreb (north coast of Africa); in Syria; in Malta, where the vernacular is a strange mixture, with Arabic as its basis, but many Italian and other words; on the coast of Malabar (the Mapuli jargon). The Mosarabic, a Spanish-Arabic jargon formerly spoken in the south of Spain, became extinct in the last century. (3) Geez: the four dialects, Tigre, Tigrîna, Amharic, Harari, are still spoken in Abessinia. (4) Hebrew is studied by the Jews as a sacred language, and by a few of them, chiefly the older orthodox bodies in Germany and Austria, is to some extent written and spoken. This spoken language contains a large admixture of modern European terms. The literary Hebrew of to-day occupies about the same position among the Jews as Latin among us.

Of languages which have been strongly affected by Semitic tongues may be mentioned the Iranian Huzvaresh, or Pahlavi (the language of the Bundeshesh), which is greatly Aramaized; the Iranian Persian, whose vocabulary is largely Arabic, and even its syntax appears to have been somewhat Semitized; the Indian Hindustani, which, developed under Moslem influence, also contains a large number of Arabic words; and the Turkish, especially the literary and learned language of Constantinople, which in like manner, and for the same reason, has a large infusion of Arabic.

IV. CHARACTERISTICS. — These may be divided into formal (grammar), material (vocabulary), and stylistic (rhetoric and thought). (1) Grammar. The Semitic phonetic system has a marked individuality. It is probable that the original Semitic alphabet was nearly identical with that of the classical Arabic, containing six gutturals (Alef, Ha, Ha, Ha, Ayin, Gayin), five uvulars (Kaf, Ta, Za, Sad, Dad), two palatals (Kaf, Gam), two linguo-dentals (Ta, Dal), two labials (Pa, Ba), six liquids (Ra, Ya, Lam, Waw, and the nasals Mim, Nun), three sibilants (Sin, Sin, Zayin), and perhaps six spirants (Kaf, Gam, Ta, Dal, Pa, Ba). No existing dialect has all these letters, but there are traces of most of them in all. Thus, comparison of Assyrian and Arabic makes it probable that the former contained all these h-sounds (ha, ha, ha), though only one of them (ha) is now found in it. Hebrew (Septuagint transliteration) seems to have possessed Gayin, as well as Ayin; the South Semitic group shows all the uvulars, and the Hebrew all the spirants. It may be, however, that the parent Semitic speech had fewer uvulars and spirants, and that the Southern group developed the former, and the Northern the latter. It is doubtful whether Hebrew Samek and Sin represent two different sounds. It is likely, also, that not all the sounds above mentioned are original, i.e., some of them may be merely modifications of earlier and simpler sounds; but we are concerned here only with the consonantal material possessed by the primitive Semitic tongue, and not with the material out of which its alphabet may have been formed. The Semitic alphabet is thus seen to be characterized by fulness of guttural, uvular, and spirant consonants. In the several dialects, the movement has been towards a diminution of the number of gutturals and uvulars; namely, by changing these into similar letters pronounced farther forward in the mouth. Assyrian, Galilean Jewish Aramaic, and Mandaean threw off the most of the gutturals; modern Arabic has diminished the number of its uvulars; and Geez, of its uvulars and gutturals. This is a tendency, observable in all languages, to bring forward the consonants, and thus facilitate their pronunciation. — The vowel material of the primitive Semitic was simple, consisting, probably, of the three vowels, a, i, u, with the corresponding long a, i, u. These have been variously modified in the different dialects. Assyrian has ē; Aramaic, ē, ō; Hebrew, ā, ē, ē, ō, ō; modern Arabic, ē, ē, ā (aw), ō; Geez, ē, ē, ō. — Morphologically, the Semitic languages belong to the class called inflecting, standing in this respect alongside of the Indo-European. Their most marked peculiarity is their trilateralism: most stems consist of three consonants, on which, by prefixes, affixes, and internal vowel-changes, all derived forms are made. The noun has gender (masculine and feminine), number, case. The verb has gender, number, person, but properly no distinction of tense (in the sense of time), instead of which there are two forms which denote respectively completedness and ingressiveness of action. The notions of reflection, intensity, causation, are expressed by derived verbal stems made by prefixes and infixes. — The Semitic syntax is marked by great simplicity of articulation. The different clauses of the sentence are, for the most part, connected by the most general word “and;” there is little or no inversion and transposition for rhetorical effect; and there are no elaborate periods. The structure is commonly and properly described as monumental or lapidary. The most striking special peculiarity of the syntax is the phonetic abridgment of the noun (status constructus) to show that it is defined by the following word or clause. The absence of compounds (except in proper names) is another marked feature, — an illustration of the isolating character of the thought. The whole conception of the sentence is detached, isolated, and picturesque. Of these general Semitic characteristics, the Hebrew and Assyrian, which first produced literatures, show the most, and the Aramaic and Arabic, whose literary life began late, the least. (2) Vocabulary. The Semitic word-material differs greatly according to the periods and the circumstances of the various peoples. The pre-Christian literary remains are very scanty. From the Israelites we have only a few prophetic discourses, historical books, and sacred hymns, and ethical works, together with several law-books, — no secular productions (unless the Song of Songs be so regarded); from the Assyrians, somewhat more, — royal and commercial inscriptions, geographical, astronomical, grammatical, and religious works, and fragments of epic and other poems; from the Phoenicians, a few short inscriptions; and from the others, nothing. The Hebrew literature is full in terms relating to religious feelings and acts, scanty in philosophical and artistic terms, and in names of things pertaining to common life: the Assyrian has more of the last, but is equally deficient in the first. In later times, however, the Aramaic (classical and Jewish), and the Arabic under Greek influence, created larger vocabularies, and developed some power of philosophical expression. From the nature of the national culture, these languages, though their vocabularies are sometimes (the Arabic especially) very large, do not satisfy the needs of western life. They multiply words for objects and acts which we do not care to particularize, and are deficient in terms for those which we wish to express with precision. (3) The above description of the vocabulary and syntax will serve to characterize the style and thought of the Semitic tongues. The highest artistic shape they have not, either in prose or in poetry. They do not readily lend themselves to philosophy proper or to art. But in the simple expression of emotion, and the condensation of practical wisdom into household words, they are not surpassed by the most highly developed Indo-European languages: in these respects the Bible has an acknowledged pre-eminence.

V. LITERARY PRODUCTS. — It will be sufficient here to mention briefly the general characteristics of the literature of the Semitic languages: for more particular accounts see the articles on the different languages. Of the different forms of poetry, the Semites have produced only the lyric; such as the Old-Testament Psalms, the Syrian hymns, and the Arabian Kasidas. What has sometimes been described as Semitic epos and drama is either not Semitic (as the Assyrian Izdubar epos, which was derived from a non-Semitic people; and the drama of the Jewish poet Ezekiel, which is an isolated imitation of the Greek), or not epos or drama (as the Book of Job, which is not a drama, but a religious argument carried on in the form of alternate speeches; and the Arabian romance of Antar, which is a string of loosely connected stories). The subjective character of the poetic thought is obvious: no action or phenomenon in outward nature or in human life is described for its own sake, but always as a part of the feeling of the writer. As poetry it takes high rank. The Hebrew lyrics are sonorous and rhythmical; the Arabian are ingenious and lively; the Syrian, however, are tame. The historical writing of the Semites has never attained a scientific or artistic form. It is either baldly annalistic (as parts of the Old-Testament Book of Kings, the Assyrian royal inscriptions, and the Arabic histories), or, when it attempts more connected presentation of the facts, it is subjective and pragmatic, arranging the historical facts so as to point a moral, or support a theory. In one department, prophetic discourse, the Semitic literature is unrivalled: there is nothing in any other family of languages like the prophetic oratory of the Old Testament, or the declamation of the Kuran. In other departments, as fiction and philosophy, the Semites have never been original, but always imitators (Thousand and One Nights, the Arabian philosophy. The Persian Arabic is, of course, not to be considered here.)

VI. RELATIONS TO OTHER FAMILIES OF LANGUAGES. — So far as our present knowledge goes, it is doubtful whether the Semitic family is genetically connected with any other in the world. Various attempts have been made to show a relationship between it and its neighbors, especially the Indo-European and the Egyptian. In respect to the former, the attempt may be said to be wholly unsuccessful. The case is somewhat different with the Egyptian, between whose personal pronouns and the Semitic there is a remarkable resemblance; though this isolated point of contact, considering the very great differences between the two families in other respects, gives an insecure basis for comparison. There is a similar resemblance between the structure of the Semitic verb and that of the Cushite group of languages (the Galla, Saho, and others, near Abessinia), but nothing definite. At most, we may conjecture an original Semitic-Hamitic family, out of which these two have grown; but in that case their separation took place so long ago, and their paths since that time have been so different, and the traces of kinship have been so far obliterated, that it is hard to see how any valuable results can be drawn from a comparison between them. One main obstacle in the comparison of Semitic words with others is the trilateralism of stems of the former; and it has therefore been attempted to reduce these to bilaterals, but hitherto with indifferent success. It need not be denied that this problem may hereafter be solved, and comparisons instituted between Semitic and other families, that may be of service to all.

SEMLER, Johann Salomo, the founder of historical criticism of the Bible; was b. at Saalfeld, Dec. 18, 1725; and d. at Halle, March 4, 1791. Brought up in a pietistic circle, he entered the university of Halle, 1743, and was much influenced by the lectures of Baumgarten. He devoured a large mass of books, and mentions only one original idea of that period. "Already at that time I had some intimations of the difference between theology and religion." In 1750 he became editor of the local newspaper of Saalfeld, 1751, professor of history at Altdorf, and six months later professor of theology at Halle, becoming Baumgarten's successor in 1757. He asserted the right to freedom of thought and investigation, and drew down upon himself the keenest criticism from orthodox circles. The Nova bibliotheca ecclesiastica called him an "impious man, and worse than the Jews" (homo impius et Judæis pejor). He was the principal professor at Halle, and his reputation among the students increased in proportion to the attacks from outside. This feeling changed, however, to some extent, in 1779, when his Beantwortung der Fragmente eines Ungenannten exposed him to the charge of being double-tongued. During the last ten years of his life he spent much time in the laboratory, and became an advocate of alchemy. His interest in the mysterious had increased; and the miraculous cures of Gassner, and the miraculous faith of Lavater were the occasion for him to appear in the Berlin Monatsschrift (1787) as an advocate of the possibility of miracles. Semler introduced new views upon the canon. The opinion which had prevailed up to that time was, that the books of the Bible constituted one "homogeneous whole," all parts of which are equally inspired. To refute this opinion is the purpose of the Abhandlung vom freien Gebrauch d. Kanons, 1771-75, 4 vols. He tried to prove that the books of the canon were brought together by accidental considerations, and not according to any fixed and well defined plan. He also showed that the text had many variations. The Scriptures were not even designed to be a norm of faith for all men. Was not the Old Testament written for the Jews? Did not Matthew write for Jews outside of Palestine? etc. Paul alone taught that Christianity was the universal religion, and the catholic epistles were intended to harmonize the Jewish and Pauline types of Christianity. Here was the germ of the fruitful principle of the later Tübingen critics. Semler is never done stating the thought that Christ and the apostles accommodated themselves in their language to the popular notions of their day and the ideas of the Old Testament. In his commentaries on Romans, John's Gospel, the Epistles to the Corinthians, etc., he attempts to found his exposition upon the Jewish notions of that day. Of course, those things in which the New-Testament writers accommodated themselves to the opinions of their day are not to be believed by us. Nevertheless, Semler, with all his faults, is the author of the present method, in explaining a biblical author, of taking into consideration his purpose in writing and the historical environment. He reduced the difference between Christianity and natural religion to a minimum, but his Christian consciousness always insisted upon this difference. He sang Christian hymns, prayed with his wife, and they pledged one another to follow God only, and his commandments. "No one knows," he said, "what I feel when I think of God's goodness to me." In the department of church history Semler did not do as much as in that of biblical criticism. But he became the father of the history of Christian doctrine by his restless scepticism, which led to the minute investigation and clearing-up of many points. On the history of the first Christian centuries he published Selecta capita hist. eccles., Commentarii hist. de antiquo christianorum statu, etc. He issued in all a hundred and seventy-one publications, only two of which reached a second edition. Baur, after acknowledging the value of Semler's investigations, complains that he had no power of grouping or elaborating his theories. His work consisted only in a variety of disconnected results and truths. But, as Reuss says, it belonged to Semler to speak the magic word which emancipated theology from the fetters of tradition. Though piously inclined, he gave the traditional views a deadly wound. But he was neither the head of a school nor the prophet of the future. See SEMLER: Autobiography, 1781; EICHMORN: Leben Semler's, in his Bibliothek, v.; H. SCHMID: D. Theologie Semlers, 1858; THOLUCK: Vermischte Schriften, ii. 39. THOLUCK.

SENECA, Lucius Annæus, a distinguished philosopher and author of the first century of our era; [the son of a rhetorician; was b. in Corduba, Spain, about 8 B.C.; d. by suicide 65 A.D. Young Seneca was trained in his father's art, but subsequently forsook rhetoric for philosophy. After travelling in Greece, he began to practise as an orator at Rome, and achieved forensic success. On a charge of adulterous connection with Julia, daughter of Germanicus, he was banished to Corsica, where he lived for eight years, composing the De consolatione ad Helvium liber and De consolatione ad Polybium liber. On the marriage of Agrippina to Claudius, he was recalled, and made tutor of the future emperor, Nero. During his incumbency he amassed great wealth, which became the occasion of his ruin. Looked upon with suspicion by Nero, he retired from the court; and, being accused with having had a share in the conspiracy of Piso, he received an order from the emperor to commit suicide. He at once obeyed the order by opening his veins, and bleeding to death in a hot bath].

Seneca's relation to Christianity has excited much interest, and awakened much discussion. Jerome (De script. eccl., 12) speaks of letters which passed between Paul and Seneca, and says they were read by many (leguntur a pluribus). Augustine (Ep. ad Maced.) also refers to this correspondence. These are the only allusions to it during the first eight centuries, except the mention made in the apocryphal Acts of Paul and Peter, which go under the name of Linus of Rome. Seneca's name, however, is mentioned with respect, and his philosophical and religious opinions are occasionally referred to, as by Tertullian, Lactantius, and Beda, who look upon him as a heathen. The notice of Jerome is referred to for the first time in the Chronicle of Fredeph of Lisieux (d. 850), and frequently, after the twelfth century, by Honorius of Autun, Peter of Cluny, John of Salisbury, etc. These writers unanimously express the opinion that Seneca was a Christian, and that his correspondence with Paul is genuine. The critical spirits of the period of the Reformation called these judgments into question, especially Erasmus; and the correspondence was declared apocryphal. It would be difficult to find any one now who would deny this conclusion. Many collections have been made of the passages in Seneca's writings which seem to be Christian in tone. Among the latest and most elaborate is that of Amédée Fleury, in his monograph, S. Paul et Sénèque, recherches sur les rapports du philosophe avec l'apôtre et sur l'infiltration du christianisme naissant à travers le paganisme, 1853, 2 vols. Seneca's relation to Christianity has been exhaustively treated by Aubertin (Étude crit. sur les rapports supposés entre Sénèque et St. Paul, Paris, 1857), and F. C. Baur, in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschrift, 1-58. The latter considers, in his usually profound way, the fundamental ideas of both men. The correspondence between Paul and Seneca consists of eight letters of the latter and four of the former, and bears upon its surface the stamp of an unscientific fabrication. Christ is not the topic, but Castor and Pollux are referred to; and the writers deal more with social conventionalities than with the great ideas of religion and philosophy. But how did it come that Jerome and Augustine were both deceived? One explanation has been, that there was a genuine correspondence, of which this is the spurious imitation; and Seneca's promise in the ninth letter, to send to Paul his work, De copia verborum, is appealed to in confirmation of this theory. The more rational explanation is, that it was a forgery, and as such the outgrowth of the opinion that friendly relations subsisted between the apostle and the philosopher. This opinion was based upon those passages of the New Testament which speak of Paul's residence at Rome (Acts xxviii. 30; Phil. i. 13; 2 Tim. iv. 17), which would have afforded them opportunity to meet, and his acquaintance with Seneca's brother Gallio (Acts xviii. 12-qq.). These passages are, however, so indefinite, that no one would have hit upon the idea of an acquaintance between Paul and Seneca but for other considerations which seemed to indicate that he had approached Christianity. The reason for such approach was derived from his own writings; and, if we pass by the exaggerated attempts to extract distinctively Christian ideas, we cannot overlook the peculiar coloring which stoicism gets in them. We mention here two of Seneca's characteristics. — his practical tone and the tinge of mysticism with which his thinking is colored. Nor can we forget his frequent confession of universal error and estrangement, his references to a future life, etc. Such ideas as these do not, however, necessarily indicate that Seneca had come under the influence of Christianity. His thought had a religious vein: but as a whole, as well as in minor details, his writings stand opposed to the Christian system; and the points wherein they seem to approach it belong to all religions. Seneca knows nothing either of the Judaistic type of Christianity, or of Christ as its Alpha and Omega. Without speaking of the specific Christian conceptions of revelation, sin, and law, Seneca stands on other than Christian ground. The stoic is himself the source of truth and his own duty. There is, however, a Christian glimmer, the moonlight of Christianity, diffused over his philosophy. But he is not the dim reflection of a new light which he has appropriated, but the faint dawn on the obscure horizon of the pre-Christian world, announcing the sun, which has already begun to scatter his light across valley and on mountain. The fine ideas of Roman stoicism were the buds which only the sun of the gospel could develop into beauty and perfection, but which, left alone, would never have produced rich fruits.

SENNACHERIB (Heb., סַנְחַרִּיב; LXX., Σενναχεριμ; Assyr., Sin-ah-er-ba, = "Sin [the moon-god] multiplied brothers"), king of Assyria B.C. 705-681, is mentioned in the following passages of the Bible: 2 Kings xviii. 13-xix. 37 = Isa. xxxvi. 1-xxxvii. 38; 2 Chron. xxxii. 1-22. From the Assyrian monuments we have tolerably full accounts of his reign. He was the son and successor of Sargon (see the art.), and ascended the throne on the 12th of Ab (i.e., July), B.C. 705. His first military expedition was directed against Babylonia and the irrepressible Merodach-baladan (see the art.). This enterprising prince, whom Sargon had vanquished in 710-709, seized the opportunity of Sargon's death to re-assert his claims to Babylon. But Sennacherib's campaign of 701 resulted in driving him into the remote parts of Southern Babylonia. The years immediately following were occupied by the Assyrian king in composing the affairs of Babylonia, where he established a ruler named Belibus (703), and in chastising various allies of Merodach-baladan. In B.C. 701 fell his great western campaign, which is related from the Hebrew standpoint in the passages named above. The death of Sargon had seemed to the Phœnician, Judæan, and Philistian cities, also, to offer an opportunity for throwing off the hated Assyrian yoke. That Merodach-baladan sought to make alliances in the West, his embassy to Hezekiah proves; but his own defeat was so speedy, that the revolt of the western cities was useless for him. Sennacherib merely waited until his work of re-conquest in Babylonia seemed sufficiently assured, and then, as his third campaign, marched to the West. Following the usual route of the Assyrian armies, he appeared first before Sidon, whose king, Elulaus, ventured no opposition, but fled to Cyprus. The Phœnician cities, those of Philistia as far as Ashdod, and the kings of Ammon, Moab, and Edom, submitted to Sennacherib forthwith. Gaza also seems to have been friendly to him. Ascalon and Ekron were more obstinate. The king of Ascalon was therefore seized, and with his family carried away prisoner. The case of Ekron was peculiar. Padi, its king, was favorable to Sennacherib; but the aristocracy and people had determined on revolt from Assyria, and, having overpowered Padi, sent him in chains to Hezekiah for safe-keeping. It may have been the report of this act, reaching Sennacherib on his southward march, which induced him to send off a detachment of troops into the land of Judah. This detachment devastated Judah, and captured forty-six Judæan cities (2 Kings xviii. 13 = Isa. xxxvi. 1; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 1). As a result of this, Hezekiah sent tribute to Sennacherib, who in the mean time had reached Lachish, and taken possession of that city (cf. 2 Kings xviii. 14-16). Probably it was at the same time that Hezekiah surrendered Padi, as the inscriptions declare that he did. But Sennacherib demanded more than this from the Judaean king. He had taken up his position at Lachish with the expectation of a battle against a most formidable enemy, namely, Egypt, which had joined the league against Assyria, and whose army, although too late to protect most of its allies, was on the way to meet Sennacherib. It was most important, therefore, to the Assyrian king that he should be secure in the rear. An expedition, under his Tartan (Assyr., turtanu, "general-in-chief"), was accordingly despatched against Jerusalem; and the Rab-shakeh (Assyr., rab-shak, "chief captain"), acting, no doubt, under orders from his superior, used every means of persuasion and threat, by word of mouth and by letter, to gain possession of the city (2 Kings xviii. 17-35 = Isa. xxxvi. 2-20; 2 Kings xix. 9-13 = Isa. xxxvii. 9-13; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 9-19). This demand, so formidably backed, produced a great effect upon people and king (cf. 2 Kings xviii. 26, 37 xix. 4 = Isa. xxxvi. 11, 22 xxxvii. 4; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 18); but faith in Jehovah, stimulated by the exhortations of Isaiah, who had been a sturdy opponent of the Egyptian alliance (see, e.g., Isa. xxxi., xxxi.), and yet believed in the certainty of a deliverance from the enemy at their doors, sustained the hearts of those within the city, and they did not yield (2 Kings xix. 5-7, 14-34 = Isa. xxxvii. 5-7, 11-35; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 20 and 2-8). With rebellious Ekron on one flank, and obstinate Jerusalem on the other, Sennacherib felt that he was too far south to fight the Egyptians with safety; and he withdrew to the neighborhood of Eltekeh, where the expected battle took place. The Assyrian inscriptions claim the victory for Sennacherib; but the success was, at all events, not decisive enough to encourage him to follow it up. He contented himself with taking possession of the neighboring cities of Eltekeh and Timnath, and visiting the unfortunate Ekronites with condign punishment. He put to death the leaders of the revolt against Padi, and took many of the citizens to swell his train of prisoners. Padi himself he re-instated as vassal-prince upon the throne of Ekron.

Sennacherib's return to Assyria was immediately brought about, according to the biblical account, by the smiting of his host in a night at the hands of the angel of Jehovah (2 Kings xix. 35, 36 = Isa. xxxvii. 36, 37; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 31). The probable interpretation of this is, that a pestilence broke out in the Assyrian camp, and led to the abandonment of further operations in the West. The Egyptians told Herodotus (Herod., ii. 141) a story, improbable enough, according to which the god Hephaestus (Ptah) sent field-mice into Sennacherib's camp; and these devoured the quivers and the bows and the shield-handles of his warriors, so that the next morning they fled without weapons. This shows, at all events, that the Egyptians had a tradition to the effect that Sennacherib's host departed suddenly, and in consequence of a great misfortune in their camp, and to this extent confirms the biblical account.

One or two apparent discrepancies between the biblical narrative and Sennacherib's own account of his Palestinian expedition admit of explanation. The Bible speaks of Hezekiah's tribute as consisting of three hundred talents of silver and thirty talents of gold (2 Kings xviii. 14). The inscriptions, which likewise give thirty talents of gold, say eight hundred talents of silver. This is probably due to a difference in the standard used, the Babylonian talent being to the Palestinian as three to eight. Further: the inscriptions represent the tribute of Hezekiah as sent after the battle at Eltekeh, with the obvious design of obscuring the partial lack of success which had attended the Assyrians both in that battle and before Jerusalem, and of closing their account with the mention of material tokens of victory. That the inscriptions say nothing of any failure to reduce Jerusalem, and nothing of the destructive providence which caused the return to Assyria, is in keeping with the boastful tone which characterizes the records of Assyrian kings.

After this campaign we have no mention of Sennacherib's presence in the West (cf. "and dwelt at Nineveh," 2 Kings xix. 36; Isa. xxxvii. 37). He reigned twenty years longer, and was engaged in important campaigns and great public works. The fourth, sixth, and eighth campaigns were against Babylonia, where a new pretender, Suzub, divided his attention with Merodach-baladan, whose frequent failure did not daunt him. As a result of the fourth campaign, Sennacherib established his son Assurnadinsum (the Ἀσπανάδιον, whom Ptolemy assigns to B.C. 699) as viceroy of Babylonia. In the sixth campaign Suzub was again defeated, and brought captive to Nineveh; and in the eighth, which was evidently the fiercest struggle of all, Suzub again appeared in freedom, and in league with Nebosumiskun, son of Merodach-baladan, made a renewed attempt to throw off the Assyrian yoke, but finally succumbed. Other expeditions of Sennacherib took him to the eastward; and one of these was a not very successful campaign against Elam, whose king repeatedly appears as an ally of Merodach-baladan and Suzub.

But Sennacherib distinguished himself by his building as much as by his fighting. Early in his reign he pulled down the royal palace on the northern mound of Nineveh (modern Kuyunjik), and replaced it by a magnificent structure, even in its ruins the largest of the Assyrian palaces yet discovered. It is now known as the Southwest Palace of Kuyunjik. He erected a second palace on the southern mound of Nineveh (modern Nabi Yunus). He made a broad and splendid street through the city, and erected a bridge over the waters which protected the eastern gate, — the chief gate of the city, — through which the Assyrian kings and their armies often passed. He supplied the city with water by cutting at immense cost a canal from the high land near the city Kisiri, north-east from Nineveh, through which the waters of the Khoser were conducted to his capital, and provided for a constant supply by a system of feeders. In all these enterprises he employed vast numbers of captives as laborers. The quarries of the neighboring mountains furnished the stone that was needed, and timber and all costly things for the adornment of the palaces were brought from various conquered lands.

But Sennacherib was not permitted to end his days in peace. The prediction which Isaiah had uttered concerning him while he was still in Philitia (cf. 2 Kings xix. 7 with Isa. xxxvii. 7) came true after twenty years. He was murdered by two of his sons, whose names the Bible has preserved to us as Adrammelech and Sharezer (2 Kings xix. 37 = Isa. xxxvii. 38; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 21). Abydenus (Euseb.: Chron., I. 9) and Alexander Polyhistor (Euseb.: Chron., I. 5) also mention the murder of Sennacherib, but no account of it has yet been found in the Assyrian inscriptions. He was succeeded by his son, Esarhaddon.

SEPARATES, an American Calvinistic Methodist sect, composed of Whitefield's followers, which sprang up in 1750 under the name of "New Lights." They were, however, subsequently organized into separate societies by Rev. Shubal Stearns, and then they took the name "Separates," and then they took the name "Separates." Stearns became a Baptist in 1751, and many of the Separates followed him into that church; and the sect died out. "The distinctive doctrine of the sect was, that believers are guided by the immediate teachings of the Holy Spirit, such supernatural indications of the divine will being regarded by them as partaking of the nature of inspiration, and above, though not contrary to, reason." See BLUNT: Dictionary of Sects, s.v.; GARDNER: Faiths of the World, s.v.

SEPARATISM, in the ecclesiastical sense of the word, means the spirit of separation in matters of faith: therefore Separatists are those who separate themselves from the State Church in order to seek in conventicles and prayer-meetings the edification they do not derive from the public religious services. They are very numerous in Russia and Württemberg. See INSPIRED, PIETISM, RUSSIAN SECTS.

SEPHARVA'IM (Heb., סֶפְרַוַּיִם; LXX., Σεφαρβαίμ; Assy., Sippara, Sippara; Akkad., Zimbar, meaning unknown), a city of Northern Babylonia, is mentioned in the following passages of the Bible: 2 Kings xvii. 24, 31, xviii. 34 (Isa. xxxvi. 19), xix. 13 (Isa. xxxvii. 13). The last four passages name Sefharvaim among the cities conquered by the king of Assyria: the first two speak of it as one of the places from which colonists were transplanted into Samaria (see SARGON), whose idolatrous practices were continued in their new land (see below).

The site of Sefharvaim (Sippara) was discovered in 1881 by Hormuzd Rassam, who unearthed in the mounds now called Abu Habba the ruins of its famous sun-temple, with a bas-relief of the sun-god himself, and valuable inscriptions. Sippara lay a little to the west of a north and south line joining Babylon with Bagdad, and somewhat nearer the latter place, in lat. about 33° 4' 20" N.; long. about 44° 16' east from Greenwich. The Euphrates, which in the Assyrian inscriptions is repeatedly called "the river of Sippara," once flowed near it; but the present river-bed is several miles to the west. Sippara was an ancient and highly venerated seat of power and worship. It was sometimes called "Sippara of the Sun" (see 'Ἡλίου πόλις, Euseb., Præp. Evang. 9, 12, and Chron. I. 7). It appears to have been a double city, with two separate parts: this follows not only from the dual form of the Hebrew Sefharvaim, but also from the distinction which the inscriptions make between "Sippara of the Sun" and "Sippara of (the goddess) Anunit." One of these twin parts was perhaps identical with the old city Agade (Akkad (?), so George Smith), which was undoubtedly in the immediate neighborhood.

Sippara was connected with Babylonian mythology; for, according to Berossus (see Euseb., loc. cit.), Xisuthros, the Babylonian Noah, was directed by a god, before the flood, to deposit in Sippara the records of antiquity, and after the flood his companions were ordered by a heavenly voice to dig up the tablets deposited by Xisuthros at Sippara, which they accordingly did. The temple of the sun-god discovered by Rassam is of unknown antiquity. It was already venerable when it was restored by Sagašalti-Burias, a king who is believed to have lived about B.C. 1050. Tradition carried its origin many centuries farther back; and, indeed, an inscription of Nabonidus, the last Babylonian king, who reigned B.C. 555-538, makes the surprising statement, that, in exploring its walls and foundations, he came upon "the cylinder of Naram-Sin, son of Sargou, which for thirty-two hundred years no king going before me had seen." (See T. G. Pinches: Proceedings Soc. Bib. Arch., Nov. 7, 1882.) If this statement is accurate, then we have a Shemitic civilization (Naram-Sin is a Shemitic name) in Northern Babylonia nearly four thousand years before Christ. There is no reason to doubt that Nabonidus gave these figures in good faith, but there are several grounds for questioning their correctness. (1) It cannot be proved, and is not probable, that the chronological records, which in later times, it is true, were preserved with minuteness and care (cf. the Assyrian Eponym Canon), extended back to so remote an antiquity. (2) "Thirty-two hundred" looks like an approximate, not an exact statement. (3) This statement throws back Sargon I. and Naram-Sin (from both of whom we have inscriptions) so far as to leave an immense gap between them and the later Babylonian kings, — a gap which no materials at our disposal enable us to fill. (4) Berossus, although he assigns many thousands of years to the prehistoric kings, does not trace the actual history of Babylonia beyond about B.C. 2500. It seems, then, probable that Sippara, though a very ancient city, has at present no claim to such an age as Nabonidus assigns to its temple. (See further, F. Hommel: Semit. Völker u. Sprachen, i. pp. 487-489.)

In 2 Kings xvii. 31 we are told that the Sefharvites (Heb., סֶפְרַוַּיִם; LXX., Σεφαρβαίμ) burnt their sons with fire to Adrammelech and Anammelech, "gods of Sefharvaim." (The K'thiv gives ספרים אלה; and Lagarde, Libr. Vet. Test. Can. Pars Prior Græce, Göttingen, 1883, adopts for the LXX. the following reading: τῷ Ἀδραμλεχ θεῷ Σαφραεμ.) Neither of these gods is as yet found in connection with Sippara in the cuneiform inscriptions, and no satisfactory explanation of their mention in 2 Kings xvii. 31 has thus far been given.

SEQUENCE, The, or sequentia (from sequor, "I follow"), was so called because it formerly followed the Epistle, and preceded the Gospel, in the church service. At this point the deacon left the altar, and ascended to the rood-loft to sing the Gospel. The Alleluia of the "Gradual," which was sung meanwhile, was consequently too short to cover his transit; and the last syllable (ia) was therefore protracted into "thirty, forty, fifty, or even a hundred notes." This was known as a "run," "cadence," or neuma. It continued in this shape for about three hundred years. In 551 the abbey of Jumièges in Normandy was sacked by the barbarian Normans; and the monks fled, carrying their service-books with them. One arrived at the abbey of St. Gall, where was a celebrated school for church music, and brought thither a Gregorian antiphony in which words had been set to these otherwise meaningless notes of the neuma. The improvement was adopted at St. Gall. This is Dr. Pearson's version. But Dr. Neale maintains that Notker (Notkerus Felusio, to distinguish him from a younger person of the same name) was the true author. This man (called Balbulus, "the little stutterer") had once been at Jumièges, and had there debated with this very refugee monk the question whether words ought not to be given to these notes. It is said that the sound of a mill-wheel furnished him with the idea. Further, that, on the arrival of the refugee, the twenty-year-old debate had been resumed. In consequence, Notker (for whose personal characteristics see Mühlau: The Dark Ages) composed a sequence, or "prose" (prosa); that is to say, an unmetrical but rhythmic series of sentences. This he offered to Yso, the precentor. Upon emendation, it was adopted. There is no doubt that Notker deserves some credit; but the Te Deum laudamus and the Gloria in excelsis Deo, to name no other ancient hymns, are of this form. The famous sentence, "in the midst of life we are in death," etc. (Media vite in morte sumus, etc.), and which is found in the Episcopal Prayer-Book, is his composition. It was inspired by the Martinsbruck bridge-builders swinging down over the torrent. Dr. Pearson admits Notker's invention of these rhythmical proses; and the Laudes Deo concinat orbis universus, his first production, has been recently republished. His sequence of the Holy Spirit (Sancti Spiritus adsit nobis gratia) was in use throughout Europe. In these sequences the choir "acts like the chorus of a Greek play," maintaining the attention in default of the principal characters. In the seventeenth century the rood-lofts became organ-lofts to such an extent that sequences, not being required, were disused. In later days the word "sequence" was (incorrectly) applied as synonymous with "hymn." Thus Adam of St. Victor (d. 1192) is called a writer of "sequences," and the Dies Ire is sometimes similarly entitled. Unless this term be employed with reference to the music, it is confusing; for the "sequence" differs from the "hymn" in being rhythmical without regular metre, and in possessing no rhymes at all. For the high ritualistic significance of its construction, see Neale's Latin monograph prefixed to Daniel's Thesaurus, tom. v.

SER'APHIM (plural of Heb. seraph, "to burn"), beings seen by Isaiah, who alone mentions them (vi. 2–6), on either side of the throne of God. They each had six wings: two were spread, in token that instantly they were ready to go upon any errand; two covered the face, to indicate how unworthy they were to look upon their Lord; and two covered the feet, — an Oriental custom in the presence of royalty. They sang an antiphonal chant. One of them cleansed the prophet of his sins by touching his lips with a live coal from the altar before the Lord. The seraphim were manifestly quite different from the cherubim, for the latter had four wings and four faces; and from the angels, who have no wings. SERGIUS PAULUS. See PAUL.

SERGIUS is the name of several saints and martyrs of the Roman-Catholic Church. One of them, a native of Rome, was martyred at Rosaph in Syria, 290; and in his honor the Emperor Justinian I. built the city of Rosaph Sergiopolis. His day of commemoration is Oct. 7.

SERGIUS with the surname Confessor was a native of Constantinople, and lived in the first half of the ninth century. His book, De rebus in republica et ecclesia gestis, — a history of the image-controversies from Constantine Copronymus to Michael H. Balbus, — is lost; but under Leo Isauricus, or under Theophilus, he was imprisoned and exiled as an image-worshipper; and for that reason he is styled a confessor by the Greek Church, and commemorated on May 13.

SERGIUS is the name of four popes. — Sergius I. (687–701), b. at Antiochia, but educated at Palermo; refused to recognize the decrees of the Trullan Council, though his delegates had signed them. The emperor, Justinian II., proposed to compel obedience, and had already ordered the Pope to be transported to Constantinople, when he was himself deposed. Thus the Papal rejection of the Trullan Council remained unshaken, and became the starting-point of that contest between the Greek and the Latin churches which ended with their complete separation.—Sergius II. (844-847) was the first pope who had the courage to ask for no confirmation of his election and consecration by the emperor; and he succeeded in vindicating himself, though the Emperor Lothair, through his son Lewis and Bishop Drago, presented a formal protest in Rome.—Sergius III. (904-911), one of the basest characters ever placed on the Papal throne. He lived in open adultery with Marozia, who, besides other children, bore to him the later Pope John XI. See LUITPRAND: Antapodosis, in PERTZ: Mon. Germ. Hist., v.—Sergius IV. (1009-12). His true name was Bocca di Porco ("Swine-snout"); but he was ashamed of it, and on his accession he changed it for Sergius. After that time it became customary for the Popes to change their family names on their election. NEUDECKER.

SERPENT, Brazen, The. When the Israelites, in the fortieth year of their journey through the wilderness, after they had overcome and banished the Canaanites, turned again to the Red Sea to compass the land of Edom, they murmured against God and against Moses for want of water. To punish the people, God sent fiery serpents; and by their bite many died. This punishment leads the people not only to acknowledge their sin, but also to ask Moses to pray unto the Lord that he take away the serpents. Moses, therefore, at the divine command, makes a brazen serpent, hangs it on a pole, so that by looking toward it every one that had been bitten was cured (Num. xxi. 5 sq.). These fiery serpents are not to be understood as flying-serpents; but they were serpents which were called fiery either on account of their red, shining, fiery-like color, or on account of their inflammatory bite. Very striking indeed is the remedy which Jehovah gives here against the consequences of the serpents' bites, and different explanations have been tried. But we must bear this in mind, that not the way in which the brazen serpent was hung up, but the very fact that it was a serpent, and nothing else, which was made visible in a far distance, is of the utmost importance. The brazen serpent was to the Israelite a symbol of the punishment with which his sin, his murmuring, was visited by Jehovah. Since he that was bitten, in order to be cured, had to look toward the brazen image of the death-bringing serpent, he was cured only under the condition that he became conscious of that punishment which he had incurred by his sin, part of which he had already suffered in the bite of the serpent, and that he wished to be spared the last consequences, the death. By looking toward the brazen serpent, the Israelite was to be cured, but only on condition that he was reminded of his deserved punishment, and took it to heart. Remission and forgiveness of sin were only to follow after true repentance had been effected. This brazen serpent was still, in the time of Ezekiah, an object of idolatrous reverence among the Israelites (2 Kings xviii. 4), and the pious king had it destroyed with other images.

In the New Testament the brazen serpent is mentioned (John iii. 14, 15), where Jesus shows unto Nicodemus the necessary elements for seeing the kingdom of God,—first the subjective condition, the new birth (3-13); then the objective condition, through which the faith in the Son of man, as effected by the new birth, can bring life eternal (14 sq.). This latter condition consists in that the Son of man is lifted up like the serpent in the wilderness. Like the brazen serpent, he becomes an image of those punishments which man has incurred, and from which he asks to be delivered. Jesus had therefore to suffer the death of the cursed, which we had incurred, in order to relieve us from the curse. By looking toward him in faith, we are cured and saved, but not without being reminded at the same time of our own sins, for which he was crucified, and of the punishment which we have deserved. This is only one, and nothing else but one, side of the great work by which Jesus has effected our redemption.

SERVETUS, Michael (Miguel Serveto), b. at [Tudela in Spain, Sept. 29], 1511; burnt at the stake in Geneva, Oct. 27, 1553. He studied jurisprudence at Toulouse; entered the service of Father Quintana, the confessor of Charles the Fifth, and accompanied him in 1529 to Italy and Germany. The minute circumstances, however, of his earlier life, cannot be made out with certainty, as the explanations he gave before the court of Vienne often contradict those he gave before the court of Geneva. In 1530 he was at all events in Basel, and in the following year he published his De Trinitatis erroribus. While in Toulouse he began to study the Bible, and received a deep impression from it; but he was and always remained a self-taught man in the field of theology, without any true scientific training. He had, however, some talent for abstract speculation, and threw himself with ardent zeal on the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, sure that the development which the doctrine had found in the church was utterly wrong, and eager to turn the course of the Reformation in the direction of his own speculation. He addressed himself to Ecclampadius; and Ecclampadius was unable to convince him that his speculations, directed against the eternal divinity of Christ, and leaving the Holy Spirit almost entirely out of consideration, were obscure, contradictory to the Bible, and blasphemous. When the book appeared, it made a great sensation; but all the Reformers denounced it, and Butzer even declared from the pulpit that the author ought to be punished with death. On his return from Basel, Servetus was imprisoned in Lyons. His book was seized and burnt, and he was released only on condition of retracting; and indeed his next book (Dialogorum de Trini- tate libri ii., 1532) opens with a recantation; but he retracts only because he understands that what he formerly wrote on the subject was unripe and unintelligible; and after that kind of recantation he begins afresh. This second book, however, fell flat from the press.

Soon after, he left Lyons, and repaired, under the assumed name of De Villeneuve, to Paris, where he studied mathematics and medicine. In 1540 he settled as a physician at Vienne, on the invitation of Archbishop Paulmier; and he staid there for twelve years, enjoying the favor of his patron and the esteem of his co-citizens, engaged in various literary pursuits of a highly creditable character, and seemingly in perfect harmony with the Roman-Catholic Church around him. But he had not given up his antitrinitarian speculations, nor abandoned his hope of exercising a decisive influence on the course of the Reformation. Probably in order to ascertain how far he could hope to find a co-worker in the French-Reformed Church, he opened a correspondence with Calvin. At first Calvin answered calmly and with great composure: but, as the correspondence developed he felt deeply provoked; and, when Servetus asked him to procure him a safeguard for a visit to Geneva, Calvin refused, remarking in a letter to Farel, dated Feb. 13, 1546, "Si censeat, modo valeat mea auctoritas, vicum exire nunquam putat" ("If ever he enters the city, he shall not leave it living, if I can prevent it"). Servetus himself was aware of the danger of his enterprise; but in the excited state of mind in which he lived he was drawn onwards with irresistible force, and in the beginning of 1553 he published anonymously his principal work, Christianismi Restitutio. All the old objections to the doctrine of the Trinity are here repeated: and it is urged that the Bible and the ante-Nicene Fathers know nothing of such a doctrine, and that it is the principal reason why the Jews and Mohammedans have not been converted. The author of the book was soon found out, and his identity proved by means of papers delivered up by Calvin. Servetus was imprisoned at Vienne, and a process was instituted against him; but on April 7 he succeeded in escaping from his prison, well provided with money.

His plan was to go to Naples, where, as a Spaniard and a good physician, he would not find it difficult to live. But he tarried for nearly a month in Geneva; and just as he was about to leave the city he was recognized (Aug. 13), and imprisoned at the instance of Calvin, who appeared before the court as his formal accuser. The issue of the process was by no means certain, and some of the details of the proceedings are a little difficult to form a definite opinion of. On Oct. 26, however, the verdict was given,—death at the stake. Servetus was shaken to the very depths of his soul, and pleaded for pardon. But he absolutely refused to recant, and on the following day he was publicly burnt. The impression which the affair made at the time was very varied. Melancthon, Bullinger, and all the most prominent theologians of the Protestant Church, took the side of Calvin unconditionally. The Antitrinitarians, and all who in any way inclined towards the ideas of Servetus, were deeply provoked. The Roman Catholics exulted. Generally, however, the public disapproved of the proceedings of Calvin; and such a hail-storm of pamphlets, in verse and prose, representing his character and conduct in the most odious light, came pouring down upon him, that he found it necessary to publicly defend himself. His Declaration appeared in the beginning of 1554 in French, and shortly after in Latin: Refutatio. It was very severely criticised by one Vaticanus (Contra libellum Calvini), who, however, was no adherent of Servetus. A remarkable book on the question is the De hereticis, aut sicut persequendi . . . sententia (Magdeburg, 1554), probably by Castellio. It is a collection of all the most noteworthy opinions pronounced upon the question.

SERVIA. Modern Servia, which on March 6, 1882, resumed her place among the kingdoms of Europe, has an area of 20,850 square miles, and a population of about a million and three-fourths. Ancient Servia had a much greater area; and the number of the Servian-speaking people, including those living under Austrian rule, and in the provinces formerly subject to Turkey, is stated to be over seven millions. The Servian tribes received Christianity from the Eastern Church, early in their history; but it was only towards the end of the twelfth century that the energetic Grand Shupane, Nemanja, abolished the partly Romanized ritual which had come into use, and brought the Servian Church into full accord with that of the Eastern Empire.

The Latins having taken Constantinople, St. Sava, son of Nemanja, in 1217, crowned as king his brother Stephen, and in 1224 induced the humbled emperor and patriarch to make the Servian Church autocephalous, as a means of preserving it from Rome; St. Sava himself being the first independent archbishop. The key to the earlier church history of Servia is found in the attachment to the formulæ of the Eastern Church, joined to jealousy of the political power of the Eastern Empire. In 1347, when the great Stephen Dushan declared himself czar, the archbishop, as was natural in the Greek Church, where the secular and spiritual powers are so closely united, was declared patriarch, and his seat fixed at Ipek. The fatal battle of Kossova, in 1389, and the trampling of Servia under the Turks, did not interfere with the succession of the patriarchs of Ipek until near the middle of the seventeenth century; then the Porte, finding the patriarchate a centre of national feeling, interfered; and finally, in 1737, abolished it, and placed the church under Greek bishops from Constantinople, who were as much hated by the people as were the Turkish rulers. As the erection of the patriarchate under Stephen Dushan marks the highest point of Servian history, so its suppression marks the lowest. In 1810, when Kara George freed his country from the Turks, the archbishopric of Carlovitz, in Hungary, which represents the patriarchate of Ipek, was acknowledged as the head of the Servian Church. The Turks reconquered the country; and when Milosh Obrenovics by his efforts, from 1815 onward, in 1830 secured a Hatti-sheriff from the Porte, which erected Servia into an autonomous principality, paying tribute to the Porte, the Church was also allowed to elect her own bishops and metropolitan, paying tribute to the Patriarch at Constantinople. In 1838, when the seat of government was removed to Belgrade, the metropolitan of that city was acknowledged as the head of the Servian Church, although the Archbishop of Carlovitz urged his claims. The treaty of Berlin, in 1878, made the principality of Servia wholly independent, and the connection of the church with that of Constantinople ceased. The Liturgy of the Servian Church is in ancient Slavonic, which is said not to differ more from modern Servian than does the English of Chaucer from that of the present day. Servia has a good public system of education. The parish priests of Belgrade and the more populous parts of the country are men of education and intelligence; but the standard in the mountainous regions of the interior, in this respect, is not as high as it should be. Freedom of worship is allowed, although proselytizing from the Established Church is forbidden. The metropolitan of Belgrade has five suffragans, each of whom presides over a diocesan consistory. The entire Protestant, Roman-Catholic, and Jewish populations together numbered in 1871 less than seven thousand. The districts annexed in 1878 contained a Mohammedan population of seventy-five thousand.

SERVITES (Servi Beatorum Mariæ Virginis, "Servants of the Virgin Mary") is the name of a monastic order, which was formed in 1223, at Florence, on the day of the festival of the ascension of the Virgin (Aug. 15), by seven distinguished citizens, who retired to a secluded place (Villa Camartia) for the purpose of devoting themselves entirely to the worship of Mary. In 1236 they removed to Monte Senario; and in 1239 they adopted the rules of St. Augustine, and began to receive novices. The order was confirmed by Gregory IX. and Alexander IV.; and from Martin V. it obtained all the privileges of the mendicant orders, 1421. Among the celebrated men who have belonged to the order is Paolo Sarpi. There are also female Servites. See A. GIANIUS: Annales Ordinis Fratrum Servorum, Lucca, 1719; and PAULUS FLORENTINUS: Dialogus de origine Ordinis Servorum, in J. LAMIUS: Deliciae Eruditorum, Florence, 1736; SCHRÖCKH: Christlichen Kirchengeschichte, vol. xxvii., pp. 509 sqq. NEUDECKER.

SERVUS SERVORUM DEI ("Servant of the Servants of God") is the official formula with which the Pope signs his name. It was brought into technical official use by Gregory the Great (q. v.)

in imitation of Augustine, yet as a rebuke to the Patriarch John of Constantinople, who had the audacity to style himself "Œcumenical Patriarch."

SESSION, the lowest court in the Presbyterian Church, composed of the pastor and his elders. Before it, all candidates for admission to full communion come for examination, and by it all business relating to the government and practice of the congregation is transacted.

SESSION OF CHRIST, a theological term derived from the phrase that Christ is "seated at the right hand of God," setting forth the perpetual presence of the human nature in heaven.

SETHIANI. See GNOSTICISM, p. 881.

SETON (Mother), Elizabeth Ann (née Bayley), foundress of the Sisters of Charity in the United States; b. in New-York City, Aug. 28, 1774; d. at Emmittsburg, Md., Jan. 4, 1821. She married William Seton in her twentieth year. After his death (1803) she entered the Roman-Catholic Church, March 14, 1805. In order to support herself she taught school at Baltimore, 1806-08; but with her sisters-in-law, Harriet and Cecilia Seton, on the inheritance of eight thousand dollars from the Rev. Samuel Cooper, she opened a conventual establishment of the Sisters of Charity—they having taken the veil Jan. 1, 1809—at Emmittsburg, July 30, 1809. In 1812 the order had increased to twenty members, with Mother Seton as superior-general. At her death it numbered fifty. In 1814 the order took charge of an orphan-asylum in Philadelphia, and in 1817 was incorporated by the Legislature of Maryland. See her biography by WHITE, New York, 1853, and by ROBERT SETON, New York, 1869, 2 vols.

SEVEN, The Sacred Number. Among ancient nations, especially in the East, in India, China, Chaldaea, Egypt, Greece, we find that a symbolical significance is attached to the number seven, as a pre-eminently sacred number. According to the Indian doctrines, "man is the representative of the great seven-stringed world-lyre," the "symbol of cosmic harmony," the "makro-cosmic heptachord" (v. Bohlen: Das alte Indien, ii. 247). The Chinese distinguished seven material souls in man, together with three spiritual souls (Bitter: Asien, i. 199). The Egyptians worshipped the seven planets (Diodor. Sic., ii. 30); and Herodotus tells of their seven castes (ii. 64; cf. Uhlemann: Aegyptologie, ii. 59, 163). There were also the sacred "Heptads" of Greece and Rome; and hence the significance attached to Rome's seven hills, to the seven reeds in the pipe of Pan, the seven strings of the lyre of Helios. With the heathen, the number seven—which also includes the seven planets, the seven colors in the rainbow, the seven tones in music—had almost exclusive reference to natural relations, to the seven sacred divisions of time, which all nations seem to have recognized; and Ideler (Chronologie, i. 178, ii. 473) traces the universal division of time into periods of seven days to the phases of the moon, or the duration of each of the four divisions of the lunar month of twenty-eight days. In place of all such material relations, the ethical and religious significance of seven was alone recognized by the Hebrews. The Bible begins, in the Book of Genesis, with a seven, and ends, in the Apocalypse, with a series of sevens. The symbolical value of this number is not to be sought for, with Winer (Real-wörterbuch, ii. 715), in the ideas attached by the ancients to the seven planets, but in the seven days during which creation arose from chaos [and was pronounced to be "very good"], when God "rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made," when he blessed it and sanctified it as a day of rest for the creation also. With reference to this starting-point or sacred number—seven, or seven multiplied by seven—all the legal festivals were ordered. Thus the great festivals lasted seven days,—the passover [Exod. xii. 15], the feast of weeks [Exod. xxxiv. 22], the feast of tabernacles [Deut. xvi. 13]. Pentecost was seven weeks after the passover [Lev. xxiii. 15, 16]; each seventh year was "a sabbath of rest unto the land" [Lev. xxv. 4], and the jubilee year was the year after "seven times seven years" [Lev. xxv. 8-11]. The great day of atonement fell in the seventh month (Lev. xvi. 29, 30), as did the feasts of trumpets and of tabernacles [Num. xxix. 1, 12; and thus the seventh day is a sabbath, the seventh week a pentecost, the seventh year a sabbatical year, the seventh sabbatical year a jubilee]. Not only the legal festivals, but also other enactments, had reference to the sacred number seven. Thus seven days were required for the ceremonies of the consecration of priests; seven days for the interval to elapse between the occasion and removal of various kinds of legal uncleanness, as after childbirth, after contact with a corpse, etc.; seven times appointed for aspersion either of the blood of the victim (Lev. iv. 6, xvi. 14), or of the water of purification (xiv. 51; cf. 2 Kings v. 10, 14, ["go and wash in Jordan seven times, and thy flesh," etc.], and Gen. vii. 2, 3). Seven things were to be offered in sacrifice,—oxen, sheep, goats, pigeons, wheat, oil, wine; seven victims to be offered on any special occasion (Num. xxiii. 1, [14, 29]; 2 Chron. xv. 11, xvii. 11, xxix. 21; [Job xlii. 5]; cf. also Gen. xxxiii. 3, where Jacob bowed seven times, and 2 Kings vi. 38, concerning Solomon's temple, which was seven years in building); and especially at the ratification of a treaty, the notion of seven being embodied in the very term nish'ba, signifying "to swear," literally meaning to "do seven times" (Gen. xxi. 28; Deut. iv. 31; cf. Herod. iii. 8 for a similar custom among the Arabians). The same idea is farther carried out in the vessels, adjuncts, measurements, and arrangements of the tabernacle, in the seven arms of the candlestick [and its seven lamps (Exod. xxv. 31-37); the length of each curtain of the tabernacle, which was seven by four cubits (Exod. xxvi. 2)]; the number of the pillars of the tabernacle court, which was seven by four by two [Exod. xxvii. 10-15]. The number seven also appears in cases where the notion of satisfaction is required, as in reference to punishment for wrongs (Gen. iv. 15; Lev. xxvi. 18-28; Prov. vi. 3), or to forgiveness of them (Matt. xviii. 21). It is again mentioned, in a variety of passages (Isa. iv. 1, xi. 15, xxx. 26; Jer. xv. 9; Job v. 19; Matt. xii. 45, etc.), in a sense analogous to that of a "round number," but with the additional idea of sufficiency and completeness. To this also may be added the numerous instances in which persons or things are mentioned by sevens;

e.g., [the seven kine and the seven ears in Pharaoh's dream], the seven sons of Japhet, [the seven daughters of the priest of Midian], the seven daughters of Job, the seven children of Hannah, [the seven sons of Jesse], the seven sons of Josphat, the seven deacons (Acts vi. 5), the seven sons of Sceva, the seven disciples in John xxi. 2, and the seven times ten disciples (Luke x. 1), [the seven beatitudes], the seven petitions in the Lord's Prayer, the seven parables (Matt. xiii.), the miracle of the seven loaves, [the seven words from the cross], the seven times two generations in the pedigree of Jesus, the seven charismata in Rom. xii. 6-8, the seven characters of wisdom in Jas. iii. 17, the seven virtues in 2 Pet. i. 5-7. There are also the Heptads of the Apocalypse, such as are silently indicated, as in v. 12, vi. 16, vii. 12, xix. 18, xxi. 8, as well as such as are expressly indicated,—the seven churches (iii. 1 sq.), seals (v. 1 sq.), trumpets (viii. 2 sq.), thunders (x. 3, 4), vials (xvi. 1 sq.), and angels (xv. 1 sq.). As these apocalyptic sevens—the seven heads, horns, and crowns of the beast (xii. 3, xiii. 1, xvii. 7 sq.) not excluded—have their common divine archetype in the "seven spirits which are before the throne of God," or in the "seven spirits of God, sent forth into all the earth" (Rev. i. 4, iii. 1, iv. 5, v. 6), and which again have for their basis the sevenfold designation of the Spirit of God coming down on the Messiah (Isa. xi. 2), we are entitled to regard the seven as the signature of the Holy Spirit, or of that triune God who historically and judicially reveals himself in the Spirit. The significance of the seven in the last book of the Bible evidently looks backwards to that given to it in the first book. On the application of the number seven in mediæval art, science, liturgies, and mysticism, see OTTE: Handbuch der kirchlichen Kunstarchäologie des Mittelalters, p. 283; DE WETTE: Geschichte der christlichen Sittenlehre, i. and ii. passim; PIPER: Evangelisches Jahrbuch für 1856, pp. 76 sq.; DÜRSCH: Symbolik der christlichen Religion, ii. pp. 536 sq. SEVEN SLEEPERS OF EPHEBUS. See EPHEBUS, SEVEN SLEEPERS OF.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTISTS. I. Name.—In their early history in England this sect was known as the "Sabbatarian Baptists;" but, for the sake of greater definiteness, the General Conference in the United States changed it to its present form in 1818.

Origin.—The Seventh-Day Baptists as an ecclesiastical organization appear in England in the latter part of the sixteenth century. The lack of conformity to apostolic doctrine and church order on the part of the Established Church was the ground they alleged as the sufficient reason for separate organization. In formulating their doctrine and polity they undertook to follow the model of the Apostolic Church as nearly as circumstances would allow.

History.—Since the institution of the sabbath at the close of creation, and its formal pronouncement as a part of the Sinaitic code, it is believed that there has been an unbroken line of God-loving men who have kept the seventh day of the week as a sabbath, according to its original institution and enjoyment. None question that it was observed by Christ and his apostles, and by Christians generally during the apostolic period. It had no rival day in the Church until about the middle of the second century, when Sunday began to be observed as a festival day in honor of the resurrection, along with Wednesday, Friday, and numerous other festal days of the Latin Church, then beginning to drift upon the first great wave of its apostasy. This church made the sabbath day a fast-day, not without sinister motives looking to its suppression in favor of the festival Sunday; while the Greek or Eastern Church steadfastly observed it as a day of holy delight in the Lord. Controversy upon this subject began about the middle of the second century, and was kept up with a zeal amounting to bitterness for several centuries. In the Western Church the seventh day continued to be observed quite generally till the fifth century, and traces of it were noticeable in some parts of Europe much later. In Scotland and Ireland, as well as in England, the seventh day was regarded and observed as the sabbath in the eleventh century and later. In Skene's Celtic Scotland, p. 350, vol. 2, there is this statement: "There was no want of the veneration of Sunday, though they held that Saturday was properly the sabbath, on which they abstained from work." In the Oriental or Greek branch of the church the seventh day continues to be observed to this day.

There is not wanting evidence that an unbroken chain of observers of the seventh day was preserved, in the face of detraction and persecution, all through the dark ages, and that they appeared in the dawn of the Protestant Reformation, and were represented in that movement by a number of its prominent actors.

In the Abyssinian, Armenian, and Nestorian churches the seventh day has not yet been supplanted by the first day of the week. Consult GEDDES: History of the Church of Ethiopia, London, 1694; GOBAT: Three Years in Abyssinia, London, 2d ed., 1847; STANLEY: History of the Eastern Church, 1861.

As these sabbath-keepers were pressed by persecutions, they were compacted into several centres. Most prominent among these were societies in Bohemia, Transylvania, and Holland. From among these, under the lead of prominent and able dissenters from the Church of England, were gathered the "Sabbatarian Baptists" of England. This movement was accelerated as a re-action against the theory, that, while the Sinaitic sabbath law was still in full force, the first day of the week had been put in place of the seventh day by divine authority. This theory was first set forth by NICOLAS BOWN, in his Sabbathum veteris et novi testamenti: or the true doctrine of the Sabbath, held and practiced of the Church of God, both before, and under the law; and in the time of the Gospel, London, 1595, 2d ed. ("perused and enlarged"), 1606. See Neal, Harper ed., vol. i, p. 208.

During the English Reformation, several able and distinguished men came out of the Established Church, and took up the defence of the sabbath in the face of severe persecution, amounting, in a number of instances, to martyrdom, characterized by all the circumstances which had marked the dark ages. In 1630 Theophilus Brabourn wrote an able defence of the views of the Sabbatarian Baptists; and he was followed by James Oockford, the Stennets, Robert Cornthwait, and others.

Out of such agitation, and from such elements, were the Seventh-Day Baptist churches of England organized during the latter part of the sixteenth century, and fore part of the seventeenth. During that period eleven churches were formed in England. Three of these were in London.

The Mill-yard Church is still active, with a church-edifice, parsonage, and considerable money endowment. This church was gathered by John James, at a date not well settled, in consequence of loss of records by fire. This first pastor fell a victim to the wild spirit of intolerance abroad in the politico-ecclesiastical counsels of England, and was by authoritative mandate dragged from his pulpit during sabbath service, imprisoned, and at length beheaded, drawn, and quartered, and his head was set upon a pole opposite his chapel. There are now two churches in England, two in Holland, and one (missionary church) in Shanghai, China.

II. Seventh-Day Baptist Churches in America. In 1664 Stephen Mumford came from one of the English churches, and organized the first Seventh-Day Baptist Church in America, in Newport, R.I., in 1671. From this church others soon grew up, and were pushed out into Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, and farther west. Another centre was established, about 1700, near Philadelphia, Penn., by Rev. Abel Noble, a minister of large ability, from England. Five churches were formed there, drawing largely for adherents from the Keithian Baptists. From these, other churches were formed, in South Carolina, Georgia, and in the western part of Pennsylvania, and still farther west. A third centre was established at Piscataway, N.J., in 1705, where there is still a flourishing church. From these three radial points the churches have spread westward with the general tide of emigration, until there are now flourishing churches in no less than sixteen States, with an aggregate membership of about nine thousand.

Church Polity.—This is strictly congregational. The annual conference has simply the power of an advisory council, and is composed of two delegates from each church, with an additional delegate for every twenty-five members. There are five associations, which sustain the same relation to the churches composing them as the conference does to all the churches. The associations may be represented by delegates in the conference, but with no power to vote as association in that body.

Doctrines.—The Seventh-Day Baptists believe in the general doctrines of salvation held by the evangelical churches, and differ from the tenets of the Baptists generally only in regard to the sabbath.

They believe, and conscientiously regulate their practice accordingly, that the seventh day of the week is the sabbath of the Lord, and that this, at its institution in Eden, and promulgation as part of the Sinaitic code, was made binding upon all men in all times; that, in the nature of its relations to God and to man, it is irrevocable.

In the terms of its constitution and in the reasons for its enactment it is inseparably connected with the seventh or last day of the week, and that any attempt to connect the sabbath law and sabbath obligation with any one of the other days of the week is illogical, and in its tendency destructive of the whole sabbatic institution.

That the change of the day of the sabbath to Sunday has no warrant in the Scriptures, is only a human device brought about by such questionable and unjustifiable means as to give it no claim either to the respect or acceptance of Christendom.

That the only stay to the wave of no-sabbathism now sweeping from Europe to America is in the impregnable bulwark of the true sabbath of the Fourth Commandment.

Education and Publication. — The Seventh-Day Baptists have two flourishing institutions of college grade, — one at Milton, Wis.; the other at Alfred Centre, N. Y. This latter has a university charter, and is vigorously carrying on business, mechanical, and theological departments, in addition to its academic and collegiate courses. Both sexes are admitted on equal terms to these colleges, and over seven hundred students were in attendance in them the last year.

The publishing-house of the denomination is also at Alfred Centre, from which, besides a large number of tracts and books, it issues its weekly organ, the Sabbath Recorder, an eight-page paper of good size, ably edited, and executed in the best style of the art. A monthly, The Outlook, has an issue of over fifty thousand copies; and a finely illustrated sabbath-school paper, Our Sabbath Visitor, is issued weekly.

Missions. — For many years the denomination has had a mission in Shanghai, China, where it has accumulated considerable property, which it is now enlarging; and the mission force is to be enlarged at once by the addition of a female medical missionary.

General Reform. — Upon the questions of reform which have agitated the public mind, such as antislavery, temperance, religious liberty, sabbath-observance, etc., this people have always maintained a consistent and radical position, favorable to the reforms sought.

General Repute. — Baird, in his Religion in America (New York, 1856), says of them, "The population under their instruction and influence is reckoned at forty thousand. Their churches are widely scattered through the States, and altogether they are a very worthy people."

Arnold's History of Rhode Island, vol. ii. p. 86, has the following: "The Rev. Mr. Price, missionary at Westerly, expresses his astonishment at the kind treatment he received at their hands, and that he found them most charitable and catholic, whom he thought to have found the most stiff and prejudiced." With "charity for all, and malice towards none," they claim their place and equal rights among other religious societies, nor do they find occasion to

"Spurn the badges their fathers have worn, Nor beg the world's pardon for having been born."

SEVERIANUS, Bishop of Gabala in Syria, was a friend of Chrysostom, and his representative in Constantinople during his absence in Asia Minor. But he used the opportunity to intrigue against Chrysostom, and was driven out of the city by the people, though afterwards recalled by his patroness, Eudoxia. He was reconciled with Chrysostom, but continued to intrigue against him. Six sermons of his are found in Montfaucon's edition of the works of Chrysostom. In 1827 the Mekhitarists published in Venice some homilies by him.

SEVERINUS, St., the apostle of Noricum; b. in Italy in the beginning of the fifth century; d. at Faviana, a city on the Danube, near the present Pöchlarn, Jan. 8, 482. After a journey to the East, where he adopted a life of the severest asceticism, he returned to the West to devote himself to missionary work. He first visited Pannonia, but then settled in Noricum, a province of the Roman Empire occupying the present Austria, Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, Tyrol, and parts of Bavaria. The country, which was inhabited by a Celtic tribe, was conquered by the stepsons of Augustus, Tiberius and Drusus, 13 B.C. Many new cities were founded, excellent roads were made, numerous castles with Roman garrisons were built, agriculture was improved, and commerce flourished. Through their commercial and military connections with Italy and Rome the inhabitants of Noricum early became acquainted with Christianity, and after the law of Theodosius the Great, which in 392 prohibited all Pagan idolatry within the boundaries of the empire, Christianity was in fact the recognized religion of the country. Thus it can hardly be considered so very heavy a task which St. Severinus undertook when he settled at Faviana. His life by EUGIPPIUS, in WELSER, Op. Hist. et phil., Nuremb., 1672, in Act. Sanct., Jan. 8, [ed. by H. Sauppe, Berlin, 1878, 36 pp.], is full of fables. [See A. A. SEMBERA: Wien d. Wohnsitz u. Sterbeort d. heil. Severin, Wien, 1882.] G. H. KLIPPEL.

SEVERINUS (Pope, 638-640), the successor of Honorius I. The Monothelite controversy was just raging, and caused him many difficulties. He condemned the Ecthesis of the Emperor Heraclius, and thereby the whole Monothelite doctrine.

SEVERUS, the name of three persons. (1) The Rhetor, wrote in 386, on occasion of a fearful epidemic among the cattle, a carmen bucolicum, generally called De moribus boum ("On the death of the oxen"), or De virtute signi crucis domini ("On the virtue of the sign of the cross"), in which he tells us that the animals were saved from the plague by making a cross on their forehead. (2) Bishop of Mahon in the Island of Minorca, communicated in 418, by an encyclical letter, to the whole of Christendom that four hundred and fifty Jews had been converted and baptized on the intercession of Stephen, the first martyr, whose relics were deposited in the church of Mahon. The letter is found in BARONIUS: Ann. ad a. 418. (3) A Jacobite bishop of Egypt, who wrote in Arabic a history of the patriarchs of Alexandria, about 978.

SEVERUS, Alexander, b. at Arce, Oct. 1, 205; made Roman emperor March 11, 222; murdered at Mayence, March 19, 235. During his reign the Christians dared worship openly. He was a pantheistic hero-worshipper, and had busts of Abraham and Christian in his private chapel, with those of Orpheus and others.

SEVERUS, Septimius, b. at Leptis in Africa, April 11, 146; d. at York, Feb. 4, 211; became Roman emperor after the assassination of Pertinax in 193. He was a just but somewhat sombre character, not destitute of true religious feeling, but a mystic easily captivated by the fantastic practices of the Pagan religions. He had Christian servants in his household, defended the Christian senators against the fury of the Pagan mob, and allowed his eldest son to converse freely with the boys of Christian families. But during his campaigns in the East a great change took place in his feelings towards the Christians. The reason is not known; but he issued laws, which, by very severe penalties, prohibited conversions to Judaism and Christianity. From these laws the Pagan authorities took occasion to revive and enforce again older laws against the Christians, which, though not revoked, had fallen into oblivion; and persecutions broke out, especially in Africa and some parts of Asia Minor. The Christians seem, however, generally to have been of the opinion that those persecutions were not really intended by the emperor. See TERTULLIAN: Apolog., 37. G. H. KLIPPEL.

SEVERUS, Sulpicius, b. 363 in Gaul; d. at Marseilles in 410; was a distinguished rhetorician, and successful as a lawyer, but adopted a monastic life after the death of his wife, in 392, and settled with a few companions in some secluded place in Aquitaine. He was a great admirer of St. Martin of Tours, whom he visited several times, and whose life he wrote. He also wrote a Historia sacra, three dialogues on the monastic life, and some letters, which, however, are of no interest. His collected works were edited by HIERONYMUS DE PRATO, Verona, 1741, and reprinted in GALLANDI: Bibl. Patr., viii.

SEWALL, Samuel, jurist, b. at Bishopstoke, Eng., March 28, 1652; d. in Boston, Mass., Jan. 1, 1730. He was graduated at Harvard, 1671; studied divinity, and preached for a while, until by his marriage (Feb. 28, 1676) with Hannah Hull he got great wealth. He then turned his attention to law, was made judge (1692), and eventually (1718), chief justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts. He at first shared in the popular delusion concerning witchcraft (1692), and concurred in the condemnations; but on Jan. 14, 1697, his minister, Rev. Samuel Willard, read "a 'bill' before the congregation of the Old South Church, in which he acknowledged his own guilt, asked the pardon both of God and man, and deprecated the divine judgments for his sin. He contributed liberally to the spread of the gospel among the Indians, and in 1699 was chosen one of the commissioners of the Society in England for the Propagation of the Gospel in New England, and, soon after, their secretary and treasurer. His sympathy for African slaves prompted him, in 1700 to publish a tract entitled The selling of Joseph, in which he advocated their rights; it being his opinion that there would 'be no progress in gospel' until slavery was abolished. His benevolence and charity were great, and his house was a seat of hospitality." He wrote Phenomena, etc., a description of the New Heaven, Boston, 1697, 2d ed., 1727; and Prospects touching the accomplishment of prophecies, Boston, 1713. His Diary (1674-1729) was published by the Massachusetts Historical Society, 1878, 2 vols. See DRAKE: Dictionary of American Biography.

SEWELL, William, Friend; b. at Amsterdam, 1650; d. about 1725. His father was a surgeon; and he served his time as a weaver, yet acquired Greek, Latin, English, French, and High Dutch. He is known as the author of Hist. van de Opkomst, Aanwas, en Voortgang der Christenen, bekend by den naam van Quakers, ondermengd met de voornameste Staatsgeschiedenissen van dien tyd in Engeland voorgevallen, en met authentieke Stukken voorzien ("The history of the rise, increase, and progress, of the Christian people called Quakers"), Amsterdam, 1717, and then translated it himself into English, London, 1722, folio; 3d ed., 1795, 2 vols.; Philadelphia, 1855. One of his objects was to correct the "misrepresentations" in GERARD CROESE: Historia Quakeriana, Amst., 1695-1704, 3 books.

SEXAGESIMA, "the sixtieth," means the second Sunday before Lent, the next to Shrove Tuesday, as being about sixty days before Easter.

SEXTON, a contraction of "sacristan," a subordinate officer of the church, taking care of its vessels and vestment, attending the officiating clergy, etc.

SFONDRATI is the name of an Italian family of which several members have been intimately connected with the Church. — Francis Sfondrati, b. at Cremona, 1493; d. there July 31, 1550. He taught law in the universities of Padua, Pavia, Bologna, Rome, and Turin, and was much used in diplomatic negotiations by Duke Francis Sforza and Charles V. After the death of his wife he entered the service of the Church, and was by Paul III. made Bishop of Cremona, and a cardinal. He acted as mediator between the Pope and the emperor at the occasion of the Augsburg Interim. — Nicholas Sfondrati, son of the preceding, became Pope under the name of Gregory XIV.; which art. see. — Celestine Sfondrati, b. in Milan, 1649; d. in Rome, Sept. 4, 1696. He was educated in the abbey of St. Gall; taught theology, philosophy, and canon law in various places; and was elected prince-abbot of St. Gall in 1689, and made a cardinal in 1695. In the controversy between the papal see and the Gallican Church he wrote, in defence of the absolute supremacy of the Pope, Regule Sacerdotium (1684), Gallia cindicata (1687, often reprinted), Legatio Marchionis Lavardini (1688), etc. His Nodus prædestinationis, published in Rome, 1697, made a great sensation, as in many points it stood in open contradiction to the official system of doctrine recognized by the Church. The French bishops tried to have the book put on the Index, but did not succeed. NEUDECKER.

SHAFTESBURY. See DEISM, INFIDELITY.

SHAKERS. This appellation was given, in derision, to a religious body calling themselves "Believers in Christ's Second Appearing," because in their religious meetings, and under the inspirations of the Christ-spirit, they were sometimes led to shake, as a manifestation of hatred to the sins and elements of a wicked, worldly life. Perhaps the title is not inappropriate; as this people believe themselves to be the followers of Christ, the great shaker prophesied by Haggai (ii. 6, 7): "Yet once, it is a little while, and I will shake . . . all nations, and the desire of all nations shall come." The embryotic origin of this sect is found in the Revivalists of Dauphiné and Vivarais, France, about 1689. Some of these went to England about 1706. Offshoots from them formed a little society in England about 1717. For a time they were led by one James and Jane Wardley.

Ann Lee, the primary leader of the Shaker Church, was the daughter of John Lee of Manchester, Eng., and b. Feb. 28, 1736. In early childhood she was the subject of deep religious convictions of the great depravity of human nature, but eventually was married to Abraham Stanley, by whom she had four children, who all died in infancy. In 1758 she joined the society of James Wardley, and thenceforth lived a religious life. She now became the renewed subject of remarkable revelations of God, causing her intense sufferings of body and soul, resulting in purification of spirit, by which she found that protection from sin she had so much prayed for in her childhood. She and others of this house of faith were severely persecuted in England; and Ann, in 1770, was imprisoned in a manner to take her life by starvation. While in prison she received, as believed by her followers, a revelation of God relative to the cause of the sinful state of humanity and the means of redemption. She was thenceforth accepted by the society as their leader, and, by the character of her gifts, as the manifestation of the second appearing of Christ in his glory; not of Jesus, but of the baptism that crowned and anointed Jesus the Christ in his first appearing.

Ann Lee and many of her followers received gifts pointing them to North America as the "land of Immanuel" shadowed with wings, delineated by the prophet Isaiah (viii. 8). Accordingly, on May 19, 1774, Ann Lee and nine of her followers set sail for America, and landed in New York on the 6th of August following. One of this number, John Hocknell, purchased a lot in the wilderness of Niskayuna, about seven miles north-west of Albany, erected log buildings, and in 1776 Ann's little church gathered to this forest home. Three years thereafter, a remarkable revival of religion occurred at New Lebanon, Columbia County, N.Y.; and in 1780 many of those affected by this revival, and others from distant parts, visited Ann's little church, and embraced their testimony. Ann Lee died Sept. 8, 1781, aged forty-eight years.

The Shakers' first house of worship was built at New Lebanon aforesaid in 1785. The first gathering into a community analogous to the primitive church was in 1787. Their first written covenant of a full consecration to God of life, services, and treasure, was signed by the members in 1795. There are now (1883) seventeen societies in North America (none elsewhere), located as follows: "New Lebanon," Mount Lebanon, Columbia County, N.Y.; "Watervliet" Shakers, Albany County, N.Y.; "Soneya," Livingston County, N.Y.; "Hancock," West Pittsfield, Berkshire County, Mass.; "Harvard," Ayer, Middlesex County, Mass.; "Shirley Village" Shakers, Middlesex County, Mass.; "Enfield, Connecticut," Shaker Station, Hartford County, Conn.; "Canterbury," Shaker Village, Merrimack County, N.H.; "Enfield" Shakers, Grafton County, N.H.; "Alfred," York County, Me., Shakers; "New Gloucester," West Gloucester, Cumberland County, Me., Shakers; "Union Village," Shaker post-office, Warren County, O.; "North Union," Cleveland, Cuyahoga County, O., Shakers; "Watervliet, Ohio," Dayton, Montgomery County, O., Shakers; "White-water," Preston, Hamilton County, O., Shakers; "Pleasant Hill" Shakers, Mercer County, Ky.; "South Union," Logan County, Ky., Shakers. The entire Shaker order in America own about forty-five thousand acres of land. The number composing the communities fluctuates, so that no definite number can be appropriately stated. Some societies are fewer now than a quarter of a century ago; others number about the same; while some others have doubled in numbers during the past two years.

ORGANIZATION AND THEOLOGY.—Their societies are organized into families of both sexes and all ages, varying in numbers from a very few to a hundred and fifty or more. Their organization, formulas, and by-laws are anti-monastic, anti-Mormon, anti-Oneidan, anti-Nicolaitan. Each sex, including those once married, occupy separate apartments. Both sexes congregate for meals and meetings at the same time, and in one and the same hall. At table, except small parties, each sex is grouped by itself; the same order in meetings. They kneel in prayer before, and in thanks after, each meal, also on retiring to rest, and rising in the morning.

Worship-Meetings are generally held three or four times per week. Worship consists in singing, in solo and harmony, hymns, anthems, and improvised songs, called "gitt songs;" quick and slow marches, two abreast, in ranks and circles, sometimes timing with the hands to the measure, sometimes in solemn dances in ranks or circles, and occasionally interchangeably, but always each sex grouped by itself; also prayers, exhortations, and sermons by both sexes. Meetings are held for mental discipline, as reading and speaking; others, for learning new songs, and trainings in singing; also for social converse, called "Union Meetings."

Theology, Synopsis of.—1st, God, a spirit Being, a heavenly Father and heavenly Mother. 2d, Mediatorial intelligences reveal God's character and his truths to man. 3d, Jesus Christ was one of these; was not God, but the Son of God. 4th, By birth of Mary, Jesus was simply highly organized man. 5th, By baptism of the Christ-spirit he became the Christ. 6th, Of this Christ-spirit, not of Jesus, there was to be a second appearing. 7th, This was to be manifest in his glory—woman, the glory of man. 8th, In each of these dispensations its Church, while in unison with and in obedience to the Christ-spirit, represents the Christ of that dispensation: the former, the Bridegroom; the latter, the Bride. 9th, The Head of Christ's church is neither man nor woman in a genitive sense, but the Christ-spirit, and, possessed of this, either man or woman may teach and lead. 10th, Thus Jesus Christ (Jesus baptized) is the Son of God par excellence, the "Elder Brother" (Paul) of other sons of God, his true followers. In like manner we have daughters of God, females, baptized with the Christ-spirit. 11th, There are two creations, orders of humanity,—the old, instituted by generation through Adam, the sowing dispensation; the new, instituted by regeneration through Christ, the reaping, harvesting of the world; virgin celibacy.

its vis vitæ; Christ, "the Lord from heaven," "the quickening Spirit in both male and female, its organic media; and, so far as light now revealed, these may run parallel for all time. 12th, Redeemed man and woman, by baptism of and in obedience to the Christ-spirit, constitute the subjects of the new creation, the heavenly kingdom of God. 13th, Reject vicarious atonement. "My reward is with me, to give to every man according as his [own] work shall be" (Rev. xxii. 12). 14th, Reject carnal resurrection. The Christian resurrection is of the soul, from death by sin, to a life of righteousness. 15th, The day of judgment comes to any soul, when such soul, by confession and repentance of sin, comes to the Christ-life; or, having an offer, refuses the Christ-life. "Of myself [as Jesus] I judge no man." "As I [Jesus Christ] hear, I judge; and my judgment is just" (John v. 30). 16th, Election to salvation is of man's free will, when offered. "Whosoever will, let him come and partake of the waters of life freely" (Rev. xxii. 17). Election, choice of instruments for some specific part of the work in God's vineyard, because of constituted fitness, is preferred by superiors in the order of Heaven's anointing and choosing. Thus Jesus says, "I have chosen you." 17th, Probation extends to the spirit-world. Thus only can God be just. 18th, Physical death is not the gate to heaven nor hell: heaven is opened by good deeds: hell, by deeds evil. 19th, Heaven and hell are states of the soul, — the rewards of conduct and the awards of judgment by the Christ tribunal. 20th, The end of the world has come to every soul who is born of the Christ-spirit. 21st, Old and New Testament scriptures, inspiration, revelation, eternal life of soul, the gospel-crown prize, and Christian experiences — all teach spiritualism: therefore the Shakers are Spiritualists. 22d, All carnal warfare is of the world, and has no part nor place in Christ's church and kingdom.

Position to the State. — Opposed to war; neither aid nor abet it, unless by compulsion, and under protest; will not fight with carnal weapons, though death be the price of refusal. Loyal to all the demands of peaceful civil government. Pay all taxes promptly, the State being responsible for use and appropriation thereof. Have no part in politics. Accept no governmental offices but postmaster, road-commissioner, and school offices.

Polity of the Community. — A true Christian community, patterned in conformity to the Christ-spirit, is the order of the kingdom of heaven, the answer to Jesus' prayer, "Thy kingdom come on earth," etc. It is therefore a theocracy, of which the Christ-spirit is the leading authority, and is virtually the appointing power of the leaders of its society. By the perception, and in the wisdom and exercise of this spirit, not by a majority of votes, an order of ministry is appointed, consisting of two of each sex: these constitute the primary leading authority of the church. These nominate elders to lead the families in spiritual and social matters, and deacons to direct temporal business, generally two of each sex; they are confirmed as appointed by the general union and approval of the loyal covenant members, duly and publicly manifest. Two or more of each sex also are appointed as a board of trustees, to hold in trust the legal tenure of real estate, and keep and manage the personal property of the community. Other business-agents sometimes employed. The consecrators hold the property in usufruct: the consecratee is God.

By-Laws of the Community are instituted for direction and protection of members. These are originated by the ministry and elders, and apply to the conduct of the community temporally, socially, and spiritually. They permit the com-mingling of the sexes in companies of several persons, when needed, in temporal employment, social converse, and worshipful devotion, but debar all carnal associations, all private correspondence, verbal or written. No two individuals of opposite sex allowed to work together alone, ride out, or walk out together alone, or hold lengthy conversations together alone. Short and necessary errands permitted. The opposite sexes, in all cases, room separately, both members of the commune, and visitors sojourning among them. All persons, both old and young, have single beds.

Correspondence of Members, by letters, books, or papers, except business-letters by trustees and business-agents, is required to be open to the knowledge of the elders, and subject to their approbation. This is to prevent the intrusion of malfeasance, and the institution of cliques or private societies working against the community. Due regard is made to the feelings of novitiates. While in the communion of the saints all choose to dwell in the light, as God is light; and these compose that glorious galaxy of souls the revelator saw "standing on a sea of glass" (Rev. xv. 2). Nevertheless, espionage is rigorously discarded; and a liberal freedom of orderly and protective union and correspondence, both verbal and written, is encouraged and promoted. All good, moral, miscellaneous, religious, scientific, philosophic, historical, biographical, narrative, and literary books and periodicals are freely admitted.

LIT. — The society has of its own a limited literature, and several of its works are long since out of print. Those now most prominent in circulation are as follows. Testimony of Christ's First and Second Appearing, by BENJAMIN S. YOUNGS of Union Village, O., printed at Albany, N.Y., 1856. Dunlavy's Manifesto, by JOHN DUNLAVY of Pleasant Hill, Mercer County, Ky., New York, 1847. Millennial Church, by CALVIN GREENE and SETH Y. WELLS of New Lebanon, N.Y., Albany, 1848. Testimony of the First Witnesses (contemporary with Ann Lee), by SETH Y. WELLS of Mt. Lebanon, N.Y., Albany, 1827. Brief Exposition, etc. (pamphlet), by SETH Y. WELLS and CALVIN GREENE, 1830. Plain Evidences of the Church of Christ (pamphlet), by JOHN DUNLAVY of Kentucky, New York, 1834. Tests of Divine Inspiration, by F. W. EVANS, New Lebanon, N.Y., 1853. On Revelation, United Inheritance, and Second Appearing of Christ, by WILLIAM LEONARD of Harvard, Mass., 1853. Shaker Compendium, etc., by F. W. EVANS of New Lebanon, 1859. Ann Lee, the Founder of Shakerism, a reprint of fourth edition of Compendium, London, Eng. The Shaker Manifesto, a monthly periodical from 1871 to date, now printed at Canterbury, N.H. Shaker Theology, by H. L. EADS of South Union, Ky., Albany, 1879. Plain Talks on Shakerism, a pamphlet by G. A. LOMAS of Watervliet, Albany, County, N.Y., 1883. Sketches of Shakers and Shakerism (pamphlet), by GILES B. AVERY, Mt. Lebanon, N.Y., Albany, 1883. Several of the foregoing have many editions: we give the late or latest edition.

GILES B. AVERY

(Shaker of Mt. Lebanon, Columbia County, N.Y.).

SHALMANE'SER (Heb., שַׁלְמַנְעֶשֶׁר; LXX., Σαλμανασις; Assy., Šalmānu-aššir, "Shalmān, be gracious") was the name of several Assyrian kings, of whom only two are important for biblical history. — Shalmaneser II. (reigned B.C. 860-825) is not mentioned in the Bible, but was a contemporary of Ahab and Jehu of Israel, and Ben-hadad II. and Hazael of Syria, all of whom are named in one or another of his numerous inscriptions. From these we learn that Shalmaneser defeated Ben-hadad II. (whom he calls Dad'idri: i.e., Hadadezer) and about a dozen allied princes, at Karkar, between Halman (Haleb-Aleppo) and Hamath, B.C. 854. Among these princes was "Ahab the Israelite;" and in the danger from Assyria which was here realized we have one explanation of the "covenant" which Ahab made with Ben-hadad after he had conquered him (1 Kings xx. 31-34). Shalmaneser records again, that, during the western campaign of his eighteenth regnal year (B.C. 842), he received tribute from "Jehu, son of Omri." This designation of the king of Israel, who had destroyed the house of Omri, is one of the most striking tokens of the might which Omri and his real son, Ahab, had exercised. Dad'idri, i.e., Ben-hadad, was defeated by Shalmaneser four distinct times. — B.C. 854 (see above), 850, 849, and 846. Hazael is mentioned as suffering defeat, B.C. 842, and as losing some towns, B.C. 839. Shalmaneser appears, however, at no time to have reached Samaria, nor did he succeed in capturing Damascus.

The dates above given are secured by the statements of the Annals of Shalmaneser compared with the Eponym Canon, or list of Assyrian officials who gave names to the years. This canon is absolutely fixed by the eclipse of the sun, which it mentions June 15, B.C. 763; and by the coincidence of Sargon's thirteenth regnal year (B.C. 709), his first year as king of Babylon, with the date given by Ptolemy's Canon for the first year of Ἀρκεύος (i.e., Sargon; see the art.), king of Babylon. But a difficulty arises when we compare the dates above named with those of the received chronology, according to which Ahab reigned B.C. 919 (or 918)-897 (or 896); Jehu, B.C. 884-856; and Ben-hadad II. and Hazael, correspondingly early. This is only another indication that the dates of the Hebrew kings as they now stand in the text of our Bibles are corrupt; the error in that part of the ninth century B.C. with which we are here concerned being, for the kings of Israel, something more than forty years. (Cf. TIGLATH-PILESER, and see, for various attempts to solve the difficulty wholly or in part, J. WELLHAUSEN: Jahrb. f. Deutsche Theol., 1875, pp. 607 sq.; M. Shalmaneser IV., who reigned over Assyria B.C. 727-722, is twice mentioned in the Bible, — 2 Kings xvii. 3-5, xviii. 9. The former passage tells us that he came up against Hoshea, king of Israel, and that Hoshea submitted to him, and gave him tribute; that Hoshea entered into conspiracy with So (better, Sevehi, 815, Sabako), king of Egypt, as a punishment for which Shalmaneser bound him, and put him in prison: some interval doubtless occurred between the acts of verse 3 and those of verse 4. Finally, we are told that Shalmaneser "came up throughout all the land, and went up to Samaria, and besieged it three years." This took place, according to 2 Kings xviii. 9, in the seventh year of Hoshea's reign. Just before the fall of Samaria, Shalmaneser died, as we learn from the inscriptions of Sargon, his successor, who brought the siege to an end. (See SARGON.) Whether his death was natural or violent, we do not know. The only inscriptions concerned with his reign are an inscribed weight and two Eponym lists, which give us hardly more than the dates of his reign. With the expedition against Samaria was, perhaps, connected that against Tyre, which Josephus (Antiq., IX. 14, 2) mentions on the authority of Menander. The hostilities against Tyre lasted five years, and cannot have been concluded before Shalmaneser's death.

SHĀMMAL, a Jewish rabbi of the first century B.C., who founded a school directly antithetical to that of Hillel; so that it became a proverb, "Hillel looses what Shammal binds." Nothing is known of him personally. See art. SCRIBES.

SHARP, Granville, English philanthropist, b. in Durham, 1734; d. in London, July 6, 1813. Disapproving of the government action relating to the American Colonies, he resigned (April, 1777) a position in the ordnance office, and devoted himself to study. Before this his course in befriending and successfully defending the negro slave Somerset from his master, who tried to regain him (but the Court of King's Bench declared that a slave could not be held in, or transported from, England), brought him into great notice, and determined his career. He thenceforth devoted himself to the overthrow of slavery and the slave-trade. He presided at the meeting which organized the Association for the Abolition of Negro Slavery (May 22, 1787). He was a good linguist and a pious man. See his biography by PRINCE HOARE (London, 1810), and bibliography in ALLIBONE.

SHARP, James, a Scottish prelate; b. in the castle of Banff, May, 1618; assassinated on Magus Muir, near St. Andrews, May 3, 1679. He was educated at Aberdeen; in 1640 was professor of philosophy in St. Leonard's College, St. Andrews; in 1656 was chosen to plead the Presbyterian cause before the Protector; in 1660 he represented the same party when Monk marched upon London, and in that capacity was sent over to Charles II. at Breda, to provide for the protection and preservation of "the government of the Church of Scotland, as it is settled by law, without violation." This, of course, was understood in the Presbyterian sense; but in 1661 the Scottish Parliament annulled all the Parliaments held since 1633, with all their proceedings, and thus totally abolished all the laws made in favor of the Presbyterian Church. The "Church of Scotland" thus became the old Episcopal Church; and Sharp, in Dec. 12, 1661, was in London consecrated Archbishop of St. Andrews. With the zeal of a convert he persecuted his former allies. He re-erected the Court of High Commission in 1664, which severely punished, some even with death, all those who in any way interfered with the prelatical designs, and executed nine persons after the king had required the persecutions to cease. For his perfidy and cruelty Sharp was thoroughly detested; yet the assassins who despatched him were really on the lookout for one of his underlings, Carmichael, and had no intention at first of killing him. See HETHERINGTON, History of the Church of Scotland, pp. 205 sq., 250 sq.

SHARPE, Samuel, Unitarian layman; b. in London, March 8, 1799; d. there (Highbury) July 28, 1881. The last twenty years of his life were passed in retirement from business and assiduous biblical study. Although he had not the advantage of a university education, but was from early life a London banker, he yet acquired much solid information upon recondite subjects. He early became interested in Egyptology, and published Egyptian Inscriptions (London, 1836-41, 7 parts, 2d series, 1856, 4 parts), History of Egypt from the Earliest Times till A.D. 640 (1846, 6th ed., 1876, 2 vols.). To biblical literature he contributed a translation of the New Testament from Griesbach's text with notes (1840, 5th ed., 1862), a revision of the Authorized Version of the Old Testament (1865, 3 vols.), and History of the Hebrew Nation and Literature (1869, 4th ed., 1882). These works, and others of less importance, abundantly attest the industry and learning of their author. See his biography by P. W. CLYDEN, London, 1883.

SHASTRA (Sanskrit, śāstra, "to teach"), a name applied to the authoritative books of the Hindus upon religion and law, civil and religious.

SHE'BA. See ARABIA.

SHE'CHEM (shoulder), a town nineteen hundred and fifty feet above sea-level, thirty-four miles north of Jerusalem, in the tribe of Ephraim (Josh. xvii. 7), later in Samaria. It lies in the narrow valley between Mounts Ebal on the north, and Gerizim on the south; called also Sichem (Gen. xii. 6), Sychem (Acts vii. 16), and Sychar (John iv. 5). It was destroyed in the Jewish war, but rebuilt, and, in honor of the Emperor Vespasian, called Flavia Neapolis (new city). Hence in early Christian times it was called Neapolis only, as in the Talmud. From this name comes its present one, Nablus or Nabulus. Shechem, under its various designations, is mentioned forty-eight times in the Bible, first in connection with Abraham, who halted there (Gen. xii. 6). There occurred the massacre of all its males by Simeon and Levi, in revenge for Shechem's insult to their sister Dinah (Gen. xxxiv.). There the Israelites solemnly dedicated themselves to God, and there Joseph was buried (Josh. xxiv.). Abimelech set up an independent kingdom there, but after three years was expelled, and the city was destroyed, and sown with salt (Judg. ix.). Jeroboam made the rebuilt city the capital of the northern kingdom (1 Kings xii. 1-19, 25). After the captivity, Shechem became the centre of the Samaritan worship. There Jesus first definitely announced himself the Messiah (John iv. 5, 26). Neapolis became the seat of a bishopric, and there Justin Martyr was born. It was captured by the crusaders, and Baldwin II. held a great diet there (1120). It has repeatedly suffered from earthquakes, particularly in 1202 and 1837. It was destroyed by Ibrahim Pacha in 1834; but its natural advantages, being in the midst of a most fertile country, have always caused its speedy resurrection.

The present town numbers thirteen hundred inhabitants, among whom are a hundred and thirty Samaritans, six hundred Greek Christians, and a few Jews, Latins, and Protestants. It is abundantly supplied with water, there being no less than eighty springs and fountains in its immediate neighborhood, and presents a picture of great beauty. Its principal buildings are the great mosque Jāmi el-Kebīr, which is the Church of St. John, built by the crusaders (1167), and the little Samaritan synagogue (Kenisat es-Sāmireh) in which is the famous Samaritan Codex of the Pentateuch. Cf. art. "Shechem," in SMITH'S Dict. Bib.; SCHAFF'S Bib. Dict.; "Sichem," RIEHM'S Hnd. d. bib. Alt., BÄDEKER (Socin), 2d ed., p. 225.

SHECH'NAH (residence, i.e., of God, his visible presence), The, is post-biblical Chaldee, but adopted into Christian common use from the later Jews. The idea is, however, found in the Bible expression "the glory of the Lord." This "glory," the Jews say, was wanting in the second temple.

SHEKEL. See WEIGHTS.

SHEM HAMMEPHORASH (Heb., peculiar name, i.e., Jehovah), a cabalistic word among the rabbinical Jews; the representative of a wonderful combination of twelve, forty-two, or seventy-two letters, whose pronunciation has astonishing results. Absurd stories are told by the rabbins respecting it,—how Moses spent forty days on Mount Sinai in learning it from the angel Saxael; how its right utterance would enable the speaker to create a world; how Jesus wrought his miracles by its use; how two letters of it inscribed on a tablet, and cast into the sea, raised the storm which destroyed the fleet of Charles V. (1512). See BARING-GOULD: Legends of the Patriarchs and Prophets, p. 291.

SHEMITIC LANGUAGES. See SEMITIC LANGUAGES.

SHE'OL, the Hebrew word (the equivalent of the Greek Hades) for the under-world, the place of the shades. It comes from a word meaning "to penetrate," "to go down deep;" hence Sheol is literally what is sunk deep, bent in. The Hebrews thought that the dead went down into deep fissures. See HADES, and Hebrew lexicon under שְׁאוֹל.

SHEPARD, Thomas, Puritan, b. at Towcester, near Northampton, Eng., Nov. 5, 1605; d. at Cambridge, Mass., Aug. 25, 1649. He was graduated M.A. at Emmanuel College, Oxford, 1627; "lecturer" at Earl's Coln three years and a half; became a preacher; was silenced for nonconformity by Laud, Dec. 16, 1630; employed as chaplain to Sir Richard Darcy, Buttercrambe, Yorkshire, for a year; pastor at Heddon, Northumberland, another year; sailed for America, December, 1634, but was compelled by a storm to put back, had to hide himself lest he should be taken, but finally got off, July, 1635, and landed on Oct. 3 at Boston, and became minister to the church at Cambridge in February, 1636. He played a prominent part in the synod at Cambridge which ended the Antinomian controversy. He "was characterized by great humility, spirituality, soundness in the faith, and decision." In learning, piety, and spiritual insight he takes a first rank among Puritan divines; especially is he held in perpetual remembrance by that "rich fund of experimental and practical divinity," his treatise, The parable of the ten virgins opened and applied, first published by Jonathan Mitchell, from the author's notes, Boston, 1659, 2d ed., 1660; reprinted in London, 1695, in Aberdeen, 1838, and again, 1853, with biographical preface by James Foote. In all he is said to have written 3-2 books and pamphlets. Among them may be mentioned New Englands lamentation for Old Englands present errors and divisions, Boston, 1644, 2d ed., 1645; Certain select cases resolved, 1618; The clear sunshine of the Gospel breaking forth upon the Indians in New England, 1618; reprinted, New York, 1865; Theses sabbaticæ, 1649, 2d ed., 1655. A collective edition of his works, with memoir, was published, Boston, 1853, 3 vols. His Autobiography was published in Alexander Young's Chronicles of the First Planters of Massachusetts Bay, Bost., 1846. See COTTON MATHER: Magnalia (ed. Hartford, 1855, vol. i. pp. 380 sqq.); SPRAGUE: Annals, i. pp. 59-68; ALLIBONE: Dictionary of Authors, s.v.; DEXTER: Congregationalism, Appendix.

SHEPHERD, Thomas, b. 1665; d. at Bocking in Essex, Jan. 29, 1759; a seceder from the Church of England; published sundry sermons, and thirty Pendant Cries (1692), which were usually bound with John Mason's Songs of Praise, and with them reprinted by Daniel Sedgwick, London, 1859.

SHEPHERD OF HERMAS. See HERMAS.

SHERLOCK. There are four literary divines of this name, who require different degrees of notice. — I. Richard Sherlock, b. at Oxtou in Cheshire, 1613, and educated at Oxford and Dublin; became rector of Winwick; and d. in 1689. He fell into controversy with the Friends, and wrote an Answer to the Quakers objections to Ministers (1656), and the same year, Quakers wild objections answered. The practical Christian (1673), by the same author, was valued by Wilson, bishop of Soder and Man, who enlarged and corrected and republished it in 1713. — II. William Sherlock, b. in London, about 1641; d. at Hampstead, June 19, 1707; educated at Cambridge University, where he went in 1657; and was successively rector of St. George's, Botolph Lane, London, prebendary of St. Paul's, and rector of Therfield, Hertfordshire. He became master of the Temple in 1684. Refusing to take the new oath at the time of the Revolution, he was suspended for a while, but afterwards complied with the requirement of the law. This led to an immense amount of personal controversy; and Mrs. Sherlock's influence over her husband sharpened the wits, and elicited the ridicule, of his opponents. He had before this been reproved by James II., through the lord-treasurer, and deprived of a part of his income, for preaching against Popery; but the most important incidents of his life were the publication of a book entitled The case of resistance to the supreme powers, stated and resolved according to the doctrines of the Holy Scriptures (1684), and the subsequent publication of a work on the Doctrine of the Trinity and of the Incarnation of the Son of God (1690). These involved him in much trouble; the first, relating to a constitutional question, exposed him to political attacks; and the second, touching a theological subject then much discussed, brought him into conflict with certain divines, especially the witty and violent Dr. South. Sherlock's idea was, that in the three persons of the Trinity there is what may be called "a mutual self-consciousness, a consciousness common to the three," and that therefore the three are essentially and numerically one. This brought down on the writer the merciless ridicule of South. The former was accused by the latter of being a Tritheist, and the latter laid himself open to the charge of Sabellianism. Sherlock, who is often called Dean Sherlock, from his attaining to the deanery of St. Paul's in 1691, was indefatigably industrious; his publications amounting to sixty all together, chiefly controversial, but including some on practical subjects. Amongst them the most important are, A Discourse concerning Death (1689), A Discourse concerning a Future Judgment (1692), A Discourse concerning the Divine Providence (1694), and other discourses on religious assemblies, the state of the good and the bad hereafter, and the immortality of the soul. — III. Thomas, known as Bishop Sherlock, son of the dean; was b. in London, 1678; was graduated M.A. at Cambridge, 1701; became master of the Temple, 1704; prebendary of St. Paul's, 1713; master of Catherine Hall (where he had been fellow), 1711; dean of Chichester, 1715; prebendary of Norwich, 1719; and bishop of Bangor, 1727, whence he was translated to Salisbury, and finally to London, 1748. He declined the archbishopric of Canterbury, and died in London, July 18, 1761. These rapid promotions could not but make a mark on his name, but his authorship is that which is most noticed by posterity. His principal works were, Discourses in the Temple Church, Discourses on Prophecy, and the Trial of the Witnesses of the Resurrection of Jesus. This last, published in 1729, is the best known, and for a long time held a distinguished place in the literature of Christian evidence. — IV. Martin Sherlock, an Irish divine of no great reputation, wrote Counsel to a Young Poet (1779), in Italian. Horace Walpole said that his Italian was ten times worse than his French, in which language he published, the same year, Letters of an English Traveller.

SHI'NAR (Heb., שִׁנְאָר; LXX., Σενάαρ; almost certainly, Assyro-Babylonish Šumēr, of Akkado-Shumerian origin, with another probable form, Sungér), the name of a country or district, is found in the following passages of the Bible: Gen. x. 10, xi. 2, xiv. 1; Isa. xi. 11; Dan. i. 2; Zech. v. 11. In Gen. x. 10 it seems to be a general name for Babylonia; for it includes, besides Babylon, cities lying as far apart as Erech (Babyl., Uruk; modern Warka), lat. about 31° 40' N., and Accad (Agade, part of Sippara? see SEPHARVAIM), lat. about 33° 44' N. The same meaning is suitable for Gen. xi. 2, Isa. xi. 11, Dan. i. 2, Zech. v. 11. The language of Gen. xiv. 1, which speaks of Ellasar (Larsa; modern Senkerek), in nearly the same latitude with Erech, but farther east, as if it were not in Shinar, admits of explanation. It may be that "Arioch, king of Ellasar," (Babyl., Erivaku, king of Larsa?) was tributary to "Anraphel, king of Shinar:" in that case there is really no opposition here to what was said above.

In the form Šumēr (Shumēr) the name occurs very frequently in the Assyrian inscriptions, but is there applied to only a part of Babylonia. "Shumēr and Akkad" is a frequent designation of the entire region extending between the rivers Euphrates and Tigris (occasionally overstepping these limits), from Mesopotamia to the Persian Gulf. "Akkad" was a name for the northern part of this region; "Shumēr," probably, for the southern part. The northern boundary of Akkad is not easily fixed with precision; but it apparently lay about lat. 34° N., between the points where the Lower Zab and the Turnat flowed into the Tigris. Neither can we draw an exact line between Akkad and Shumēr; but the inscriptions represent Erech as in Akkad, and Ur (modern Mugheir, probably Ur Casdim of Genesis), lat. about 30° 54' N., as outside of it. If, then, the Hebrews came from the district of Shumēr, it is not strange that they should use this name in a general sense for Babylonia, especially in view of the wide sovereignty exercised by the kings of Shumēr, which seems implied in Gen. xiv. 1. It is believed that Meluhha and Magan are other designations of Akkad and Shumēr respectively.

The significance of these divisions dates from a time when both Shumēr and Akkad were inhabited by a highly cultivated, non-Shemitic people, to whom the Shemitic Babylonians and Assyrians were indebted for the larger part of their civilization, and whose influence has been by no means confined to the valleys of the Euphrates and Tigris. It was this people who invented the system of cuneiform characters: they had literature, art, and science. (Cf. CUNEIFORM INSCRIPTIONS.) It is quite likely that their earliest settlements were in Shumēr: and Ur, Eridu, and the city whose remains have been found at Tell Loh, must have been centres of political and religious influence at a very ancient time; no dates, however, can be now given with confidence. It is certain that the later Babylonian tradition attributed a high antiquity (about B.C. 4000) to the Shemitic civilization of Akkad, and the non-Shemitic culture must have been much earlier than the Shemitic; but it is not wise to repose full confidence in this tradition. See SEPHARVAIM.

The distinction between Akkad and Shumēr appears to have been not merely geographical, but also linguistic: the language used in one had certain dialectic peculiarities, as compared with that of the other. These peculiarities are few, and of limited application: they are such as the appearance of m or d in the dialect, for g in the normal language, and of e in the former, for u in the latter. The number of texts composed in the dialect is, as far as is now known, comparatively small. It is still disputed, whether the name "Akkadian" belongs to the normal language, and "Shumerian" to the dialect, or the reverse; i.e., which of the two was the language of Northern, and which of Southern Babylonia. In favor of the view that the normal language was that of Akkad, and the dialect peculiar to Shumēr, it is claimed, that, while the dialect is sometimes called ēmē-sal ("women's language"? the reason for this name is in doubt), it is also called ēmē ku ("language of the master"); and, since "Land ēmē ku" is a name for Shumēr, the desired inference is plain. Akkad is called, on the other hand, "Land ēmē luḥ" ("land of slaves' language"). It is further claimed that the name Shumēr itself, and the name Kingē, another designation of the same district, show characteristics of the dialect; that Tintir and Kadingirra, on the other hand, names of Babylon, which was in Northern Babylonia, belong by their form to the normal language; that one inscription which contains dialectic peculiarities bears the colophon "Tablet of Shumēr:" another argument is drawn from the fact that many loan-words in the Shemitic language are borrowed from the normal language, it being held that Shemitic contact with the pre-Shemitic civilization must have been chiefly in Akkad, etc. To these arguments it is replied, that the ēmē sal is identical, not with the ēmē ku, but with the ēmē luḥ, that the dialect belongs therefore to Akkad; that Shumēr was a North Babylonian form of the normal Shumgēr, this latter lying at the foundation of the Hebrew שִׁנְאָר, Shinar, and that Kingē is not a dialectic form at all; that Kadingirra may have been pronounced Kadimirra (dialectic form); and that Tintir, although the normal form, may simply indicate that people from Shumēr founded the city, and is therefore consistent with the view that the normal language belonged to Shumēr; that in the inscription with the colophon "Tablet of Shumēr," the dialectic peculiarities occur only in citations, the body of the text being neither Akkadian nor Shumerian, but pure Shemitic; and that many loan-words in the Shemitic language, and those such as belong to the common speech of everyday life, are derived from the dialect, and not from the normal language. It is further urged, on this side, that the names of places mentioned in the texts of the dialect denote cities in Northern Babylonia, or Akkad, and that the converse, though the instances are fewer, is also true; i.e., that Shumerian cities are mentioned in texts of the normal language; that the sea (Persian Gulf) is mentioned frequently, and as something familiar, in the texts of the normal language; that texts of the old Shumerian king Gudea, discovered at Tel Loh, show no dialectic peculiarities; that the Hebrews coming from Ur (in Southern Babylonia) carried the name שִׁנְאָר with them; this name corresponding to the normal, not the dialectic, form of the word (see above), etc. The problem cannot yet be regarded as fully solved: but the weight of evidence seems at present to be in favor of this latter view; namely, that the normal language is entitled to the name Shumerian, and the dialect to the name Akkadian. The comparative age of the normal language and the dialect is also in dispute, with arguments too technical to be given here. Further discovery and discussion are needed to put these matters beyond controversy.

SHIN-SHIU, or "REFORMED" BUDDHISM, is claimed by its followers to have been founded A.D. 381 in China, by Hwui-yuen, who established the worship of Buddha Amitāyus ("the Eternal"), or Amitābha ("the Bud of Infinite Light"), the fourth of the five Dhyāni Buddhas. It was then called the "White Lotus School." Pupils were sent to India, who collected Sanscrit texts, and translated them into Chinese. Three translations of the smaller, and twelve of the larger, Sukhāvatī-vyūha ("the Description of the Land of Bliss") were made, of which two of the former, and five of the latter, are in existence. Recently the original Sanscrit text of the sutra on which the religion of Amitābha is founded, and which was taken from India to China in the second century of our era, has been found in Japan. The cardinal doctrines of the sect are salvation by faith in the boundless Buddha, or Amida, and the hope of attaining bliss in the western paradise. The Chinese translations of Sukhāvatī-vyūha were known in Japan from 610 A.D.; but the Jōdō-shinshiu ("True Sect of the Pure Land") was not founded until 1173, at Kiōto, by the priest Hō-nen, whose pupil Shin-ran still further developed the protestant features of the system. Shin-ran married, and thus set the example of revolt against priestly celibacy, made worship more attractive and sensuous, while translating the sacred books into the vernacular, making missionary journeys, and preaching the cardinal tenet of the new faith, justification by faith, not in works, long prayers, masses, liturgy, fasting, and penance, but in Amida Buddha, the boundlessly merciful. In some respects "Reformed Buddhism" resembles Protestantism, while the other Buddhist sects have many of the features of Romanism.

Shin-shiu, or "True Sect," is the most numerous, the most active, and perhaps the most enlightened, sect of modern Buddhism, and numbers in Japan alone ten million adherents, with its chief temple and "archbishop" at Kiōto. Of two Japanese students of this sect, studying under Professor Max Müller at Oxford, one, Mr. Bunyiu Nanjō, has collated the ancient text recently discovered in Japan with the Sanscrit manuscripts of the Sukhāvatī-vyūha found in Europe, and compared with them the five authorized translations now in use, to discover which of these latter is the best. The publication of this original text of their sacred book, which has been likened to the issue of the Greek text of the New Testament by Erasmus, is the latest proof of their protestant principles; thus testing the purity of the stream by tasting of the fountain. The Buddhism of Shākya Muni does not, however, acknowledge or know of this Amida Buddha, nor is it heard of in Burmah or Siam. Rhys Davids (Buddhism, p. 206) speaks of Amida as the fourth of "these hypothetical beings, the creations of a sickly scholasticism, hollow abstractions without life or reality." Dr. E. J. Eitel (Religion in China, p. 153), after showing how the doctrine of Nirvana failed to satisfy the cravings of humanity, says, "It was to satisfy this want that the fiction of the 'Peaceful Land in the West' was framed. A Buddha was imagined distinct from the Buddha of history, Gautama, or Shākya Muni. He was called Amitābha, 'boundless age.'" See BUDDHISM.

SHINTŌ (Shintoism) is the cult of the primitive Japanese. Japan is now classified among Buddhist countries; since the vast majority of her thirty-three millions of people worship according to the doctrines, greatly modified, of Shākya Muni. (See SHIN-SHIU.) Since 552 A.D., when the first images and sutras were imported from Corea by missionaries of the India faith, Buddhism has been steadily propagated in Japan. Conquest was not made in a day or century, but it required fully a thousand years to convert the Japanese from their indigenous faith. Nor was the victory secured by overthrow or extirpation of the primitive belief, but rather by absorption of it. This will account partly for the fact that Japanese Buddhism, so different from that of Siam or China, is distinct by itself. By its corrupting or overlaying Shintō, several sects or systems now repudiated by pure Shintōists were formed, such as Riōbu ("twofold," i.e., of Shintō and Buddhism mixed), Yūitsu (Buddhism with a Shintō basis), Déguchi (Shinto explained by the Chinese Book of Changes), and Suiga, a combination of Déguchi and the tenets of the Chinese rationalist Chiu-hi, whose system of thought has, since the seventeenth century, prevailed among the educated classes in the Mikado's empire. Passing by these later developments, we shall outline the characteristics of pure Shintō, which is interesting as "a natural religion in a very early stage of development, which perhaps originated quite independently of any natural religion known to us;" that is, "neither by revelation, nor by introduction from without." The native term Kami no michi ("way or doctrine of the gods") is rendered by two Chinese characters, Shin ("god") and to ("way"), equivalent to θεός-λόγος. Its scriptures are the Kojiki ("Record of Antiquities"), a collection of oral traditions reduced to writing A.D. 712, in pure Japanese, uncolored by any but native ideas; the Nihongi ("Chronicles of Japan"), composed 720 A.D., containing, in the main, similar narratives to those in the Kojiki, but cast in the mould of Chinese philosophical thought and expression; and the Engishiki ("Book of Ceremonial Law"), promulgated in A.D. 927, in which are found many odes and prayers that are, on good grounds, believed to antedate the introduction of letters in the third or fourth century.

According to the sacred books, the universe comes into existence prior to the gods who afterward populated it. "Of old, when heaven and earth were not yet separated, chaos, enveloping all things like a fowl's egg, contained within it a germ. The clear and ethereal substance, expanding, became heaven: the heavy and thick, precipitating, became earth. Subsequently deity was born." The first kami sprouted upward like a rush. After successive evolution of several pairs of gods in imperfection, sex or differentiation was reached by the perfect manifestation of the creative principle in Izanagi and Izanami, who proceeded to make and furnish the earth. Standing in the floating region of heaven, Izanagi plunged his jewelled spear into the plain of the green sea beneath, and, stirring it round, withdrew the point, from which the drops, trickling, consolidated, and formed an island, to which the creator and creatrix descended to make other islands, and populate and furnish them with kami (gods), rocks, trees, soil, vegetation, and animals. Gradually the earth and sun separated; though, before they did so, the brilliant daughter of the first pair ascended to reign over the luminary of day, while a less fortunate son became ruler of the moon. Japanese mythology is full of the adventures of Izanagi and Izanami, not only on earth, but in the nether world. With the reign of Amaterasu, the sun-goddess in heaven, a new epoch begins. This heaven-illuminator, dissatisfied with the anarchy that reigned among the earthly kami, or gods, sent her agents to earth to restore order, and abolish feuds. None was able to do this work, until she despatched her grandson, Ninigi no Mikoto, who descended to the earth; and, after a series of violent struggles between the heavenly and the earthly powers, the grandson of Ninigi no Mikoto established his throne near Kiōto, and became the first emperor of Japan. The mikado is thus the personal centre of Shintō, and the vicar of the heavenly gods on earth, — the pope, who claims both spiritual and temporal power over his subjects. In the primitive government of Japan the Jin-gi Kuan, or Council of the Gods of Heaven and Earth, was the highest legislative power next to the mikado. In Shintō scriptures the earth is Japan, and the mikado's palace the most sacred of all places. The nobility claim their descent from inferior deities; the mikado, directly from the sun-goddess. The common people are the progeny of the earthly kami, though all claim Izanagi and Izanami as their creators.

In its essence, Shintō is ancestor-worship. In the earlier mythology the kami seem to be but the deified forces of nature, but the later traditions and the liturgy show that the gods addressed are hero-ancestors. After the division of the country by its first conquerors into feudal divisions, the chieftain and his kin, selecting one of the "heavenly gods," made him, as their ancestor, their tutelary deity, and erected a shrine to his honor. A remarkable fact in Shintō is that the miyas, or temples, are austere simple, containing no idols, images, or statues of heroes, no paint, gilding, symbols, or any thing sensuous, except the temporary offerings, or their permanent substitute, the gohei, which are strips of notched paper suspended from unpainted wands; nor can this absence of effigies of the gods worshipped be explained by the rudimentary condition of art in early Japan, since figures, in terra cotta or carved wood, of men, horses, and birds, were known and employed in the interment of the dead, — a merciful substitute for the human beings anciently buried alive with their departed master. Living animals were dedicated to the gods, but were not slaughtered. In front of the shrine was the bird-rest (tori), on which the cocks perched to give notice of dawn and the time for morning-prayers. This "sacred gateway," now so called, is still a striking feature in the landscape of Japan. Prayers were offered for protection, health, freedom from evil, for offspring, and for harvests; and thanksgivings were especially profuse at festival time, when offerings of silk, cloth, rice, weapons, horses, and equipments, were made. The root-idea of sin was pollution, and, of righteousness, purity. Actions were good or bad according as they were concerned with purification or defilement. Lustrations were frequent; and twice a year the festival of general purification took place, both at the imperial palace and at each one of the chief local shrines. Polluted persons were washed in the waters of running streams, and their clothing was destroyed. Later, paper figures representing the people, and an iron image of the mikado, dressed so as to do vicarious duty for his clothes, were cast into the river, which was supposed to deposit the offences in the nether world beneath the sea. "And when they have thus been got rid of, there shall from this day onwards be no offence that is called offence with regard to the men of the offices who serve in the court of the Sovran, nor in the four quarters of the region under heaven." All offences were divided into "earthly" and "heavenly," — a division which is based either on mythical incident, according to which the wicked brother of the sun-goddess committed a series of destructive and defiling tricks upon his sister and her companions, house, looms, and rice-fields, or, as a writer (Ernest Satow) in the Westminster Review suggests, upon the division of the early inhabitants of Japan into agriculturists (the invaders or conquerors) and hunters and fishermen (the aborigines). Between these two classes there would at first be continual trouble. "The so-called heavenly offences are chiefly such as would be possible only in an agricultural community, or to agriculturists living in a population of hunters and fishermen." It is nearly certain that the invaders of primitive Japan were warriors from Corea or the Asian mainland, who, after coming across the sea, gave out that their ancestors had come down from heaven. They were thus the descendants of the heavenly gods, while the aborigines whom they conquered were but the progeny of the earthly kami, or gods. It was by this combination of superior theology with superior weapons and prowess, that the over-sea invaders finally secured supremacy. In the first rude ages, when government was partly patriarchal and partly feudal, private property was scarcely known; and hence trespass and defilement, revenge and sacrilege, were offences more common than the sins usually catalogued in codes of more complex or modern society. Left by itself, however, Shintō might have developed codes of ethics, systems of dogma, and even a body of criminal and civil law, had not the more perfect materialistic ethics of Confucius, and the more sensuous ritual of Buddhism, by their overwhelming superiority, paralyzed all further growth of the original cultus: still there might have been a re-action, and the old faith have re-asserted its power, had not an Euhémérus appeared, who resolved Japanese mythology into Buddhist history. A learned priest named Kukai (A.D. 774-835), canonized as the great teacher Kobo, professing to have received a revelation from the gods at the Mecca of Shintōism at Isé, promulgated a scheme of reconciliation, according to which the chief deities of Shinto were avatars, or manifestations of Buddha to Japan prior to his perfect incarnation in India. All the legends, dogmas, cosmogony, and traditions of the primitive cult were explained according to Buddhist ideas; and the old native gods, baptized with Buddhist names, were henceforth worshipped according to the new and more sensuous ritual. Under this new teaching, Shintō as it was sunk out of popular sight, and its remembrance was cherished only by scholars. After the long wars of the middle ages, and the establishment of profound peace by Iyeyasū and the Tokugawa rulers, a school of writers arose in the eighteenth century whose enthusiasm led them to recover, decipher, and edit the scriptures of Shintō, and to enrich the native literature by a very creditable body of antiquarian and polemical writings, which helped greatly to prepare the way for the revolutions of 1868 and later, which have so surprised the world. Yet after the restoration of monarchy in Tokio, and the temporary revival of Shinto as manifested in propaganda, and purging of some old temples, the Jin-gi kuan, instead of being restored to ancient power, was degraded to a department, and finally abolished. The shrines and priests (of the latter, in 1880, 14,215) are now maintained partly by government appropriations, and partly by popular subscriptions. Shintō is still a living power among millions of the people, who oppose Christianity with patriotic animus rather than with martyr's convictions. It is also the source of occasional polemic literature. Japanese Christians, in whom the sense of patriotism is very strong, hold to the narratives of the Kojiki in a rationalizing way, explaining them on the theory of the solar myth, phonetic decay, or according to similar reasoning. Mr. Takahashi Goro, a Christian writer, in his Shinto Discussed A fresh, follows this plan. Two English scholars, Mr. Ernest Satow and Mr. Basil Hall Chamberlain (to whose labors the writer of this article is greatly indebted), are now engaged in translating portions of the original literature of Shintō, as seen below.

SHI'SHAK (favorite of Ammon, 1 Kings xi. 40, xiv. 25 sqq.; 2 Chron. xii. 1 sqq.), king of Egypt, the first Pharaoh of the twenty-second dynasty; called "Sheshenk" upon the monuments, and "Sesonchis" upon Manetho's list. It was he who received the fugitive Jeroboam (1 Kings xi. 40), and, perhaps at the instigation of the latter, invaded the kingdom of Judah in the fifth year of Rehoboam, and spoiled the temple and the palace (1 Kings xv. 25 sqq.). On his return home he wrote an account of his victory upon the walls of a temple on the south of the great temple of Karnac. In the long list of towns ("fenced cities") which he captured appear many of Judah and of Israel: so that Shishak invaded the northern kingdom as well as the southern. The most interesting name is Judha Malek, "the royal Judah" (not the king of Judah). See art. REHOBAM. Cf. EBERS, in RIEM: Handb. d. bib. Alt. s. v. "Sisak."

SHOWBREAD is the rendering of the Hebrew lechem hap-panim (lit., "bread of the face," because placed before the face of Jehovah): it is also called "bread of the ordering" (1 Chron. ix. 32, xxiii. 29; 2 Chron. xiii. 11; Neh. x. 33); once it is called the "continual bread" (Num. iv. 7), and "holy bread" (1 Sam. xxi. 5). According to the number of the twelve tribes of Israel, twelve loaves were placed on the table, which stood within the ark, near the curtain of the Holy of holies. The loaves, which, according to Jewish tradition, were unleavened, were placed in two rows, of six loaves each. An addition to the showbread was the frankincense (Lev. xxiv. 7). It was to be "on the bread for a memorial, an offering, made by fire unto the Lord;" the two golden pots containing it being (according to Josephus: Ant., III. 10, 7) taken out along with the bread, and the frankincense burned on the altar of burnt offering before the bread was given to the priests to be eaten. On each sabbath this took place; twelve new loaves, which had been prepared the evening before by a portion of the Levites (1 Chron. ix. 32), being made every returning sabbath to replace the old, and fresh frankincense put in the golden vessels in the room of that which had been burned (Lev. xxiv. 8, 9).

The signification of the showbreads is expressed in the words "from the children of Israel by an everlasting covenant:" they are a sign of covenant made by Israel, — a sign whereby they continually prove their connection with the Lord. The loaves are a symbol and type of the spiritual bread, which the people of God presents as a visible, practical proof before the Lord, an emblem of Israel's spiritual work in the field of the kingdom of God. That the priests alone were permitted to eat them, and this only within the sanctuary, would indicate, Be diligent in good works, and you shall live in the house of God as a priestly people, and shall receive from his communion salvation and blessing. The frankincense which was burned on the altar of burnt offering before the bread was eaten was an offering made unto the Lord, whereby Israel was symbolically reminded, and at the same time confessed, that every fruit with which it appears before the face of God it owes to the Lord, and for which it is to praise him.

SHOWBREAD, Table of the. According to the description given in Exod. xxv. 23-30 this table was two cubits in length, a cubit in breadth, and a cubit and a half in height, made of shittim-wood, overlaid with pure gold, and having a golden crown to the border thereof round about. This table, which is called "the table of the face" (Num. iv. 7) and "the pure table" (Lev. xxiv. 6; 2 Chron. xiii. 11), stood on the north side of the sanctuary, and was adorned with dishes, spoons, bowls, etc., which were of pure gold (Exod. xxv. 29). When it was transported, it was covered, with every thing that was thereon, with a cloth of blue (Num. iv. 7). In 2 Chron. iv. 19 we have mention of "the tables whereon the showbread was set," and at verse 8 we read of Solomon making ten tables. This is probably explained by the statement of Josephus (Ant., VIII. 3, 7), that the king made a number of tables, and one great golden one on which they placed the showbread. The table of the second temple was carried away by Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc. i. 22), and a new one made (1 Macc. iv. 49). Since the table was made only for the showbread, its symbolic signification cannot be a peculiar one; and, whatever it may mean, it can only be explained in connection with the showbread.

SHRINE (Lat., scrinium, a case for keeping books, etc.), a repository for relics, whether fixed, such as a tomb, or movable. The term is also sometimes applied to the tomb of an uncanonized person. Shrines were often made of the most splendid and costly materials, and enriched with jewels. The movable shrines were carried in religious processions, were kept behind and above the altar; and before and around them lamps were burning.

SHRIVE, to confess sin: hence Shrove-tide, the time immediately before Lent, when it was customary to confess as a preparation for the forty days' fast; and Shrove-Tuesday, the day before Ash-Wednesday, which was spent merry-making, and so, in England, came to be called "Pancake-Tuesday," from the fritters and pancakes eaten on that day.

He wrote two much used missionary hymns (1795), and that beginning "When streaming from the eastern skies" (1813), often attributed to Sir Robert Grant.

SHUCKFORD, Samuel, D.D., Church of England; d. in London, July 14, 1754. He was graduated M.A. at Caius College, Cambridge (1720); was successively curate of Shelton, Norfolk, prebendary of Canterbury (1738), and rector of Allhallows, Lombard Street, London. He is the author of the famous Connection, intended to supplement Prideaux's work, but only finished to the death of Joshua. The full title is, The sacred and profane history of the world connected from the creation of the world to the dissolution of the Assyrian Empire at the death of Sardanapalus, and to the declension of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel under the reigns of Ahaz and Pekah, London, 1727, 4 vols., 3d ed., 1743; rev. ed. by J. Talboys Wheeler, 1858, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1865.

SHU'SHAN (Heb., שׁוּשַׁן; LXX., Σοῦσα, accus., Σοῦσαν, gen. and dat., Σοῦσων, Σοῦσους; Elamit., Sušîn; Assyr., Sušan, etymology unknown), generally known as Susa, the capital of Elam or Susiana, is mentioned in the Bible as follows: Neh. i. 1; Esth. i. 2, 5, ii. 3, 5, 8, iii. 15 (t.), iv. 16, viii. 14, 15, ix. 6, 11-15, 18; Dan. viii. 2; cf. "Shushanchites," i.e., "men of Shushan" (Ez. iv. 9). It was situated on the river Eulaeus (so Dan. viii. 2, and Assyrian inscriptions and sculptures), which formerly emptied into the Persian Gulf, and must, at all events in its lower part, have been identical with the Pasitigris and the modern river Karûn. The ruins of the city are buried in the mounds of Shush, lat. about 32° 10' N.; long. about 49° 48' E. from Greenwich: but these mounds lie forty miles distant from the present course of the Karûn at its nearest point, and this might at first sight seem to favor the statement of some classical writers, that Susa was on (or near) the Choaspes (modern Kerkhah), which flows to the west of Shush. Loftus, however, who visited the spot, was told that the Kerkhah was once connected with the Karûn, and found the ancient river-bed, through which the water must have flowed, about two miles east of Shush. It is, then, quite possible that this was regarded as the Eulaeus, which in its lower part was certainly the same with the Karnn, and which, it is thus natural to suppose, may sometimes in its upper part have passed under the name of the Choaspes.

Elam was repeatedly invaded by the Assyrians in their campaigns; but Susa is not mentioned until the time of Asurbanipal, the last great Assyrian king (B.C. 665-626), who captured it about B.C. 655. After the fall of Assyria and Babylon, and the accession of the Achæmenidan kings, Susa became the winter and spring residence of these monarchs, and was greatly improved and adorned by them. According to the Book of Esther, there were great numbers of Jews in it. Alexander found great wealth there, and even after his time it preserved a reputation for riches. Under the Parthian Arsacidæ (B.C. 250-A.D. 226) it continued to be a chief city, but thereafter declined; and after its capture by the Mohammedans, A.D. 640, it is heard of only from time to time, e.g., in the eighth and twelfth centuries. Its site has been even yet but very imperfectly explored, owing to the extreme difficulties which attend excavations, arising in large part from the bigotry and fierceness of the present inhabitants of the region.

SIBBES, Richard, D.D., Puritan; b. at Sudbury, Suffolk, 1577; d. at Cambridge, July 5, 1635. He was successively student and fellow of St. John's College, and lecturer of Trinity Church, Cambridge; preacher of Gray's Inn, London, 1618-25; master of Catharine Hall, Cambridge. His best-known works are The bruised reed (to which Baxter attributed his conversion) and The soul's conflict (1638). He wrote, also, The returning backslider, or a commentary upon Hosea xiv. (1639), and A learned commentary, or exposition upon the first chapter of second Corinthians (ed. by T. Manton, 1655). See his Complete Works, with memoir by A. B. GROSART, Edinb., 1862, 7 vols.

SIBEL, Caspar, b. near Elberfeld, June 9, 1590; d. at Deventer, Jan. 1, 1658. He was educated at Herborn; studied theology at Leyden; and was appointed pastor at Randerath in 1609, at Juliers in 1611, and at Deventer in 1617. He was a very prolific writer, and left a number of sermons, homilies, catechetical and devotional works, besides an autobiography (unfinished). Of his Opera Theologica, a collected edition appeared at Deventer in 1644, in 5 vols. folio.

SIBYLLINE BOOKS. The sibyl is "the half-divine prophetess of the arrangements and decisions of the gods in reference to the fate of cities and countries" (LÜCKE: Versuch einer vollständigen Einleit. in die Offenb. Joh., 1852, pp. 66 sqq.). Etymologically it is probably the same as Σίβη (βύβη), the Æolic form for Διὸς βούλη, Hieronymus (Adv. Jov. i. 14) derives it from θεο-βούλη. Earlier classical writers recognize but one sibyl, who was first localized at Erythræ, or Cumæ: later many sibyls are spoken of. (Cf. Suidas' Lexicon, s. v., and the classical dictionaries, especially Lübker, 6th ed., p. 327.) The idea thus originated among the heathens. When, after the conquests of Alexandria, the period of religious syncretism was introduced, and the Jews of the dispersion became acquainted with the pseudo-prophetess of the Gentiles, they made use of her influence to make their peculiarities of religion and life palatable to the Greeks. Still more did the early Christians endeavor to make propaganda of their views in this manner; so that there were Gentile, Jewish, and Christian sibylline oracles. In the earlier centuries they enjoyed a high authority in the church, being quoted as evidences of the truth of Christianity by such apologists as Athenagoras, Justinus, Theophilus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and especially Lactantius. (Cf. BESANÇON: De l'emploi que les Pères de l'église ont fait des oracles sibyllins, Paris, 1851.) These different oracles, as many as have been preserved, originating at different places, in different times, and by authors of various tendencies, are now united in twelve books and some fragments, written in Homeric hexameters and language. In former times but eight books were known, which were published first by Xystus Betulejus, Basel, 1845. Angelo Mai in 1817 discovered the twelfth book, and in 1828 the ninth to twelfth books. C. Alexandre (1841-56) published the first complete edition in Paris (2d ed., 1867), and Friedlieb, in 1852, published a critical edition, together with a metrical translation into German. The contents are most varied. After two fragments of a general character, book i. (400 lines) describes the creation of the world, the five generations to Noah, the Deluge, and prophecies concerning future nations; book ii. (348 lines) exhorts to an upright life, and prophsies the destruction of all the wicked; book iii. (828 lines) contains three sections of prophecies concerning the good and the evil; book iv. (190 lines), prophecies of various kinds and the tenth generation; book v. (531 lines), the fate of various nations and the better future for the Jews; book vi. (28 lines), Christian prophecy concerning the Messiah; book vii. (162 lines), the Messiah and his times, with surrounding circumstances; book viii. (501 lines), prophetic concerning the destruction of Rome and its lands at the final consummation, together with messianic predictions; book ix. (324 lines), address to all the nations, and predictions; book x. (298 lines), the Latin race and its fate; book xi. (173 lines), the fate of different nations in the east and west; book xii. (360 lines), admonitions and prophecies, closing with the glory of Israel. In a collection of this sort, naturally no unanimity as to author, date, country, object, etc., of the various parts, can be expected among the investigators; and in reality but a small portion has been thoroughly examined. The most searching work in this respect was done by Bleek in his articles Ueber die Entstehung und Zusammensetzung der uns in 8 Büchern erhaltenen Sammlung Sibyllinischer Orakel (Theol. Zeitschrift, herausg. von Schleiermacher, de Wette, u. Lücke, vol. i., 1819, pp. 120-246, vol. ii., 1820, pp. 172-239), and his conclusions have found general acceptance among scholars. The prophecies which we have here collected into one volume extend over a period of from five to six centuries. The majority of the books are of little or no importance historically. Religiously, however, as the index to a certain train of thought and spirit in certain times and places, they are not only interesting, but also instructive. The following results can be regarded as safe: book iii. (97-807) is the production of an Alexandrian Jew in the Maccabean period (170-160 B.C.), combined with two older poems of heathen origin (97-161, 433-488) and later Christian interpolations (36-92), and dates from the second triumvirate (40-30 B.C.). All the other books, with the exception of the fifth, which is yet sub judice, are of Christian origin. The third book is in every way the most important, and in it three sections can be traced (97-291, 295-188, 489-807). The first section, after an historical survey from Kronos to the Romans, begins with 161 to prophesy, that, after the seventh king of Hellenistic origin shall have ruled over Egypt, then the people of God will again come into power, and the evil nations of the earth will be destroyed. The second section pronounces a judgment on all nations who directly or indirectly have stood in opposition to the Israelites. The third section predicts the final judgment, and finishes with the promise of a messianic kingdom and glory. The statement about the seventh king, as well as the epithet πολύκρανος ("republican") applied in 176 to Rome, points to the days of Ptolemy VII. (Physkon), as the date of writing. This is thus pre-Christian, as are also lines 36-92. (Cf. DRUMMOND: The Jewish Messiah, 1877, pp. 14 sqq.) Since the prophecies concerning the Messiah and his rule in the other books are vaticinia post eventum, those of the third, being, as was seen, pre-Christian and of Jewish origin, are really the only ones of special value in the whole collection. As the βασίλεια of 286 refers to Cyrus, and the νῦν θεοῦ of 775 should be νῦν θεοῦ (cf. SCHÜRER: N. T. Ztg., p. 567), these two passages are not messianic. But the whole section (652-795) is messianic. God will send a king from the rising of the sun (ἀπ' ἡλίου), who will put an end to all war on earth. The Gentile rulers will rise up against him and the temple, but they will be destroyed around Jerusalem. God will then establish an eternal kingdom over all nations. Peace will reign over the whole earth, and the laws of God will be recognized and obeyed everywhere. The main stress lies on the establishment of this everlasting kingdom, the person of the Messiah as the medium of its establishment being of minor importance. The later and younger section (lines 36-72) finds its historical background in the career of Anthony and Cleopatra in Egypt. Vv. 46-50 read, "But when Rome will rule also over Egypt, then the greatest of kingdoms, that of the immortal king, will appear among men, and there will come a holy king (ἅγιος ἀναξ), who will rule all the lands of the earth for all times as long as time continues." This king is naturally God or the Messiah. Cf., in addition to the works mentioned, HILGENFELD: Die jüd. Apokalyptik in ihrer geschichtl. Entwicklung, 1857, pp. 51-90; *Ztschrift f. wiss. SICARII (assassins), a set of Jewish fanatics who did much to hasten the war which terminated so disastrously, and on the downfall of Masada went to Egypt, where they continued to resist the Roman power (Josephus: Antiq., XX. 8, 5, 6; War, II. 13, 3, VII. 10, 1). See JUDAS OF GALILEE, ZEALOT.

SICKINGEN, Franz von, b. in the castle of Ebernburg, near Kreuznach, May 1, 1481; d. in the castle of Landstahl, near Zweibrücken, May 7, 1523; one of the heroes of feudalism, always at war with the powerful and arrogant, always defending the suppressed and meek, but specially famous for the great services he rendered to the Reformation. He enjoyed the confidence of Maximilian, and, in the beginning, also that of Charles V.; but in 1522, when he attacked the Archbishop of Treves, he openly declared in favor of the Lutherans. The undertaking proved too great for his means; and he was, in his turn, besieged in his own castle by the archbishop, and compelled to surrender the day before his death. Reuchlin, Ulrich von Hutten, Butzer, Oecolampadius, and numerous others, found at various times a refuge at Ebernburg; and his castles were justly called the "Asylums of Righteousness." His life was written by F. MÜNCH, Stuttgart, 1827, 2 vols. G. H. KLIPPEL.

SIDNEY, Sir Philip, b. at Penshurst in Kent, Nov. 9, 1554; d. at Arnheim in the Netherlands, Oct. 7, 1586; was educated at Shrewsbury, Oxford, and Cambridge; went abroad in 1572, and narrowly escaped the Massacre of St. Bartholomew; became a courtier and diplomatist; was married and knighted, 1583; wished to join Drake's second expedition in 1585, but was forbidden by Elizabeth, who feared to "lose the jewel of her dominions;" was made governor of Flushing, and general of horse; and was mortally wounded at Zutphen, Sept. 22, 1586, marking the event by an illustrious act of humane magnanimity. This model gentleman did not omit religion from the list of his accomplishments, as may be seen by his noble sonnet, "Leave me, O love which reachest but to dust," and by the version of Psalms made in conjunction with his sister, the Countess of Pembroke. His poetic talent, if not lofty, was more than respectable. His Works appeared in 3 vols., 1725, 1739, etc. His Poems were edited by Mr. Grosart in 1873. His Arcadia and Defence of Poesie, once popular, are still famous. F. M. BIRD.

SIDONIUS, Michael, b. at Esslingen in Baden, 1506; d. in Vienna, Sept. 30, 1561. He studied theology at Tübingen, entered the service of the Archbishop of Mayence, and was by Paul III. made bishop of Sidon in paribus infidelium, whence his surname Sidonius: his family name was Helling. He represented for some time the Archbishop of Mayence at the Council of Trent, and the emperor in the negotiations of Ulm. By the latter he was made bishop of Merseburg in 1550, and in the colloquy of Worms (1557) he took a prominent part. He was very active, though without exercising any influence, and the mediating position he tried to occupy between Romanism and the Reformation he had not strength enough to vindicate. He wrote the Catechismus Moguntinus. NEUDECKER.

SIENA, Council of. The Council of Constance ended in a general confession of incompetence to deal with the question of the reformation of the church. It strove to keep the matter open, of providing for the recurrence of general councils, and fixed Pavia for the meeting-place of the next, in five years' time. Accordingly, in 1423, Martin V. summoned a council at Pavia; but scarcely had it met, when the outbreak of a plague gave the Pope a pretext for transferring it to Siena, where it would be nearer Rome, and more under the Pope's influence. On July 2, 1423, the council assembled at Pavia. It was scantily attended; for European politics were disturbed, and few hoped that any thing would be done by a council held in Italy. The council began by a contest with Martin V. about the wording of his safe conduct, and negotiated with the citizens for greater security. Martin V. complained of this conduct as seditious, and the Papal party used personal pressure to intimidate the Reformers. The council agreed in condemning the heresies of Wiclif and Hus, and approving of negotiations for union with the Greek Church. The French then pressed for a consideration of the reforms projected at Constance. The Papal party took advantage of the small numbers present to throw the machinery of the council, which was organized by nations, into confusion. They contrived to have a disputed election to the office of president in the French nation, and urged the appointment of deputies to fix the meeting-place of the next council. This question awakened national animosities, as the French wished to secure the choice of some place in France. Finally, on Feb. 19, 1121, Basel was chosen as the meeting-place of the next council, to be held in seven years. After this, the dissolution of the council was felt to be imminent. The citizens of Siena vainly offered their aid to any who would stay, and brave the Pope. The council slowly dwindled, till on March 7 the Papal legates, taking advantage of the solitude produced by the festivities of the Carnival, posted on the door of the cathedral a decree of its dissolution, and rode away from Siena. A few zealous Reformers still wished to stay; but on March 8 they agreed, that to avoid scandal to the church, and danger to themselves, it was better to disperse quietly. The council came to an end without any results. Really, it followed too soon on the Council of Constance. The position of affairs had not changed since then; the Pope had not recovered his possessions in Italy; those who had been at Constance were not prepared to renew their labors when there was no hope of success. The only achievement of the Council of Siena was that it fixed the meeting-place of the Council of Basel.

SIEVEKING, Amalie, a distinguished philanthropist of noble birth; was b. in Hamburg in 1794; d. in Hamburg, April 1, 1859. Left an orphan at an early age, she took up her home with an elderly relative, and began at a tender age works of charity, by instructing a girl living in the house. From this beginning there grew a school, which enjoyed an enviable reputation in Hamburg. Her mind was deeply interested in the organization of a Protestant sisterhood, but was diverted from the realization of her plans, for a time, by the aversion of her relative. At the outbreak of the cholera in 1831 she offered her services to the hospital at Hamburg, and remained in attendance upon the sick for eight weeks, when the plague had abated, winning for herself general esteem by her courage and devotion. The year following, 1832, she realized her design, and formed the female society for the care of the sick and the poor. The society grew rapidly, and became the mother-institution of similar organizations in other parts of Germany. A careful record was kept of each case: those with whom poverty was a chronic disease were not aided. Money was never distributed: orders on the butcher, grocer, etc., were given instead. While the primary object of the society was to alleviate physical ills, it did not overlook the needs of the soul. See Denkwürdigkeiten aus d. Leben von A. Sieveking, KÖSTER.

SIGEBERT OF GEMBLOURS, a distinguished ecclesiastical writer; was b. in Belgium about 1030; was educated at the convent of Gemblours; became monk; in 1048 went to Metz as master of the school at St. Vincent's Convent; returned to Gemblours, 1070, and, after laboring there as teacher for forty years, died Oct. 5, 1112. He was a man of simple piety and integrity, as well as of distinguished scholarship. Although he was himself devoted to the monastic life, he opposed the view that the masses of married priests were invalid, and wrote against Gregory's celebrated letter to Hermann of Metz, claiming for the Pope the right to pronounce the ban upon the emperor. Siebert gives a list of his writings in his book De viris illustribus, a work of not much value. His most famous and last work is the Chronicon, which appeared for the first time before 1106, and for the second time, with the author's corrections and additions to 1111. It is a rather dry chronicle, after the model of Eusebius and Bede. It was the author's aim to give a chronological survey of the world's history, and to gather together the legends of the saints. Taking up his work at 351, where Jerome and Prosper had left off, he gives no matter of any value till 1023; but the history from 1024 to 1111 is to be regarded as original and important. Siebert never wittingly misrepresented facts. For a long time his work was the principal text-book of church history in the convents of Belgium and Northern France. See Monumenta Germ., SS. vi. 268-374, iv. 461-483, etc.; HIRSCH: De vita et scriptis Sieberti, Berol., 1811.

JULIUS WEIZSACKER.

SIGISMUND, Johann, Elector of Brandenburg, 1608-19; was educated in the Lutheran faith, but converted to the Reformed, and partook for the first time, together with his brother and the English ambassador, in the Lord's Supper, administered according to the Reformed rule, in the Cathedral of Berlin, on Christmas Day, 1613. Shortly after, he published his confession of faith, which accepted the Heidelberg Catechism and the Confessio Augustana, but rejected the Formula Concordia, and various later Lutheran additions, such as the passion of the divine nature of Christ and the omnipotence of his human nature, the ubiquity of Christ's body, etc. In a country which was strictly Lutheran, among whose inhabitants it was quite common to call a dog "Calvin," and whose theologians had at their fingers' ends no less than three hundred arguments to prove that the Reformed doctrine was worse than any which could have been invented by the Devil, the step which the elector made was not without danger. Nevertheless, he succeeded in gradually allaying the commotion, and placing the Reformed denomination on equal terms in the state with the Lutheran. Before he died, Reformed theologians were appointed professors in the university of Francfort-on-the-Oder. [REISER: Reformation d. Sigismund, ed. Bohm, Leipzig, 1876.]

SIGOURNEY, Lydia Howard Huntley, b. at Norwich, Conn., Sept. 1, 1791; d. at Hartford, June 10, 1865; started a private school at Norwich, 1809, and at Hartford, 1814; and in 1819

married a merchant of Hartford. She began to write verse at seven, and published in 1815 her first book, Moral Pieces in Prose and Verse. Her Poems, Religious and Elegiac, a selection from former books, appeared in London, 1841, during or after her visit there. In all, she published fifty-nine volumes, largely poetical, and chiefly on sacred or moral themes. She was long counted the first of American female poets. Many hymns by her, some of them from Nettleton's Village Hymns (1821), may be found in the various collections; but none is of the first merit or the highest popularity. Her autobiography appeared as Letters of Life in 1866. She was a Baptist. F. M. BIRD.

SI'HOR, i.e., "the dark," is a name common to three rivers. (1) The Nile (Isa. xxiii. 3; Jer. ii. 18), called by Greeks and Romans, "the black," from the black mud which it carries along during the time of the inundation. (2) The river of Egypt (Num. xxxiv. 5; Josh. xv. 4, 47; 1 Kings viii. 65; 2 Kings xxiv. 7; 2 Chron. vii. 8; Isa. xxvii. 12), the "Sihor which is before Egypt" (Josh. xiii. 3), "Shihor of Egypt" (1 Chron. xiii. 5), "the river to the great sea" (Ezek. xlvi. 19, xlviii. 28), which, formed through the confluence of many wadys, falls into the Mediterranean at the Wady el-Arish, between Pelusium and Gaza. During the summer it is almost dried up. Gesenius (Thesaurus, iii. 1393) thinks that this also refers to the Nile. (3) The Sihor-libnath, i.e., "black of whiteness," mentioned only Josh. xix. 26. The Vulgate and Septuagint take it as two rivers. Some think that it is the present Nahr Naman (the ancient Belus), which drains part of the plain of Akka. Reland conjectures that it means the Crocodile River, probably the Nahr Zerka. But this, however, is too far south; since Dor was not within the limits of Asher. Masius and Michaelis refer it to the Nile. LEYRER.

SIMEON, Archbishop of Thessalonica, a great scholar, an ardent friend of the monks, and a passionate adversary of the Church of Rome; lived at the close of the fourteenth and in the beginning of the fifteenth century, and left a great number of works, some of which have been printed (e.g., Katà tūpōtōw, Jassy, 1683); while extracts from others have been published by LEO ALLATIUS, in De Simeonum scriptis, Paris, 1661, and by JACOB GOAR, in Euchologium Græcorum, Paris, 1617. NEUDECKER.

SIMEON, Charles, Church of England; b. at Reading, Sept. 21, 1759; d. there Nov. 13, 1836. He was a fellow of King's College, Cambridge, and from 1783 incumbent of Trinity Church in the same city. He may be considered the founder of the Low-Church party. His "evangelical" preaching at first encountered opposition; but eventually he made many converts, and exerted a wide influence. He established a society for purchasing advowsons, and thereby was able to put his sympathizers at strategic points. He published a translation of Claude's Essay on the Composition of a Sermon; to which he added notes and a hum-dred sermon-skeletons, and subsequently published such outlines (2,536 in number) upon the entire Bible (Horæ Homileticæ, London, 1819-28, 17 vols., new ed. with addition of remaining works, but all under the same title, 1832-33, 21 vols.). See his life by W. CARUS, London and New York, 1847.

SIMLER, Josias, b. at Cappel, in the canton of Zürich, 1530; d. in the city of Zürich, July 2, 1576. He studied at Basel and Strassburg, and was in 1552 appointed professor at Zürich in New-Testament exegesis. Besides his De republica Helvetiorum, which was translated into foreign languages and often reprinted, he published several christological treatises, partly against the Polish freethinkers, partly against the Anabaptists, — Responsio ad F. S. M. librum, etc., De filio Domino et Servatore nostra, etc., etc. His life was written by J. W. STUCKI, Zürich, 1577.

SIMON BEN YOCHAI, the celebrated rabbin to whom the authorship of the book Zohar is generally ascribed; lived in the second century of our era. After the miserable failure of the rising under Bar-Cocheba, the rabbins gathered at Jamnia, where a school was established; and Simon was sent to Rome in order to obtain from Antoninus Pius a greater freedom, both of teaching and worship, for his co-religionists. He was a man more feared than loved, learned but obscure, strict but harsh: but he had acquired a great fame, even among the Pagans, for secret knowledge; and his mission was successful. After his return, however, he denounced Roman religion and institutions with such a vehemence that he was impeached, and sentenced to death. He fled, and lived for several years as a hermit in a cave, until, after the death of Antoninus, he was allowed to settle as a teacher at Thekoa, whence he afterwards removed to Tiberias. During his hermit-life he is said to have written the Zohar; and though several parts of that book cannot belong to him, because mentioning teachers who were later than he, there can be no reasonable doubt that other parts were actually written by him. See CABALA. PRESSEL.

SI'MON (hearing), the Name in Biblical History. The name Simon, or Simeon, has its origin in the patriarchal family of Jacob: it occurs very seldom in the pre-exilic Jewish history, but very often in Jewish history after the exile, and this, without doubt, on account of the theocratic signification which from that time on is attached to that name. The explanation lies in the history of Simon, the son of the patriarch (see TRIBES), and in the difference of opinion which prevailed about it before and afterwards.

I. THE NAMES OF SIMEON IN THE FIRST POST-EXILE PERIOD. — 1. Simeon the Just (Joseph.: Antiq., XII. 2, 5), son and successor of the high priest Onias I., grandson of Jaddes. He held his office in the first decades after 300 B.C. In the Talmud he is greatly glorified. In his person the high priesthood and hierarchical authority were combined. The eulogy in Ecclus. i. 1 sq. refers, according to Hody, Jahn, Winer, to our Simeon.

2. Simeon II., son of Onias II., lived in the time of Ptolemy Philopator (221 B.C.), and is said to have prevented the king from entering the temple and Holy of holies.

II. THE NAMES OF SIMEON IN THE MACCABEAN PERIOD.—1. Simon, the grandfather of Mattathias (1 Mace. ii. 1).

2. Simeon. The Benjaminite, a governor of the temple, who informed the Syrians, in the time of Seleucus Philopator (186 B.C.) and Antiochus Epiphanes (175 B.C., 2 Mace. iii.), concerning the treasures of the temple. Having quarrelled with the high priest, Onias III., he went to the Syrian Apollonius, informed him of the treasures of the temple, and caused the sending of Heliodor to rob the temple.

3. Simeon, surnamed "Thassi," second son of Mattathias, and last survivor of the Maccabean brothers. He deserved well of his people, which acknowledged his merits by appointing him prince and high priest. The document which mentions this fact throws a remarkable, though a little heeded, light upon the messianic hope of the people during the entire post-prophetic period, when it reads: "And it hath pleased well the Jews and the priests that Simon should be their prince and high priest forever, until there arise a trustworthy prophet" (1 Mace. xiv. 41). In the reserve at the end of the clause the theocratic conscience of the people and priests has evidently reserved the right of the Messiah, but with a disheartened expression; for to say that the advent of the Messiah was near at hand meant at that time to do away with the Maccabean dynasty. In accordance with this supposition of an exclusive opposition between the advent of the Messiah and the political dynasty, the Idumean Herod had all the children killed at Bethlehem. John the Baptist, however, preached the advent of the messianic kingdom mostly under the protection of the Roman Government.

III. THE NAMES OF SIMON IN THE GOSPEL HISTORY.—(1) Simon Zelotes, see below; (2) Simon Peter (q.v.); (3) Simon, father of Judas Iscariot (John vi. 71, xii. 4, xiii. 2, 26); (4) Simon the Pharisee, in whose house the penitent woman anointed the head and feet of Jesus (Luke vii. 36 sq.); (5) Simon the leper of Bethany, in whose house Mary of Bethany anointed Jesus (Matt. xxvi. 6 sq.; Mark xiv. 3 sq.; John xii. 1 sq.); (6) Simon of Cyrene (Matt. xxvii. 32; Mark xv. 21; Luke xxiii. 26). Mark describes him as the father of Alexander and Rufus. Besides these names, other Simeons are mentioned: (1) Simeon in the genealogy of Jesus (Luke iii. 30); (2) Old Simeon, who took the child Jesus upon his arms (Luke ii. 25); (3) Simeon usually designated Simon Peter; and (4) a Simeon the father of Gamaliel.

IV. THE NAMES OF SIMON IN THE APOSTOLIC HISTORY. (1) Simeon Niger (Acts xiii. 1); (2) Simon Magus (q.v.), the counterpart of Simon Peter; (3) Simon, the tanner of Joppa, in whose house Peter tarried many days (Acts ix. 43). The counterpart of Simon, the apostle and brother of the Lord, is Simon of Geraza, who plays a remarkable part in the Jewish war (Joseph.: Jewish War, II. 7, 4). It is worthy of notice that the blind Jewish people at Jerusalem rather followed a certain Simon and John in order to be destroyed, than the apostles John and Simon, who offered them the salvation in Christ, and who had to leave the city with the Christians.

V. SIMON ZELOTES (Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13), otherwise called "the Canaanite" (Matt. x. 4; Mark iii. 18). The term "zelotes," which is peculiar to Luke, is the Greek equivalent for the Hebrew term kanan, preserved by Matthew and Mark. As the surnames of the apostles express their characteristics, we see that this Simon already had the right name as Simon, inasmuch as the same reminded of the theocratic spirit of zealotry of olden times. It is characteristic that the zealot Simon is the brother of Judas Lebbæus or Thaddæus; and, if we may take into consideration the contrasts which we find so often among brothers, we may suppose, that, in the occurrence in Mark iii. 31 sq., James, and perhaps also Joses, who not even belonged to the apostolic circle, took a prominent part; whilst in the narrative telling us of the ambition on the side of Jesus' brethren, Simon and Judas took the lead. According to Eusebius (iii. 11) and Nicephorus (iii. 16), this Simon, after the death of James the Just, was made bishop of Jerusalem by the apostles. As this must have taken place soon after the destruction of Jerusalem, we may suppose that Simon already before that time led the Christians to Pella (Euseb., iii. 5). And since he was crucified at the age of a hundred and twenty (about 107 A.D., Hugesippus by Euseb., iii. 32, 1, Cotel. ed. Const. apost. 7, 46), we may surmise with certainty that as bishop he directed the affairs of the Jewish-Christian Church at Pella-Jerusalem in the spirit of union with the Gentile Christians, whilst Bishop John directed the Gentile-Christian Church of Asia Minor more in the spirit of union with the Jewish Christians. That Simon should have preached in Egypt, Cyrene, Mauritania, Lybia, and in the British Isles, where he is said to have been crucified, is mere fiction. J. P. LANGE.

SIMON MACCABÆUS. See MACCABEES.

SIMON MAGUS heads, in the early church, the list of heretics. From Irenæus (i. 30) on, he is known as the heresiarch, and is called by Ignatius (Ad Trall.) the first-born of Satan. In the middle age his name gave the designation to that lowest practice of the church, the sale of spiritual offices, simony. The biblical account of Simon is found in Acts viii. The sacred writer connects his name with dark and magical arts, and represents him as endeavoring, by means of them, to secure a large following. The impression he made upon the people is vouched for by the title they gave him, ἡ δύναμις τοῦ θεοῦ ἡ καλομένη μεγάλη ("The Power of God, which is called Great"), by which was meant that the highest divine potency was revealed in him. Under the influence of Philip's preaching and miracles he offered himself for baptism. But his request of Peter, to purchase the miraculous power of the apostles with money, abundantly proves that he wished to perpetuate his authority over the people. Condemned by Peter for his audacious and ungodly request, he craved the apostle's intercession; but, as most of the commentators hold, his last word breathes dread of the supernatural power which he did not possess, and not repentance. Turning to the ecclesiastical tradition, which represents Simon as the father of all those heresies with which men endeavored to corrupt the church, we must believe, that, in his subsequent history, he opposed Peter, sought to fan the opposition of the Samaritans to the Jews, and perhaps gave himself out as the Messiah. We shall now give a survey of the accounts current amongst the Fathers concerning his personal fortunes and his system.

1. Simon's Personal Fortunes.—The first post-biblical author to mention Simon is Hegesippus (Euseb. H. E., iv. 22), who states that he belonged to the Jewish sects with which the heretical corruption of the church originated, the Samaritans being counted among such sects. Justin Martyr, himself born in Samaria, has more to say about him; and his account, with that of the Acts, forms the firm foundation of all subsequent accounts. According to him, Simon was born at Gitton, Samaria, and was revered by the majority of the Samaritans as the most high God; and his attendant, Helena, whom he had found in a brothel at Tyre, was his ἐνορία. He visited Rome under Claudius, and created such an impression by his magical arts, that the Senate and people worshipped him as a god, and erected to him a statue bearing the inscription to the "Holy God Simon" (Simoni Deo Sancto). Hilgenfeld and others have supposed that Justin confounded a Samaritan village with Kittium in Cyprus, but without sufficient reason. The strange statue was explained by a discovery, in 1584, of a marble pedestal bearing the inscription, Simoni sancto Deo pulvis sacrum Ser. Pompejus . . . donum dedit. Justin, without doubt, was misled by this inscription. The Clementine Homilies speak of Simon's parents, and his education in Greek and magic at Alexandria, and represent him as originally one of the thirty disciples of John the Baptist. He travelled about with Helena, giving himself out as the highest power, superior to the Creator of the world, and representing Helena as having descended from the highest heaven, and being the mother of all and of wisdom. Many magical tricks are attributed to him. He commanded statues to walk, walked without injury in the fire, transformed himself into a serpent or goat, opened locked doors, etc. The relations between him and Peter are especially dwelt upon and elaborated. They held a disputation in Caesarea Stratonis, which lasted three days. Simon travelled from place to place, spreading calumnies about Peter, but ever pursued by the apostle, until finally, at Antioch, Simon was compelled by the latter to confess his own collusion with Satan, and the apostle's right to the claim of a true apostle of Christ. Another series of traditions cluster around Simon's sojourn at Rome. Grimm's statement, that the entire early church connected Peter with Rome, which he visited to oppose Simon, is not true of the first two centuries. Tertullian follows closely Justin and Irenæus, who do not connect Peter with Simon's sojourn there. The case is different in the third century, when Hippolytus speaks of Simon's controversy at Rome with the apostles Peter and Paul. The magician, seeing his influence waning, ordered himself to be buried alive, alleging he would rise again the third day. His disciples did as he desired, but found him dead on opening the grave. Here Simon's sojourn at Rome is put in the reign of Nero, while Justin puts it in the reign of Claudius. Henceforth the story of the Roman meeting between Peter and Simon is associated with the Clementine descriptions. Thither the magician fled, pursued by the apostle. His death is differently related. According to some, he promised to fly to heaven, and in fact did succeed in flying, until, stopped by the prayer of Peter, he fell dead to the earth. According to others, overcome with shame and chagrin, he threw himself from a rock (Const. Ap., vi. 8 sqq.; Arnob.: Adv. gentes, ii. 12; Cyrril.: Hieros., vi. 15, etc.).

2. Simon's System.—The Fathers agree in representing Simon as the coryphæus of the heretics, from whom came the devilish poison of heresy. From Justin on, a communion or sect is spoken of who recognized him as leader, or worshipped him as God. Justin expressly speaks of the "Simonian system" (1 Apol., ii. 14). Irenæus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Tertullian (De an., 57), Origen, and even Celsus, speak of the sect of the Simonians. Epiphanius and Eusebius speak of its gradual disappearance, and Theodoret, of its extinction. The Simonian teachings gradually take on the form of an elaborate gnostic system. Simon is the highest power, the father over all. Helena is the prolific mother from whom he gets the idea of creating angels and archangels. She brings them forth; and they, in turn, create the world. These angels, which do not know their father, out of jealousy detain their mother in captivity. Confined for centuries, she passes from one female body to another, until she at last is found in a brothel at Tyre. Simon descended from heaven, and freed his lost sheep, and emancipated those who believed in him from the world and the service of the angels who created it. This is in general the view of Tertullian (De an., 31), Hippolytus (v. 19 sqq.), Epiphanius, and, in part, Theodoret. Hippolytus (v. 7 sq.), however, speaks of another and quite different Simonian system, and mentions a writing by Simon, the ἀπόφασις περὶ τῆς (the Great Denial). Simon, as the great power above all, is called the ἐσώς, a designation which the Clementines and Clemens Alexandrinus also mention. Jerome (Com. in Math., cxxiv.) preserves Simon's words to this effect: "I am the word of God, I am the light, the paraclete, the all of God."

The following may be said concerning the growth and development of the Simonian sect. Simon was originally the false Messiah. A sect of Samaritans sprung up who worshipped him as the most high God. Around his person was formed a gnostic system compounded of mythological and Christian elements. Baur (Manich. Syst., 468 sqq.) was the first to show that the myth of Simon and Helena was a modification of the Phœnician mythology; the sun-god (Melquarth, Baal) representing the male, and the moon-god (Astarte) representing the female principle. These two principles are represented as a syzygy from which all things that exist have been developed. The fall is connected with the woman, and redemption with Simon, who descends from heaven, and makes the highest revelation. W. MÖLLER.

SIMON, Richard, the founder of biblical isagogics: b. at Dieppe, May 13, 1638; d. there April 11, 1712. He early became a novice of the Oratorians; but, as the prescribed ascetical practices embarrassed his studies, he left the order, and studied with private support in Paris. His connection, however, with the Oratorians, was not altogether dissolved. In 1662 he again entered the order as novice, having obtained permission to continue his studies; but he never felt at home in the order. The Oratorians were at that time rather successful competitors of the Jesuits in the field of education, and this circumstance drew them nearer towards the Jansenists. But Simon, so to speak, a rationalist by nature, felt averse to the Jansenists; and these conflicting tendencies made his position in the order somewhat difficult. He was first sent to Juilly to teach philosophy, but afterwards appointed at the library of the order in Paris to catalogue its Oriental manuscripts, — a task which was fully congenial to him, and of great advantage in his biblical studies. After the publication, however, of his great work on isagogics, he was again compelled to leave the order; and the latter part of his life he spent mostly in his native city, in literary retirement.

The earlier works of Simon have no special interest, — Vides ecclesiarum orientalis (1671), a translation from the Italian of Gaudini's "Travels among the Maronites" (1675), Comparaison des cérémonies des juifs avec la discipline de l'Eglise (1681), Histoire de Corinne des revenus ecclésiastiques (1684), etc. But in 1685 appeared his Histoire critique du Vieux Testament, and it was followed by his Histoire critique du texte du N. T. (1689), Histoire critique des versions du N. T. (1690), and Histoire critique des principaux commentateurs du N. T. (1693). The first part of the work was done in 1678. It was passed by the censor, and printed; but its publication was retarded on account of the dedication to the king. Meanwhile, some stray copies began to circulate, and attracted attention; and Bossuet, on this occasion acting in unison with the Jansenists, succeeded in having the work suppressed. The whole edition was destroyed; and only a few copies, in the possession of private persons, were saved. From one of those copies the Amsterdam bookseller, Elzevir, made a very incorrect edition in 1679; and from that edition Noël Aubert de Versé made his Latin translation, 1681. Finally, the author himself, who in the mean time had left the order of the Oratorians, published an authentic edition at Rotterdam, 1685. It was anonymous, but the other parts of the work bear the name of the author.

The work in its totality is the first scientific attempt at writing the history of the Bible considered as a literary product; and, in view of the immense amount of research which since that time has been bestowed on the subject, the idea of such an undertaking commands respect, both on account of its originality and on account of the courage it presupposes. The execution bears, of course, the marks of its time, of the scantiness of the materials and the insufficiency of the tools at the disposal of the author; but it cannot be denied that it also bears the marks of his narrowness and peculiarities, his hobbies, and his antipathies. The amount of criticism which the work called forth was enormous; and as Simon was a somewhat ticklish person, of a not altogether lovely temper, he could overlook nothing. The first attacks, by Weil, a converted Jew from Metz, and Spanheim, Prussian ambassador in London, with the responses of Simon, are added as an appendix to the Rotterdam edition of the first part. But more vehement and more protracted controversies ensued, with Isaak Voss, Jean le Clerc (Clericus), and others. Generally speaking, the literary history of the work is very interesting, as most of the questions brought forward in the controversies were new; but it is also difficult, as Simon published most of his answers pseudonymously.

Having criticised so many other translations of the Bible, Simon at last undertook to make one himself. The works appeared in 1702, in four volumes, printed at Trévoux, without the name of the author. It was soon discovered, however; and Bossuet took pains to gather from the translation a sufficient number of heresies, especially of a Socinian color. The book was forbidden, first by episcopal authority in some single dioceses, then by royal authority in the whole kingdom. Simon did his utmost to avoid the verdict, but in vain. Among his later works are Lettres choisies de M. Simon (1700-05, 3 vols.), and Bibliothèque critique (1708, 3 vols.), both of which contained striking evidences of the immense learning of the author, and valuable contributions to the literary history of the time. His papers and his excellent library he bequeathed to the cathedral of Rouen, but during the Revolution most of them disappeared. See the elaborate and reliable biography of Richard Simon by K. H. GRAF, in Strassburger theol. Beiträge, 1817, pp. 158-242; [also G. MASSON: Richard Simon, London, 1867; and A. BERNUS: Richard Simon et son Histoire critique du Vieux Testament, Lausanne, 1869; the same: Notice bibliographique sur Richard Simon, Basel, 1882, 48 pp.]. ED. REUSS.

SIMON OF TOURNAY lived in the beginning of the thirteenth century as teacher of philosophy and theology in the university of Paris. He was the first who applied the Aristotelian philosophy to theology, which circumstance filled his lecture-room to overflowing, but also seems to have made him crazy from vanity. Matthew Paris tells us that one day he exclaimed, "O Jesus! what have I not done for the consolidation of thy doctrine, though I could have done so very much more for its destruction!" after which he lost the powers of speech and memory, and had to learn his letters over again; but he never reached farther than spelling the Creed and the Lord's Prayer. Thomas Cantimpratus ascribes the famous saying about the three impostors — Moses, Christ, and Mohammed — to him. But Henry of Ghent, who was a canon of Tournay, and doctor of the Sorbonne in 1280, and who, consequently, ought to know, says nothing of those stories in speaking of Simon. None of his works have been printed, but they are said to be in perfect harmony with the doctrinal system of the church. C. SCHMIDT.

SIMONY is, according to canon law, the heaviest of all ecclesiastical crimes (delicta mere ecclesiastica), and has found its most pregnant description in c. 21, § 1; c. 1, qu. 1. The name is derived from Simon Magus (Acts viii. 18); and by degrees, as the view developed of ordination by the laying-on of hands by the bishop as a communication of the Holy Spirit, and the power of forgiving sin, the buying and selling of ordination naturally became a crime against the Holy Spirit. The idea gradually extended to the buying or selling of any ecclesiastical offices, and, in the controversy between the Pope and the emperor concerning investiture, it formed the principal weapon in the hands of the Pope. Later on, the idea extended still farther: it became simony to obtain admission to a monastic order by money, or to buy or sell the right of ecclesiastical patronage. SCHEURL.

SIMPLICIUS, Pope 468-483, was a friend of Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, and took part in the Monophysite controversy by condemning Timotheus Ailurus, Petrus Mongus, John of Apamea, Paul of Ephesus, and Peter the Fuller. He is commemorated by the church on March 2. NEUDECKER.

SIN. 1. A city of Egypt, which is mentioned only in Ezek. xxx. 15, 16, in connection with Thebes and Memphis, and is described as "the strength of Egypt." It is identified in the Vulgate with Pelusium, "the clayey or muddy" town, and seems to be preserved in the Arabic Et-Tineh ("tineh" signifying mud). Pelusium is famous for the many battles fought here. Here Sethon drove back the army of Sennacherib, and here Cambyes defeated Psammenitus (Herod., II. 141, III. 10 sq.). The Persians defeated here also Nectanebos (Diod., 16, 42 sq.).

2. A wilderness between Elin and Rephidim, where the Israelites arrived on the fifteenth day of the second month after their departure out of the land of Egypt, and where they received quails and manna. It is generally held to be the region near the source of Markha, south of Ras Zelima, the northern part of the plain el ka, which reaches from the south end of the Red Sea to the mouth of the Wady Taiyibeh in the north. Its desolate aspect appears to have produced a most depressing effect upon the Israelites. [Cf. Exod. xvi. 3.] LEYER.

SIN. Though Scripture gives no definition of the idea of sin, it leaves no elements of the doctrine of sin unnoticed, but gives a full account of how sin penetrated into human nature by the fall of man, how it develops into special acts through the self-determination of man, and how its power is finally broken by the atoning sacrifice of God. This account is the basis of the whole historical development of the Christian dogma of sin: the impulses which pushed on the development it derived from the steadily increasing clearness and depth with which the ideas of freedom and necessity, and their reciprocal relation, were conceived.

The older Fathers, the apologists, Justin Martyr, Tatian, Athenagoras, and Theophilus of Antioch, as well as Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Athanasius, the two Gregories, Chrysostom, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Methodius, defined sin as opposition to the holy will of God, and affirmed that such an iniquity involved death as its necessary consequence. But, though they were well aware that sin had spread throughout the whole human race without leaving one single human being as an exception, they did not put that universal state of iniquity in any necessary connection with the fall of Adam. Every single sin, they taught, is an act of free will, and, in its relation to the sin of Adam, only a repetition; and consequently an infant is as incapable of committing a sin as unable to do any thing good. Even Tertullian, though he taught that the sinfulness of human nature, with death as its consequence, is propagated by generation (corpus tradux animæ), asserted that man in his natural state had still the power to do good, that the natural state of man was not one of sin and guilt. It was first during the controversy between Pelagius and Augustine that people became conscious of the contradiction between sin as an act of individual freedom and sin as the result of organic necessity. Pelagius and his adherents, Celestius, Julian of Eclanum, and others, held that the propagation of sin by generation is unthinkable; that good and evil are not born with us, but done by us; that man has now the same nature as Adam had when he was created; that sin is an act of free will, etc. Thus the concupiscentia, or that sensual movement from which, when not governed by man, sin originates, is not an effect of the sin of Adam, but, like death itself, an element of the very nature of man; and between the sins of Adam and those of his offspring there is no other connection than that of example and imitation: the power which sin exercises over man is simply the power of habit. Augustine, who in his earlier writings spoke with marked composure about Manicheism, but who afterwards absolutely submitted to the idea of a total change of human nature, spiritual and physical, as the result of the first sin, placed against the Pelagian views the following propositions: that the sin of self-vindication and disobedience which Adam committed with free self-determination completely corrupted his whole nature; that the corruption consists in concupiscentia, or the dominion of the lower sensual instincts over the spirit, which unfits man for good, and makes it impossible for him to escape sin by his own power; that the corruption and its consequence, death, are propagated by generation, which means that sin is hereditary sin (vitium originis, peccatum originale), and the offspring of Adam a massa perditionis: that the natural state of man is not only one of sin, but one of guilt and punishment, as sin and guilt are correlative ideas, etc. Between these two extremes Semi-Pelagianism reared its system, according to which man, though the victim of hereditary sin, and subject to death, has still a desire for good. His powers have been weakened; he is neither completely dead nor fully alive; he is sick. But the liberum arbitrium has not been lost. In vindicating the freedom of the will, however, Semi-Pelagianism actually oversteps the dividing-line between Pelagianism and Augustinism, and sides with the former; and it continued to incline that way, even in the milder forms which it developed after its condemnation.

In the East, John of Damascus, the systematizer of the theology of the Greek Church, taught that death, and the loss of communion with God and converse with the angels, are the necessary consequences of the first sin, and are propagated by generation and birth. But he knows nothing of an unfitness for good and an hereditary guilt propagated in the same manner: on the contrary, according to him, man is still as free as Adam was on the day of his creation; and the image of God, in which man was created, and which consists in reason and a free will, has not been lost. The later Greek theologians, Theodorus, Studita, Theophylact, Euthymius Zigabenus, and others, followed in the same track. In the West the subject received a very peculiar treatment by John Scotus Erigena. In his system of Platonizing philosophy, he ascribed to sin, not as Augustine did, a relative, but an absolute, necessity; and thereby he really destroyed the sin idea. Sin, he said, is an element of human nature, just as evil is an element of the universe; and consequently sin is just as necessary for the perfect development of human nature, as evil for the perfect development of the universe. But by itself evil is only something negative, the mere negation of good, and has no positive existence, as little as sin. Erigena, however, exercised very little influence on this point; and, generally speaking, mediæval theology may be said to have left the subject nearly in the same state in which it received it. Of the schoolmen, Anselm of Canterbury, Peter the Lombard, and Thomas Aquinas expounded the dogma on the basis of the category of necessity; Abelard, Duns Scotus, and the Scotists generally, on the basis of the category of freedom. According to the former, sin is disobedience to God, caused by pride, and the sinfulness of the race is the effect of the fall of Adam. In Adam, the person corrupted nature (peccatum originale originans): in his offspring, nature corrupts the person (peccatum originale originatum). Consequently, although the senses are by themselves not of the character of sin, and only enter as an element into the single, actual sin, hereditary sin is, nevertheless, truly sin, and the unbaptized infant is justly damned. In this sense of the word, neither Abelard nor Duns Scotus recognized the existence of hereditary sin. That which was lost by the fall of Adam was, according to Duns Scotus, the justitia originalis; and the Scotists in general laid great emphasis on the free activity of man, a circumstance which aided them considerably in the defence of the doctrine of immaculate conception. In all essential points of the doctrine of sin the mystics of the middle ages agreed with the schoolmen. To them, too, sin had its root in the innermost core of the human personality, the self, the I, and consisted in the turning-away of the creature from his Creator; while the Cathari, the Albigenses, and other mediæval sects, sought the source of sin in the very body of man.

A deeper conception of the dogma was prepared by the Reformers through the clearer consciousness of sin to which they appealed. On the one side, Protestantism awakened a more vivid feeling of the unity of the race and the organic necessity of sin; on the other, it more strongly vindicated the individual person, and proclaimed the freedom of the will as one of its chief principles. A new and fuller mediation between the two opposite elements of the doctrine was necessary, and the change is already apparent in the symbolical books both of the Lutheran and the Reformed Church. The Lutheran theologians Gerhard, Quenstedt, and others, starting from the distinction between peccatum originale originans (the fall) and the peccatum originale originatum (hereditary sin), defined the latter as a loss of the original perfection, entailing a lack of true knowledge, love, and fear of God; as a faulty concupiscentia rising from a complete corruption of the body in all its qualities, so that the capacity for salvation is reduced to a mere possibility; as a reatus (guilt) which brings man, on account of the evil which is propagated in him, under the wrath and judgment of God. Calvin, although, on account of his supralapsarian views, he experienced some difficulties in refuting the charge that he made God the origin of evil, taught, nevertheless, that hereditary sin is connected with guilt; and the later Reformed theologians, Polanus, Alstedt, van Til, and others, defined the fall as a breach of the fœdus naturæ, and sin as a defectus naturæ. A transition to a stronger emphasizing and a more minute elaboration of the second element of the doctrine, the freedom of the will, became visible in Calixtus (who rejected the idea of hereditary sin as a guilt) and the syncretists in general; and during the period of rationalism and supernaturalism the movement was completed. The rationalists, who generally liked better to speak of the dignity of man than of his sin, argued that a transference of the guilt of Adam to his offspring contradicted the goodness, wisdom, and justice of God; and instead of hereditary sin, which term they hated, they spoke of a certain weakness of the will, a certain inclination towards the sensuous side of existence, a certain instinct for pleasure, etc., which was propagated by example, or perhaps by generation, but which formed part and parcel of human nature as created by God, and presented no insuperable obstacle to the absolute exercise of the freedom of the will. The principal representatives of these views were Henke, Steinbart, Eberhard, Wegscheider, and De Wette. The supernaturalists were, of course, very far from going this length. Nevertheless, Reusch explained the transference of guilt from Adam to his offspring by an imputatio metaphysica; God knowing that in Adam's place any and every man would have sinned like him. Reinhard explained the fall as a kind of poisoning, and hereditary sin as the inheritance of a poisoned constitution. Indeed, most of the supernaturalists, such as Michaelis, G. F. Seiler, Bretschneider, and others, taught that no man is declared guilty, and surrendered to punishment, on account of the sin of Adam and the sinfulness he has inherited from Adam, but only on account of those actual sins in which, with free self-determination, he allows his sinful disposition to realize itself.

It is apparent, that, in the whole process of development as above described, each onward step has been accomplished by a more or less one-sided emphasis on one of the two elements of the dogma.—the organic necessity, or the individual freedom. It is the characteristic of the theology of our age, that a perfect mediation between the two opposites is now demanded. Daub's attempt, in his Judas Ischarioth, at explaining the origin of evil as having taken place before the creation of man, found no favor; but, under the influence of the Hegelian philosophy, Marheineke, in his Grundlinien der theol. Moral., defined sin as a contradiction between the finite and the infinite spirit, necessarily arising from the abstract, unconscious unity of God and man, and as necessarily resulting in a concrete and conscious unity; and this idea did not prove altogether sterile. By Vatke, Romany, and others, sin was represented as a necessary transition through evil, without which man can neither fully know nor fully do that which is good; and generally the Hegelian school of theology taught the absolute necessity of sin as a condition of the development of the human spirit. Schleiermacher, however, abandoned this track. He sought to establish unity by explaining sin as a double fact, — a free deed of the subject on the one side, and a necessary result of the objective development on the other, — and the sinful state of man as a disturbance of his nature, not necessary to it; so that we become conscious of our sins, partly as something we ourselves have done, and partly as something which has its cause outside of our being. Later theologians generally show an influence either from Hegel or from Schleiermacher, and their treatment of the doctrine of sin is generally shaped after one of those two models. But hardly any of them can be said to have established a perfect balance between freedom and necessity in their solutions of the problem. Nitzsch, Martensen, and Rothe incline towards the absolute freedom of the will; Lange, Thomasius, and Philippi towards the absolute necessity of organic nature.

LIT. — The greatest work in this department is JULIUS MÜLLER'S Die Christliche Lehre von der Sünde, Breslau, 1839-44, 2 vols., 6th ed., Stuttgart, 1877, 2 vols.; Eng. trans., Christian Doctrine of Sin, from 3d ed., Edinburgh, 1852, 2 vols., from 5th ed., 1877. Of recent treatments of the subject may be mentioned, JOHN TULLOCH: Christian Doctrine of Sin, Edinburgh, 1876; A. BROWN: The Doctrine of Sin, London, 1881. The doctrine is, of course, treated in every work upon systematic theology and in innumerable essays. The profound work of JONATHAN EDWARDS, The Great Doctrine of Original Sin Defended, deserves particular mention. See HAGENBACH'S History of Doctrines.

SIN AGAINST THE HOLY SPIRIT (Matt. xii. 31, 32). The, must be carefully distinguished from blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. The latter is unforgivable: the former is not. As Matthew Henry well says, "It is not all speaking against the person or essence of the Holy Spirit, or some of his more private operations, or merely the resisting of his internal working in the sinner himself, that is here meant; for who, then, should be saved?" But blasphemy against the Holy Spirit implies complete deadness to spiritual things; so that holiness is hateful and hated. Wherever there is apprehension felt that the "unpardonable sin" has been committed, there has been no commission of it; for he who really sins in this way feels no contrition. And the latter fact is the reason why it is never forgiven. The sinner continues obstinate and malignant till his death. It is therefore equivalent to final impenitence. Cf. LANGE on Matthew (Am. ed., p. 227); PHILIP SCHIAFF: Die Sünde wider den heiligen Geist, Halle, 1841; A. VON OETTINGEN: De peccato in spiritum sanctum, Dorpat, 1856; LEMME: Die Sünde wider d. heiligen Geist, Breslau, 1883; and art. by HERMANN WEISS, in HERZOG 1, vol. xxi. 182-190.

SIN-OFFERINGS. See OFFERINGS.

SINS, The Forgiveness of, is the negative effect of justification, which in conception precedes the positive, adoption, and rests as the subjective impartation of the work of Christ upon the atonement as the objective fact. The doctrine is found in the Old Testament (Num. iv. 14, xviii. 19; 2 Chron. vii. 14; Ps. ciii. 10, 12, 13, cxxx. 4; Isa. lii.; Mic. vii. 18, 19, etc.), where, however, it rests upon sacrifices (see OFFERINGS); but in the New Testament it is frequently represented as the immediate result of Christ's death (Matt. xxvi. 28; Rom. iv. 25; 2 Cor. v. 19, 21; Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 13; cf. Heb. ix. 14; 1 Pet. i. 18, 19), and again as the result of the acceptance of the atonement on the part of the individual (Matt. vi. 12, ix. 2; Luke vii. 47; Acts ii. 38, xiii. 38; Rom. iii. 25; Col. ii. 13). Man, renouncing all works and all merits, is forgiven out of God's grace, for the sake of Christ's merits, through faith (Matt. ix. 2; Rom. iii. 25, iv. 4, 5). Righteousness is, however, reckoned as the condition of faith (Acts xiii. 39; Gal. ii. 16). Forgiveness, which removes guilt and its attendant punishment (Rom. v. 19), and sin itself (Rom. viii. 2 sqq.) is granted to all believers (cf. Rom. v. 12-21; 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22). See SIN AGAINST THE HOLY SPIRIT.

In the historical development of the doctrine, there was at first no clear understanding of the relations of God and man in the act of forgiveness; and so the apostolic Fathers represented it simply as the result of the atonement, and conditioned it upon a better life. Clement of Rome conditions it upon "faith," i.e., in the conception of the time, mere reception of the truths of Christianity, and obedience to the divine commands; the Shepherd of Hermas, upon "faith" and repentance, only once possible; Justin Martyr, upon "faith," baptism, and a righteous life; Clement of Alexandria, upon "faith" and good works; Origen, in his commentary upon Romans, upon "faith," but in other places adds good works, which he enumerates, — baptism, martyrdom, repentance, virtue, alms, forgiveness of sins against us, conversion of a sinner, brotherly love. The Latin Fathers — Irenæus, Tertullian, and Cyprian — attribute forgiving efficacy to baptism and to good works, as alms, and lay great stress upon penance. So the Greek Fathers — Cyril of Jerusalem, Basil the Great, Gregory Nazianzen, Theodoret, Chrysostom — condition forgiveness upon the "new life," and good deeds (martyrdom, fasting, alms, etc.). Augustine made an advance in the development of the doctrine, in that he represented forgiveness as a declarative act of God. He maintained that the works which justify follow, not precede, justification. But Pelagian teaching, that forgiveness was only a work of the general divine grace, and Catholic teaching respecting works of supererogation, prevented any immediate use from Augustine's advance. John of Damascus, it is true, distinguished two kinds of faith, — one mere acceptance of truth, the other firm confidence upon God's promises, but did not attain to a perception of the connection between the latter and forgiveness. Scotus Erigena denied forgiveness, since all that man needed to be reconciled with God was intellectual perception of the evil. The scholastic theologians were Semi-Pelagians. They taught that penance, which atoned for actual sin, consisted in contrition of the heart, confession of the mouth, and works of satisfaction, which were such as fasting, prayers, alms, flagellation, pilgrimaging. They taught also, in favor of the doctrine of purgatory, that, although guilt could be forgiven, punishment followed sin until the soul was cleansed by the purgatorial fire. They emphasized auricular confession and indulgences, the equivalent for penance, and thus perverted the doctrine of forgiveness. The mystics of the middle ages emphasized the inward connection between God and the heart. The Roman-Catholic doctrine, since the Council of Trent, is that forgiveness is received by man along with faith, hope, and love through Christ, in whom he is planted. It designates baptism as the only instrumental cause of justification, and hence of forgiveness. Roman-Catholic theologians, like Bellarmine, eliminate yet more decidedly from their systems the doctrine of forgiveness as removal of guilt.

The Lutheran theologians first lay the emphasis upon God's side, in that they teach that sin is atoned for by the vicarious death of Jesus Christ. The removal of guilt is the first effect of the declaratory and forensic act of justification. Faith (assent) in connection with baptism is the only condition of participation in the work of Christ. Among Reformed theologians Zwingli and Calvin present forgiveness as an act of God's grace to the objects of his electing love. The Reformed symbols, however, agree with the Lutheran in connecting forgiveness immediately with justification. The Socinians and Arminians emphasize the human side. They represent justification as forgiveness, and that God forgives sins when he sees faith in him, and obedience to his commands. The rationalists of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries maintained that forgiveness depended upon repentance, and return to virtue. The supranaturalists re-affirmed the necessary connection between the objective fact of Christ's death and forgiveness, but weakened their doctrine respecting the latter by representing that its principal effect was removal of punishment.

The speculative theologians have endeavored to find how correctly to unite the human and divine factors in the work of forgiveness. Schleiermacher finds the unity thus: forgiveness (1) is an effect of justification, (2) exists whenever man in repentance and faith enters into fellowship with Christ, and (3) is no result of a divine decree; but every act of conversion which includes the consciousness of deliverance from guilt, and desert of punishment, is only a declaration of the general decree to justify for Christ's sake. Martensen and Rothe deny that forgiveness is possible out of Christ. Nitzsch considers forgiveness as a direct act of God, resultant upon faith in the atoning death of Christ. Lange also holds fast to the objectivity of the act, which, according to him, is judicial.

DÖRTENBACH.

SINAI, i.e., "sharp-pointed," "toothed," or "notched" (Exod. xvi. 1; Deut. xxxiii. 2), also Mount Sinai (Exod. xix. 11, 18, 20, 23, xxiv. 16, xxxi. 18, xxxiv. 2, 4, 29, 32; Lev. vii. 38, xxv. 1, xxvi. 46, xxvii. 31; Num. xxviii. 6), also Horeb, i.e., "dry," "dried up" (Exod. iii. 1, xvii. 6, xxxiii. 6), also "the mountain of God," and "mount of the Lord" (Exod. iii. 1, iv. 27, xviii. 5; Num. x. 33), denote, in the narrower sense, a single mountain, the historic mountain on which God revealed the law unto Moses, but, in a wider sense, the mountain range in the peninsula formed by the Gullis of Suez and Akabah. On the north it is bounded by the upland plain of Er-Rabah, and on the south by the Um-Shaumer mount. A distinction has been made between Sinai and Horeb; and Hengstenberg (Authentic Pentateuch, ii. pp. 396 sq.), with whom Robinson (Researches in Palestine) agrees, explains the change in the names, in that he makes Horeb the mountain ridge, and Sinai the individual summit from which the Ten Commandments were given. Gesenius suggested that Sinai might be the more general name, and Horeb a particular peak; and in this conjecture he was followed by Rosenmüller. Ewald sees not a local, but a temporal, difference in the use of both names (Geschichte, ii. 89, note). According to Ewald, Sinai is the older name, therefore it occurs in the ancient song of Deborah (Judge. v. 5); whereas Horeb is not discoverable before the time of the fourth narrator, in whose time, however, it had become quite prevalent. But there really seems to be no local difference between Horeb and Sinai; but it rather belongs to the peculiarity of the author using the name. Josephus and the New Testament (Acts vii. 30, 35; Gal. iv. 21 sq.) only speak of Sinai; and modern Arabs call the whole mountain range in the peninsula Jebel-et-Tûr, sometimes with the addition of Sina, though Robinson says extremely rarely.

As to the locality, it is very difficult to designate a certain spot. Some, as Burckhardt and Lepsius, have claimed that the mountain on which the law was given was the Jebel Serbâl. But the nature of the country around Serbâl is against this hypothesis (comp. Dieterici: Reisebilder, ii. 54 sq.). A second hypothesis is the one which claims the Ras es-Sûsâfeh to be the Sinai of the Bible. This hypothesis was advocated by no less an authority than Robinson, who was followed by all writers and travellers till Léon de Laborde (in his Commentaire sur l'Exode Apocryph., pp. 1, 41 sq.), who advocated the old tradition in favor of Jebel Mûsâ, and was followed by Krafft, Strauss, Graul, Ritter, and in part, also, by Tischendorf. Above all things, it is necessary to pay attention to the notices of the Bible. According to Exod. xix. 2 sq., the Israelites, after their departure from Rephidim, came into the wilderness of Sinai, and encamped before the mount. God sends his message by Moses unto the people out of the mount, to tell them how he will receive them as his covenant people. Barriers are put up, to prevent any of the people from approaching or touching the mount. "On the third day there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount, and the voice of the trumpet exceeding loud, so that all the people that was in the camp trembled. And Moses brought forth the people out of the camp to meet with God; and they stood at the nether part of the mount. And Mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in fire. And the Lord came down upon Mount Sinai, on the top of the mount; and the Lord called Moses up to the top of the mount, and Moses went up." And in Exod. xx. 18 sq. we read, "And all the people saw the thunders, and the lightnings, and the noise of the trumpet, and the mountain smoking; and when the people saw it, they removed, and stood afar off." And Moses said unto the people, Fear not; for God is come to prove you, and that his fear may be before your faces, that ye sin not. And the people stood afar off, and Moses drew near unto the thick darkness, where God was." And in Exod. xxiv. 1 sq. Moses is called up into the mountain with Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel. Moses alone was to come near to the Lord: the rest were to worship afar off. Moses does according to God's commandment, and then continues alone on the mountain forty days and forty nights. In the mean time Aaron makes the golden calf. On going down from the mount Moses hears the rejoicing of the people; and as he came nigh unto the camp, and saw the calf and the dancing, his anger waxed hot, and he cast the tables out of his hands, and brake them beneath the mount. From this description we must infer that immediately at the base of the mount there was a large plain, where the camp of the Israelites was, and from which the mount ascended immediately, because barriers were put up to prevent any of the people from approaching or touching the mount. Robinson and those who follow him find this plain in the plain Er-Râhah, from which the granite wall of Sinai rises with the three-toothed peak Ras es-Sufsâfeh, asserting at the same time that no such plain is found on the south side. Others, who are in favor of the Jebel Mûsa, claim the Wady Sebafyeh to be that plain, which has been overlooked by Robinson, and from which, also, the cone of Sinai immediately rises like a gigantic altar of God. The plain Er-Râhah they claim as that spot of the camp from which Moses brought forth the people to meet with God, through the Wady Sebafyeh, and through which the people fled back into the camp.

It is remarkable that Sinai never became a place of Jewish pilgrimage. Elijah went there to escape the vengeance of Jezebel (1 Kings xix. 3-8). At a very early period, however, in the Christian era, Sinai began to be an object of reverence. It appears that refugees from persecution in Egypt first sought an asylum amid the mountains. Anchorets consequently flocked to it, and convents were at length founded. In the early part of the sixth century the Emperor Justinian caused a church to be erected, and a fortified convent [the present Convent of St. Catharine] to be built round it. The number of resident monks is now usually about twenty-four. They are ruled by a prior (Wakil), but there is an archbishop who always resides at Cairo. The library of the convent contains some fifteen hundred (according to Lepsius sixteen hundred) printed books, and about seven hundred manuscripts. [Among them Tischendorf discovered, in the year 1859, the celebrated Codex Sinaiticus.]

SINTRAM, monk, afterwards deacon, and finally presbyter, in the monastery of St. Gall; lived in the tenth century, and was so celebrated as a copyist, that every place of note was eager to have a manuscript by him. The so-called Evangelium longum, bound between the tablets of Charlemagne, is his work. He was, however, not a simple copyist, but a real artist, and combined in his art the vigorous but somewhat rough and awkward Lombard style with the refined and elegant style of the Irish monks. E. SION COLLEGE, or the college of the London clergy, which has been a religious house from the earliest times, under the domination of a priory or of a hospital, was dissolved under Henry VIII., but again organized. It now exists under charter of 1631, and is both a clergy house, and a hospital for ten poor men and ten poor women. See Dict. of the Church.

SIRACH. See APOCRYPHA.

SIRICIUS, Pope 384-398; condemned the monk Jovinian and Bishop Bonosus of Sardica, and suppressed the Manicheans and the Priscillianists in Rome. His Epistola ad Himerium Episcopum Tarraconsensem is the first decretal concerning celibacy.

SIRMOND, Jacques, b. at Riom, Oct. 12, 1559; d. in Paris, Oct. 7, 1651. He was educated by the Jesuits at Billom; entered the order in 1576; was in 1590 called to Rome as secretary to the general; returned in 1608 to Paris; became rector of the Jesuit college in Paris in 1617, and was appointed confessor to Louis XIII. in 1637. He edited works of Ennodius, Flodoardus, Fulgentius of Ruspe, Petrus Cellensis, Apollonius Sidonius, Paschasius Radbertus, Hincmar of Rheims, and others.

SIX ARTICLES, The, passed by the English Parliament, June 25, 1539, mark the retrograde movement of Henry VIII. from the principles of the Reformation. They imposed upon the English people the doctrines of transubstantiation, the usefulness of private masses, auricular confession, the celibacy of the clergy, and the communion in one kind. They were popularly called the "Bloody Articles" and the "Whip with six strings." See ARTICLES OF RELIGION.

SIX-PRINCIPLE BAPTISTS, so called from their six doctrines, contained in Heb. iv. 1, 2; viz., (1) repentance from dead works, (2) faith toward God, (3) the doctrine of baptisms, (4) the laying-on of hands, (5) the resurrection of the dead, (6) eternal judgment. Their "laying-on of hands" is similar to episcopal confirmation. They refuse to fellowship with those who do not practise it. Their general type of theology is Arminian. They claim to date, as an organization, from 1639, and have always been, for the most part, confined to Rhode Island. In 1700 they formed a Yearly Meeting. In 1880 they had not more than a dozen (very weak) churches in New England, all but two in Rhode Island. They have no periodical organ, and no institutions or societies. See CATHCART'S Baptist Encyclopedia, s. v.

SIXTUS, the name of five Popes. — Sixtus I., the successor of Alexander I., ascended the Papal throne either 116 or 119, and died a martyr's death, by decapitation, 128 or 139. He introduced the celebration of Easter at Rome, and was the author of the law prohibiting women touching the vessels on the altar. — Sixtus II. (Pope 257-258) was executed in the reign of Valerian. — Sixtus III. (432-440) was appealed to by the metropolitans of Tyana and Tarsus, who were afraid of being deposed. The erection of several churches is ascribed to him, especially the Basilica of St. Maria Maggiore. — Sixtus IV. (1471-84), whose family name was François d'Albescola della Rovere, a man of humble origin, was b. July 22, 1414, at Celle, near Savona; d. Aug. 14, 1484, at Rome. Entering the Franciscan order, he became its general, was elevated to the cardinalate by Paul III., and chosen pope, Aug. 9, 1471. He was one of those popes who showed a deep interest in art and church architecture, and promoted the interests of the conventual orders, but who, incited by ambition and lust, filled Italy with blood, wrought confusion in the church, and secured the contempt of their own generation. He studied to raise the fortunes of his family, [and made five of his nephews cardinals]. Peter Riario, who was looked upon as the Pope's son, an immoral and extravagant fellow, was made cardinal; and for another supposed son, Hieronymus, he sought to secure a princely inheritance. In order to accomplish this, and out of jealousy and hatred for the house of Medici, he was an accessory to the plot of the Pazzi to murder Julian and Lorenzo Medici in the St. Reparata Church at Florence. Julius was killed; Lorenzo escaped with a harmless wound. The Florentines fell upon the murderers, and put to death some priests who had participated in the plot. Sixtus hurled the ban at all who had taken part in the uproar against the conspirators, and laid the province of Florence under the interdict. The Florentine clergy appealed to a general council; the corporation sent a vigorous letter to the Pope (July 21, 1478); and Bishop Gentilis of Arezzo declared him to have been in collusion with the conspirators. Louis XI. of France sent a deputation to Rome, accusing the Pope of stirring up strife, and calling upon him to summon a general council. The Pope refused to call a council, but the demand was again made by a synod of French prelates at Lyons (1479). Other princes expressed themselves in positive language; and, threatened with an invasion of the Turks, Sixtus concluded peace with Florence. The fear of the Turkish invasion led him to the resolve to emigrate to Avignon. He, however, did not carry out this resolution. The danger was hardly over, before he again began to intrigue in the interests of his relations. Seeking to secure the possessions of the house of Este in Ferrara for Girolamo Rimio, he concluded an alliance with Venice against Ferrara. When King Ferdinand, who was an ally of Ferrara, made a treaty with Rimio, Sixtus endeavored to induce Venice to relinquish its conquests. Failing in this, he laid the interdict upon the city (May 23, 1483). The wars which Sixtus began in the hope of promoting the interests of his family and favorites led him to exact tithes from the prelates, to sell ecclesiastical positions, etc. He built the chapel named after him, founded churches, beautified Rome with magnificent structures, built the bridge over the Tiber; but the damage he did the church by his ambition overbalanced the good that accrued from these works. In a bull of 1477 he recommended the celebration of the feast of the Immaculate Conception, confirmed the Franciscans and Dominicans in their privileges in two bulls (1474), which these orders call their mare magnum (great sea), etc. — Sixtus V. (1585-90) combined with unusual energy and vigor great and statesmanlike versatility and foresight, revived the glory of the Roman chair, built splendid buildings, and filled the Papal treasury, but subordinated religious to political interests. He, without doubt, is one of the most distinguished of the bishops of Rome. He was a descendant of a family of Slaves which had emigrated to Italy, and settled at Montalto. Felix Peretti, who later became Sixtus V., was b. Dec. 18, 1521, at Grotte-a-Mare, a village near Fermo; d. Aug. 24, 1590, at Rome. He visited the universities of Ferrara and Bologna, and was made professor of canon law at Rimini in 1544, and at Siena in 1546. He was a Franciscan. From Siena he went to Rome, became noted as a preacher, secured the friendship of men in power, but, on account of complications, went to Venice (1556), where he held high positions in the Franciscan order. Paul IV. showed him favor; and in 1565 he accompanied the Papal legate to Spain, where he secured the confidence of Philip II. by his preaching. Paul V. also showed him favor, and appointed him vicar-general of the Franciscan order. His success won for him the bishopric of Agatha de Goti, which he administered well, attempting to reform the morals of the clergy. Honored with a cardinal's hat in 1579, he retired to Montalto, lived a solitary life, expended his means in deeds of charity, engaged in the preparation of an edition of Ambrose (1580), and gave the appearance of disinterested and saintly humility. This policy disarmed the cardinals, who, at the death of Gregory XIII., elected him Pope (April 24, 1585). An unreliable tradition states.

that, as soon as the majority of the votes had been given in his favor, he arose in the conclave, erect and resolute, threw away the staff with which he had been wont to support himself, and sang the Te Deum with great energy, so that the cardinals, carried away with astonishment, could hardly trust their eyes. Sixtus laid hold of power with a firm hand, suppressed the banditti bands, insisted upon the execution of the laws, promoted commerce, the manufacture of silk and wool, sought to drain the Pontine marshes, etc. By the bull Immensa (1587) he appointed fifteen congregations, made up of cardinals, for the more expeditious transaction of business, fixed the number of cardinals at seventy, ordered that all bishops should appear at Rome once in three years, etc. His administration was frugal, and left a well filled treasury to his successor. He did much for the adornment of Rome,—built the dome of St. Peter's, placed the obelisk in its present position, built the Lateran Palace, removed the Vatican Library to new and splendid quarters, and ordered an edition of the Septuagint (1587) and the received edition of the Vulgate. He was also involved in political matters. He supported the Duke of Guise, the author of the league for the extermination of the Huguenots, declared Henry of Navarre a heretic (Sept. 9, 1585), later, pronounced the ban upon Henry III. of France, and, when that sovereign was murdered (Aug. 1, 1589) by the Dominican Clement, approved of the bloody deed. He encouraged Philip II. in the war with Elizabeth, but refused Philip's request to pronounce the ban upon Henry IV. of France. The people of Rome hated Sixtus, and tore down the monument the Senate erected to his memory on the Capitol. SLATER FUND FOR THE EDUCATION OF FREEDMEN. In the spring of 1882 a fund of one million dollars was given to trustees by John F. Slater of Norwich, Conn., for the purposes of educating and uplifting the freedmen of the United States, and preparing them for the duties of citizenship. The trustees were incorporated by the State of New York, and were organized with ex-President Hayes as their chairman, and Chief Justice Waite as their vice-president. It is expected that the income only of the fund will be distributed, and that schools which combine industrial training with mental and moral instruction will receive particular encouragement. The donor of the fund is a descendant of William Slater, to whom is largely due the establishment of cotton manufactures in this country; and he acquired a fortune by business-pursuits in Connecticut and Rhode Island.

SLAVERY AMONG THE HEBREWS. According to the Old Testament, which ascribes to man the inalienable trait of his nature, because of his being created in the image of God, and which presents the brotherhood of mankind, because originating from one blood, slavery as it appears among Gentile nations is inadmissible from the very beginning. That one tribe, however, at the very beginning of the history of men, is dedicated to slavery (Gen. ix. 27), is only because of a curse effected through a special depravity. Yet the Old Testament presupposes slavery, according to which servants, like other possessions, formed a part of property (Gen. xxiv. 35, xxvi. 14; Job i. 3); and also the sale of slaves, as something which was customary in the patriarchal age. The servants of the patriarchs were of two kinds,—those "born in the house" (Gen. xiv. 14), and those "bought with money" (Gen. xvii. 13). Abraham appears to have had a large number of servants. At one time he armed three hundred and eighteen young men "born in his house." The servants born in the house were, perhaps, entitled to greater privileges than the others, and were honored with the most intimate confidence of the masters, as may be seen in the case of Eliezer (Gen. xxiv. 1 sq.), who would have been Abraham's heir, should the latter have died without issue (Gen. xv. 2 sq.). The servants of Abraham were admitted to the same religious privileges with their master, and received the seal of the covenant (Gen. xvii. 9, 11, 24, 27). Slavery, as far as it was allowed by the Mosaic law, was regulated by laws, which, on account of their humane character, form a contrast to that degradation of human nature which was so prominent in heathenism. The laws regulating slavery may be divided into two classes,—such as relate to the Hebrew slaves, and such as relate to non-Hebrew slaves.

1. Hebrew Slaves.—The circumstances under which a Hebrew might be reduced to servitude were, (a) poverty (Lev. xxv. 39, 47), (b) the commission of theft (Exod. xxii. 1, 3—in that case the thief could not be sold to a foreigner, Jos. : Antt., XV 8, 27), and (c) the exercise of paternal authority (Exod. xxi. 7—and in that case the authority was only limited to the sale of a daughter). The servitude of a Hebrew might be terminated in three ways, (a) by the satisfaction or the remission of all claims against him, (b) by the recurrence of the year of jubilee (Lev. xxv. 40), which might arrive at any period of his servitude, and, (c) failing either of these, by expiration of six years from the time that his servitude commenced (Exod. xxi. 2; Deut. xv. 12). There can be no doubt that this last regulation applied equally to the cases of poverty and theft. The period of seven years has reference to the sabbatical principle in general, but not to the sabbatical year. We have a single instance, indeed, of the sabbatical year being celebrated by a general manumission of Hebrew slaves (Jer. xxxiv. 14). If a servant did not desire to avail himself of the opportunity of leaving his service, he was to signify his intention in a formal manner before the judges; and then the master was to take him to the door-post, and to bore his ear through with an awl, thus establishing a connection between the servant and the house in which he was to serve. A servant who had submitted to this operation remained a servant "forever" (Exod. xxi. 6). The condition of a Hebrew servant was by no means intolerable. His master was admonished to treat him, not "as a bond-servant, but as a hired servant and as a sojourner;" and again, "not to rule over him with rigor" (Lev. xxv. 39, 40, 43). At the termination of his servitude the master was enjoined not to "let him go away empty," but to remunerate him liberally out of his flock, his floor, and his wine-press (Deut. xv. 13, 14). In the event of a Hebrew becoming the servant of a "stranger" (i.e., a non-Hebrew), the servitude could be terminated only by the arrival of the year of jubilee, or by repayment to the master of the purchase-money paid for the servant, after deducting a sum for the value of his services proportioned to the length of his servitude (Lev. xxv. 47-55). The servant might be redeemed either by himself or by one of his relations. A Hebrew woman might enter into voluntary servitude on the score of poverty; and in this case she was entitled to her freedom after six years' service, together with the usual gratuity at leaving, just as in the case of a man (Deut. xv. 12 sq.). Different is the case with a young daughter whom a father sold to a Hebrew with a view either of the latter's marrying her himself, or of his giving her to his son. Should the master be willing to fulfil the object for which he had purchased her, she remained with her master forever; if not, she was subject to the following regulations: (1) Should he not wish to marry her, he should call upon her friends to procure her release by the repayment of the purchase-money; (2) If he betrothed her to his son, he was bound to keep her as one of his own daughters; (3) If either he or his son, having married her, took a second wife, it should not be to the prejudice of the first. If neither of the three above-specified alternatives took place, the maid was entitled to immediate and gratuitous liberty (Exod. xxi. 7-11).

II. NON-HEBREW SLAVES. — The majority of non-Hebrew slaves were war-captives. — either the Canaanites who had survived the general extermination of their race under Joshua, or such as were conquered from the other surrounding nations (Num. xxxi. 26 sq.). Besides these, many were obtained by purchase from foreign slave-dealers. That the law in general did not favor the increase of foreign slaves may be seen from the enactment in Deut. xxiii. 16 sq.; and after the return from Babylon the Jews had only 7,337 slaves, or about one to six of the free population (Ez. ii. 65).

The position of the slave in regard to religious privileges was favorable. He was to be circumcised, and hence was entitled to partake of the paschal sacrifice (Exod. xii. 41), as well as of the other religious festivals (Deut. xii. 12, 18, xvi. 11, 14). He was to rest on the sabbath-day (Deut. v. 14); and, in case the master had no male issue, he could give him his daughter in marriage (1 Chron. ii. 35). As to the treatment of female slaves, see Deut. xxi. 10 sq. The master had no power over the life of a slave (Exod. xxi. 20). Willful murder of a slave entailed the same punishment as in the case of a freeman (Lev. xxiv. 17, 22); but no punishment at all was imposed if the slave survived the punishment for a day or two (Exod. xxi. 20), because he is his master's "money" (Exod. xxi. 21). A minor personal injury, such as the loss of an eye or a tooth, was to be recompensed by giving the servant his liberty (Exod. xxi. 26, 27). The general treatment of slaves appears to have been gentle, occasionally too gentle, as we infer from Solomon's advice (Prov. xxix. 19, 21). The slave was considered as entitled to justice (Job xxxi. 13-15). The Essenes entirely abolished slavery. Cf. PHILO: Quod omnis probus (Mangey's ed.), ii. 457.

SLAVERY IN THE NEW TESTAMENT. The New Covenant declares all mankind equal sharers in salvation (Tit. ii. 11; 1 Tim. ii. 4); and this principle was in itself sufficient to determine the view concerning slavery (Gal. iii. 28; Col. iii. 11), and to bring about its extinction. Since Christianity does not deal with nations, and masses of people, but with individuals, whom it severally invites, exhorts, and receives into its communion, by setting forth faith as an inward, liberating life-principle (John viii. 36) through which the individual lays hold on Christ, and becomes united with him, it recognizes the rights of the inner man (Acts ii. 41, xiii. 46; Gal. ii. 19-21), which the heathen nations never apprehended, and which were veiled in the Old Testament, but which, in their progress and complete realization under Protestantism, must ultimately bring about the utter extirpation of slavery from the earth. Christ postulated the law of liberty, and made freedom the privilege of believers (John viii. 32; Jas. i. 25, ii. 12; Rom. viii. 2), thereby accomplishing the predictions of the Old Testament (Luke iv. 18-21; Isa. lxi. 1 sq.); and, though the proclamation of liberty by the apostles had primary reference to the inward states of the soul (1 Cor. vii. 23; Gal. v. 1; 1 Pet. ii. 16; comp. Gal. ii. 4, v. 13; 2 Pet. ii. 19), it necessarily led to the great principle, that, with Christ, liberty in general had come to man (Luke i. 79; 2 Cor. iii. 17), which, like a leaven, was to permeate all relations of life.

With regard to slavery, the passage in 1 Cor. vii. 21 is of especial importance; and, whatever explanation may be given, certain it is that Paul did not intend to subvert by force the then existing condition, however adverse to the spirit of Christianity, but that first the inner freedom was to be implanted in the human heart, from which, in the course of time, the outer freedom was to proceed. It is evident from Rom. xiii. 1 sq., that a disposition to refuse obedience to government existed, to some extent, in apostolic times, and, from the case of Onesimus, that bondmen sometimes broke away from their masters' rule. In the latter instance Paul succeeded in effecting the voluntary return of the fugitive Christian slave by imparting to him a deeper and more correct knowledge of the nature and aims of Christianity (Philem. 10-16).

Similar tendencies we find among the slaves at Corinth, where many had no doubt become converts to Christianity (1 Cor. i. 20, 26-28). The apostle, therefore, laid it down as a rule, that converts to Christianity were to continue in the station and condition of life to which the providence of God had assigned them (1 Cor. vii. 17, 20). The argument by which that rule is enforced—that the present is a time of distress, in which it becomes prudent for the unmarried to retain their virgin state, and the slave to remain contentedly in his bondage—indicates its primary reference to the Corinthian Christians of that day; but the further considerations adduced—that the time is short, and the grand catastrophe through which the world's conditions shall be changed is drawing near—have universal force, and adapt the rule to the conditions of all Christians. It is, however, evident that the apostle does not strike at the right to liberty and personal independence in these instructions. 1 Cor. vii. 23 asserts that right most forcibly, and shows that the saving grace of the Lord involves a setting-aside of all human bondage. A denial of that right would bring him into conflict with his own claim to freedom (1 Cor. ix. 1) and with his fundamental statement, that in Christ all things must become new (2 Cor. v. 17). The principles of Christian liberty were already then exhibited in such a manner that Christian masters, even if they were not to give freedom to their slaves, as Philemon to Onesimus, were exhorted to treat their slaves kindly and as brothers (Eph. vi. 6; Col. iv. 1; Philem. 16). [Bishop Lightfoot says, "The gospel never directly attacks slavery as an institution; the apostles never command the liberation of slaves as an absolute duty. It is a remarkable fact that St. Paul in this Epistle (Philemon) stops short of any positive injunction. He tells him (Philemon) to do very much more than emancipate his slave, but this one thing he does not directly enjoin" (p. 389).]

SLAVERY AND CHRISTIANITY. Christianity and slavery seem to the present generation, with its settled opinions concerning natural rights and the teachings of the New Testament, to form the opposite poles of the moral sphere; and yet it is certain that society in antiquity was based on slavery, and that at no period of history was the slave system more completely organized than in the Roman Empire during the life of Christ in this world. It may be affirmed, also, that the Master never commanded that slavery as it then existed should be abolished, like other evils,—idolatry, for instance,—by the direct act of his followers; and further, that, for three hundred years after his advent, no writer among either the defenders or the enemies of Christianity ever spoke of the abolition of slavery as a consequence of the new doctrine (Biot, 126). It seems, however, equally clear that the total change which has since taken place in the opinion of the civilized world in regard to slavery has been mainly due to the gradual outgrowth of Christian doctrine, morals, and example. This inconsistency can only be explained by a view of the history of the opinion of the church on this subject.

1. Relations of Christianity towards Slavery to the Reign of Constantine.—Among the early converts there were, of course, masters and slaves. The apostle Paul preaches liberty to the individual; because the gospel fully sets forth the folly of human distinctions in a race which had a common Father, and were the subjects of a common redemption. He insisted, also, that in the new kingdom all men were equal in the sight of God, who was no respecter of persons, whatever they might be as subjects of the Roman emperor: nevertheless, he maintained the duty of obedience on the part of the slave, and the claim of authority on the part of the master, as not only sanctioned, but commanded, by the new doctrine. The apostle, and his followers during the first three centuries, accepted slavery as a fact, a settled condition of Roman society which they were as powerless to change, had they so desired, as to change the imperial government itself. The object, the only object which was then practicable, was to remedy moral evils under existing institutions. The apostles and fathers addressed their exhortations to the heart rather than to the intellect of the down-trodden classes. They taught meekness and humility, and consecrated for the first time in history the servile virtues. They seem to have regarded the service of God by slaves as conferring upon them, in an important sense, perfect freedom, and as placing them on a footing of equality with their masters in the new "City of God." In this city all, slaves and free, worshipped the same Father; they were bound by the same law; their religion taught them that they were all brethren, sharing in the offices of the church and the administration of its charities, members of the same collegium in the old Roman sense, with equal rights as such, and, above all, with the same hope of a common reward in the life to come.

Doubtless there were many evils in Roman society, established by law or usage, which shocked the moral sense of the early Christians quite as much as slavery ought, we think, to have done; but all these evils the Christians met with submission and resignation and by their own example of good works and virtues. When the Roman law came in conflict with their Christian duties, they made no futile attempts at change by revolutionary force and violence. An illustration of their position is found in the history of the Quakers, who gained all their early strength by protesting by voice and example against the iniquities of society in the reign of Charles II.; and yet they remained loyal subjects of the king.

2. Opinions of the Christian Fathers in regard to Slavery.—It cannot be doubted that the opinions of many of the Fathers on this subject were derived from the moral philosophy of the stoics of the empire. "Liberty," says Epictetus, "does not consist in the enjoyment of the things we desire, but in our having no desires." Marcus Aurelius made the question of true liberty dependent upon the mind and the will of the individual. The Fathers taught, after the example of St. Paul, that the true slavery was the slavery of sin. St. Jerome insists that there is no true freedom except in the knowledge of the truth. St. Ambrose sees above all conception of liberty a more noble servitude, in which freemen and slaves may unite, and where both may work together for the good of others. According to St. Augustine, the inferior position of woman relatively to man, as well as slavery, was introduced into the world at the same time and by the same means,—the sin of Adam. So Chrysostom thinks that the apostle did not recommend the suppression of slavery, lest men should lose an opportunity of seeing how nobly liberty of soul could be preserved in the body of the slave. And yet, with these opinions of the advantages of the existing system, the Fathers speak of the original equality of mankind, of the fraternal love which should bind all men together, of that great human family of which tyranny, and not nature, had made two races, of the dignity of man created in the image of God, and, above all, of the noble destiny of man, who, while he became a slave through the sin of Adam, becomes a freeman through the sacrifice of Jesus Christ. (See Wallon: Histoire de l'Esclavage dans l'Antiquité, vol. iii., for full details on this point.)

While Christianity did not attack what may be called the principle of slavery in the Roman Empire, it did not content itself with preaching merely moderation to the masters, and resignation to the slaves: it favored the manumission of slaves (Const. apost., iv. q. t. l. p. 297), and strove to suppress or mitigate those features of slavery which made men forget that they were all children of the same Father, and heirs of the same promises (see Wallon, iii. 384 sq.); it sought to narrow the area of slavery by restricting as far as possible the sources of supply; it redeemed captives taken in war; it purchased the freedom of debtors about to be sold into slavery; and it strove by its charity to succor those families who had been reduced to the condition of slaves by the misfortunes of their fathers (Ambrose: De Officiis Ministr.; Greg. Magnus: Dial., iii.); above all, it brought into the Roman world a principle which had been unknown there for ages,—the dignity of human labor. There is no more striking difference between Roman and modern society than that caused by the different ideas prevailing at the two periods in regard to the social status of the workman. In Rome, as soon as she began to conquer the world, all labor became servile, and laborers were despised outcasts, because they were slaves. Christianity changed all this. It dignified and ennobled labor. The obligation to labor was inseparable from the law of love. The early Christians followed the example of the Master and his apostles in this respect, working and doing good at the same time and from the same motive. Work was regarded as quite as indispensable to the perfection of Christian character as prayer itself (Laborare est orare).

Under the Christian emperors, Constantine and his successors, the principle of slavery was still maintained, and no slave-code ever existed which defined more sharply the line separating freemen from slaves than that of Justinian (A.D. 529). The Christian Fathers, at the Council of Nicæa and afterwards, procured some legislation which forbade the employment of slaves as gladiators, and of women as actresses; but in practice these prohibitions were of no avail, such was the passion of the populace for theatrical spectacles. By the same influences, Constantine was moved to direct that manumissions should be thenceforth made in the church, in the presence of the bishop, rather than in that of the prætor, in order to give greater sacredness to the act. This custom was transmitted to the mediæval church.

So Constantine gave the right to the parents of new-born children to sell them into slavery; and this law, which was in direct opposition to the provisions of the old Roman code, was, it is said, rendered necessary by the increasing misery of the times, and was adopted as an alternative against permitting the children to perish from neglect and starvation.

From the time of Constantine to that of Alexis Comnenus (1095), there was, it is now apparent, in the Eastern Empire, a secret conflict of opinion between the Christian authorities and the imperial government concerning slavery. A strong illustration of the nature of this conflict is found in the general opinion that the marriage of a slave in the church made him ipso facto a freeman. Up to the time of Basil the Macedonian, no such marriage was permitted to take place; the union of male and female slaves being still regarded as contubernium, not having the sanction of the connubium, essential to the valid, legal marriage of the Romans. Basil (867-886) directed that the priestly benediction should hallow the marriage of slaves. This enactment met with violent opposition from the deeply rooted prejudices of centuries, and was often evaded. Alexis Comnenus renewed the edict, invoking for its support the Christian maxim, "one God, one faith, one baptism," and directed that all slaves whose masters forbade that they should be married in the church should become at once free. See Wallon, iii. 162, and Milman's History of Latin Christianity, i. p. 491.

In the Western Empire, after it was conquered by the Teutonic tribes, domestic slaves were still to be found; although the vast majority of the bondmen were serfs, who, like the Roman coloni, were adscripti glebæ, and could not be sold apart from the land, of which they formed, in legal phrase, an incident. Many of the harshest features of the slave-code of the empire and of the Barbarians were kept up for the government of these serfs. The tendency, under the feudal system during the middle age, was to replace slavery by serfage; and this last form of servitude died out gradually in Europe, when the employers of labor, from a variety of motives, chiefly economic and selfish, found it to their advantage to pay wages, and to agree with their serfs that they should hold their lands on condition of rendering services therefor, certain in kind, and fixed in amount.

We are not to suppose that either the church or the clergy (who were all, in the earlier period, of the conquered races) were unmindful of the treatment of the serfs and bond-laborers during this age. The church did not attack mere slaveholding, — indeed, under the operation of the feudal system, churches and monasteries became, by the gifts of the faithful, among the largest slaveholders and proprietors of serfs, — but it constantly protested against abuses of the system, and in favor of humane measures. Charles L. Brace (Gesta Christi, p. 229) says that thirty-seven church councils passed acts favorable to slaves. In the middle age no Christian captives were permitted to be sold into slavery; the right of asylum in the churches was offered to fugitive slaves; large sums were spent for their ransom; manumissions were frequent, and were encouraged by the church as acts inspired "by the love of God" for the benefit of the soul of the master. Still, the noble declaration of Pope Gregory the Great, towards the close of the sixth century, "that slaves should be freed because Christ became man in order to redeem us," does not seem to have been the guide if the church's policy during the middle age. Larroque (L'Esclavage chez les Nations Chrétiennes,

Personal slavery having disappeared in Europe in the fourteenth century, it was revived upon a gigantic scale on this continent shortly after the discovery of America. The scarcity of labor in the New World, and the necessity for it, seem to have overcome all objections to the system, whether founded upon motives of Christian duty, or upon economic considerations. All the European nations, Catholic and Protestant, who had colonies in America, engaged in transporting slaves from the coast of Africa to this continent. The result was, that, according to the calculation of Sir Arthur Helps, there were carried between the years 1579 and 1807 more than five millions of human beings from Africa to America, where they and their descendants became slaves. For more than two centuries and a half no voice, either in the church or out of it, was publicly heard against the slave-trade and its consequences. About the middle of the eighteenth century, however, two distinct movements become apparent. They are distinct; because one was based on philosophical, and the other on Christian, grounds, and because one was confined to France, and the other to England. Upon one or the other of them, modern opinion and legislation in regard to negro slavery have been based. The philosophical basis is found in that portion of the celebrated work of Rousseau, Emile, called Profession de foi d'un Vicaire Savoyard. The views there laid down made a profound impression upon all writers on theories of government during the remainder of the century, and formed the element of strength in the French Revolution. According to Rousseau, man is a being by nature good, loving justice and order. In an ideal state of society each member would be free, and the equal of every other, — equal, because no person, or family, or class, would seek for any rights or privileges of which any other was deprived; and free, because each one would have his share in determining the rule common to all.

These doctrines, and the vast system which grew out of them, were, for various reasons, embraced with the utmost enthusiasm in France. People looked for the millennium as a consequence of their adoption to an age, when, according to Condorcet, "the sun shall shine only on freemen, when tyrants and slaves and priests shall survive only in history and on the stage." It is curious that the first public official document in which these opinions are clearly set forth should be our own Declaration of Independence; for it is there proclaimed that all men are "equal," and that "they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." So in France, the first article of "The Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen," adopted in 1789 at the beginning of the Revolution, asserts, "Men are born free and equal, and have the same rights." And as a logical result of this declaration, based upon the teaching of Rousseau, the French Convention (Feb. 4, 1791) decreed that negro slavery should be abolished in all the French colonies, and that all men therein should have the rights of French citizens. Two things are worthy of remark concerning this decree: (1) That it was the first act by which any nation in Europe decreed the abolition of slavery; and, (2) That the men and the nation adopting it were so far from being Christians, that they had, only three months before its date, enthroned and worshipped a woman as the goddess of reason in the Cathedral of Notre Dame at Paris.

By the side of these attacks of the French philosophers on slavery as a violation of natural rights, there began a movement about the same time, chiefly in England and in this country, having the same object in view, but founded wholly upon convictions of Christian duty. Conscience was here substituted for mere sentiment, as the impulse to action; and the result was that earnest, persistent, and personal work which is prompted by deep, conscientious conviction of duty. The African slave-trade was made at first the main point of attack by the abolitionists. In 1772 Granville Sharp urged its suppression on religious grounds. Just before the Revolution, Virginia petitioned that no more African slaves should be sent into the Colony; a few years later, Clarkson, a man of deeply religious nature, gave up his whole life to efforts to convince his countrymen that they should prohibit the slave-trade by law, as violating every principle of Christian humanity. The only religious denomination which as a body took an active part in this work was the Quakers, who presented to the House of Commons a petition for the abolition of the slave-trade in 1781. By incessant work, and constant agitation of the subject in the press and at public meetings, the little band of abolitionists gained the support of many prominent public men in England, Wilberforce, Pitt, Fox, and Burke among the rest. Such was the feeling roused by the discussion of the subject, and especially the general conviction of the violation of Christian duty in maintaining the traffic, that, forced at last by the outcry of the public conscience, Parliament abolished the slave-trade in 1807. This movement in England may be considered as directed wholly by Christian sentiment.

In the United States the foreign slave-trade was prohibited in 1808 by virtue of a power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. Shortly afterwards, all the maritime nations of Europe followed the example of England and of this country; and the work was fittingly crowned by the declaration of the European Congress of Vienna in 1815, engaging all the powers to discourage the traffic, as one "reproved by the law of religion and of nature;" thus recognizing the two forces, religion and philosophy, which had combined to bring about the result.

In this country the testimony of the Quakers, as a religious body, against slavery has been uniform from the beginning. In 1658 the German Friends residing in Germantown, now a part of Philadelphia, petitioned the Yearly Meeting to take measures against slaveholding. From 1696 to 1776, the society nearly every year declared "the importing, purchase, or sale of slaves" by its members to be a "disownable offence." John Woolman and Anthony Benezet, illustrious as Quaker philanthropists, were the pioneer abolitionists of modern times. In 1776 the holding of slaves was prohibited by the discipline of the Society of Friends, and since that time its members have always been conspicuous in supporting antislavery opinions and legislation.

The highest judicatory of the Presbyterian Church in this country is said (Stanton: The Church and the Rebellion, p. 398) to have made a formal declaration in favor of the abolition of slavery no less than six times between 1787 and 1836; viz., in 1787; in 1793, re-affirming its action in 1787; in 1795, by expressing "the deepest concern that any vestiges of slavery remained in the country;" in 1815, and again in 1818, denouncing slavery "as utterly inconsistent with the law of God." In 1815 and in 1819 the General Assembly (Old School) in its action, without avowing any change of opinion as to the sinfulness of slavery, dwelt more particularly upon the formidable obstacles to the practical work of emancipation. In 1861, during the Rebellion, that body being no longer hampered by complications of this kind, proclaimed openly "the evil and guilt of slavery," and its earnest desire for its extirpation.

The Methodist-Episcopal Church has been opposed to slavery from the beginning. At the organization of the General Conference in 1781, a general rule of its discipline was adopted, declaring slavery contrary "to the golden law of God and the inalienable rights of mankind," and directing that preachers holding slaves should be expelled. Still, the rule was often evaded, and not executed, out of regard for the position of the Southern members of the denomination. After 1808 slaveholding among the private members of the society was not made a subject of discipline, notwithstanding that the old rule affirming slavery to be a great evil, and that slaveholding should be a bar to office in the church, was still unrepealed.

The aggressive antislavery sentiment at the North was always very powerful among the Methodists; and in the General Conference of 1844 it was strong enough to effect the passage of a resolution by which Bishop Andrew, who had come into the possession of certain slaves in right of his wife, was requested to suspend the exercise of all episcopal functions until the slaves were freed. This led to the disruption of the conference, and the formation of two Methodist-Episcopal churches in this country,—one at the North, and the other at the South.

It must be remembered that there were, before the war, in the Northern States, vast multitudes of Christians of thoroughly anti-slavery sentiments who took no active part in the abolition movement, because they were restrained by conscientious convictions as to their duties as citizens; but when slavery was made the pretext of rebellion, and war against the government, and an attempt was made to found an empire the corner-stone of which was slavery, and especially when the National Government had decreed the emancipation of the slaves, every motive for its further toleration was removed.

SLEIDAN (originally PHILIPPSOHN), Johannes, b. at Sleidan, near Aix-la-Chapelle, 1506; d. at Strassburg, Oct. 31, 1556. He studied ancient languages and literatures at Liege and Cologne, and afterwards jurisprudence and history in Paris; embraced the Reformation; settled at Strassburg, and was much used by the Protestant princes of Germany in diplomatic missions to England, the Council of Trent, etc. His celebrated work on the history of the Reformation in Germany (De statu religionis et reipublice Carolo Quinto Cæsare commentarii, Strassburg, 1553-56) he wrote at the instance of the leaders of the Schmalcaldian League. It was translated into German, Dutch, Italian, English (with his life, London, 1689), and Swedish, and appeared in eighty editions before 1780. His De quatuor summis imperiis libri tres (1557) was very much read. On the Roman-Catholic side, Fontaine, Gennep, Surius, and Maimburg wrote against him. [See BAUNGARTEN: *Ueber S's Leben u. SMALLEY, John, D.D., b. in Columbia, Conn., June 4, 1734; d. in New Britain, Conn., June 1, 1820, within three days of being eighty-six years old. He was prepared for Yale College by his pastor, Eleazer Wheelock, afterward president of Dartmouth; was befriended while at Yale by Ezra Stiles, afterward president of the college; was graduated in 1756. He was thought by Dr. Wheelock to have been converted in early childhood. At the age of six years he had been deeply affected by the preaching of Whitefield. In college, however, he began to doubt the genuineness of his conversion, became painfully despondent, and at length ascribed what he sometimes called his actual, and sometimes his second, conversion, to the reading of Edwards on the Will. This was one of the facts which led him through life to oppose all religious excitements which did not spring from the influence of religious doctrine. It led him to become a leader in the contest against the fanaticism of the Separatists, against the Half-way Covenant, — a leader in defence of the New-England theology.

Having pursued his theological studies with Dr. Joseph Bellamy, he was ordained April 19, 1758, over the Congregational Church in New Britain, Conn. He remained in this pastorate more than fifty-five years — without a colleague, more than fifty-one years. In the pulpit he fixed his eyes on his manuscript, read it with a harsh and nasal voice, with few, and those awkward, gestures; yet he chained the attention of his hearers by his exhibition of naked doctrines, — often the distinguishing doctrines of Calvinism. The marked success of his pastorate is a matter of historical interest. His success as a theological instructor was yet more remarkable. Twenty of his pupils can now be remembered. One of them was an eminent revivalist, and was accustomed to read in the pulpit a printed sermon of Smalley, and to read it with such impressive elocution that the reports of its influence are well-nigh fabulous. Two of Smalley's pupils were Nathanael Emmons of Franklin, and Ebenezer Porter, who, as a professor at Andover, exerted a formative influence on the seminary. Two other theological pupils of Smalley turned their attention afterward from the ministerial to the legal profession. One of these was Oliver Ellsworth, who became chief justice of the United States; the other was Jeremiah Mason, to whom Daniel Webster ascribed much of his own success at the bar. The pupils of Smalley were charmed with his wit, but often awed by the severity of his criticisms. He studied fourteen hours a day, yet made no parade of learning. He was confident in his opinions, and impatient of contradiction, but was venerated for his profound and simple-hearted piety.

Four of his sermons had an epochal influence. Two of the four were on Natural and Moral Inability, published in 1769, republished in England. Two were entitled Justification through Christ an Act of Free Grace, and None but Believers saved through the All-Sufficient Satisfaction of Christ, 1786, 1787, repeatedly republished. In addition to other sermons in separate pamphlets, Dr. Smalley published in 1803 a volume of Discourses, and in 1814, when he was eighty years old, a second volume. EDWARDS A. PARK.

SMARAGDUS, abbot of the monastery of St. Michael, situated on the Meuse, in the diocese of Verdun, was one of the most learned theologians of the Carolingian age, and held in great esteem both by Charlemagne and Lewis the Pious. His writings, however, consisting of commentaries on the New Testament, on the rules of St. Benedict, etc., are mere compilations, altogether without originality. They are found in Migne: Patrol. Lat., vol. 102. — Another Smaragdus, whose true name was Ardo, was a friend of Benedict of Aniane, and wrote his life. See Act. Sanct., and Migne: Patr. Lat., vol. 103. ZÜCKLER.

SMART, Christopher, b. at Shipbourne, Kent, 1722; d. in the King's Bench prison, 1771; fellow of Pembroke College, Cambridge, 1745; followed literature in London, and led a disorderly and dissipated life, which did not quench his religious feeling. Among his works are The Parables of Christ done into Verse, 1765; On the Divine Attributes; and A Translation of the Psalms of David attempted in the Spirit of Christianity, with Hymns for the Fasts and Festivals, 4to, 1765. These are piously intended, and curious, but met with no success. More memorable is his Song to David, written on the wall of a madhouse, or, according to the old tradition, indented with a key on the wainscot, he being debarred the use of pen, ink, and paper. F. ble remonstrance from the unjust imputations of frivolousness and falsehood; wherein the cause of liturgy and episcopacy is further debated. The debate was upon these two heads: (1) of the antiquity of liturgies, or forms of prayer; (2) of the apostolical institution of diocesan episcopacy. SMITH, Eli, a distinguished American missionary, and translator of the Bible into Arabic; was b. at Northford, Conn., Sept. 15, 1801; d. at Beyrout, Syria, Jan. 11, 1857. He graduated at Yale College, 1821, and at Andover Seminary in 1826; and in May of the same year embarked as a missionary of the American Board to Malta. In 1827 he went to Beyrout, and in March, 1830, undertook with Mr. Dwight, under directions from the American Board, a journey through Persia, to get information concerning the Nestorian Christians. The expedition, which lasted a year, and during which the travellers visited the grave of Henry Martyn at Tocat, resulted in the establishment of a mission among that people. Smith published an account of the journey, in Missionary Researches in Armenia, of the Rev. Eli Smith and H. G. O. Dwight, etc. (Boston, 1833, 2 vols., London, 1834). In 1838 Dr. Smith accompanied Dr. Edward Robinson on a journey from Suez through the Sinaitic peninsula and up the Jordan. He accompanied the same scholar on his journey in 1852, and contributed materially to the accuracy and discoveries of Robinson's Researches. In 1846 he began his translation of the Bible into Arabic, having the assistance of Butrus el-Bistany and Nasif el-Yasijee. By August, 1853, he had completed the translation of the four Gospels. Before his death he succeeded in translating the entire New Testament, and the Pentateuch, historical books, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and other portions of the Old Testament. His labors have been supplemented by the scholarship of Dr. Van Dyke. Dr. Smith possessed eminent attainments in Arabic, and will always have a distinguished place in the annals of the American mission at Beyrout. For a good account of his life, see Missionary Herald, 1857, pp. 224-229.

SMITH, George, b. in England about 1825; d. at Aleppo, Aug. 19, 1876. He began life as bank-note, copper and steel plate engraver; taught himself the Oriental languages, and first came into prominence in 1866 by a contribution to The London Athenaeum, upon the Tribute of Jehu, which revealed his studies, assiduously carried on at leisure moments, of the Ninevite sculptures in the British Museum. In 1867 he was appointed a senior assistant of the Lower Section in the department of Egyptian and Oriental Antiquities in the British Museum, and from thence on stood in the first rank of Assyrian scholars. He made expeditions to Nineveh in 1873 at the expense of the London Daily Telegraph (newspaper), and in 1874 and 1875 on behalf of the British Museum, and obtained immense treasure in cuneiform inscriptions, etc. His popular works were Assyrian Discoveries (1875), History of Assyria from the Monuments (1875), The Assyrian Epigraphic Canon (1875), Chaldean Account of Genesis (1876, new ed. by Sayce, 1880), History of Sennacherib. SMITH, Henry Boynton, D.D., LL.D., an eminent American scholar and divine; b. in Portland, Me., Nov. 21, 1815; d. in New York, Feb. 7, 1877. He was graduated at Bowdoin College in the class of 1834; studied theology at Andover and Bangor, and then spent a year as tutor in Greek, and librarian, at Bowdoin. Late in 1837 he went abroad on account of ill-health, and passed the winter in Paris, hearing lectures at the Sorbonne, at the Institute, and at the Royal Academy. The next two years were spent chiefly at Halle and Berlin, in enriching his mind with the treasures of German thought and culture. The friendships formed at this time with Tholuck, Ulrich, Neander, Twisten, Baron von Kottwitz, Kahnis, Besser, Godet, and others, eminent then or since as theologians and men of faith, he counted among the greatest blessings of his life abroad. After a short visit to England, he returned home in the summer of 1840, and was at once licensed to preach the gospel. But his health again gave way, delaying his settlement until the close of 1842, when he was ordained as pastor of the Congregational Church at West Amesbury, Mass. Here he labored four years with zeal and success, supplying also during two winters the chair of Hebrew at Andover. In 1847 he became professor of mental and moral philosophy in Amherst College. In 1850 he accepted a call to the chair of church history in the Union Theological Seminary of New-York City. Three years later he was transferred to the chair of systematic theology. In both departments he wrought with the hand of a master, and, alike by his teaching and his writings, won a commanding position as one of the foremost scholars and divines of the country. His influence was soon felt throughout the Presbyterian Church, and was especially powerful in shaping opinion in the New School branch of it to which he belonged. He wrote a good deal for the editorial columns of The New-York Evangelist, on religious and ecclesiastical topics of the day; while in The American Theological Review, in The American Presbyterian and Theological Review, and, later, in The Presbyterian Quarterly and Princeton Review, he discussed the leading philosophical and theological questions of the age. Of the first-named review he was the sole editor, and of the other two he was joint editor. He contributed articles on Schelling, Hegel, Calvin, Pantheism, the Reformed Churches, and other subjects, to Appletons' Cyclopædia. In 1859 he published Tables of Church History, a work embodying the results of vast labor. In 1863 he was elected moderator of the General Assembly at Philadelphia, and the next year, at Dayton, preached a sermon before that body on Christian Union and Ecclesiastical Re-union, which did much to bring together again the two severed branches of the Presbyterian Church. He took a leading part in the memorable Union Convention at Philadelphia in 1867. During the war he wrote very ably in support of the national cause. In 1859 he revisited Europe, also in 1866, and again in 1869. The latter visit, which was caused by overwork and the breaking-down of his system, lasted a year and a half, and included a journey to the East. After his return he resumed his labors in the seminary, but with health so greatly enfeebled, that early in 1874 he resigned his chair, and was made professor emeritus. After long struggles with disease, and severe suffering, he entered into rest.

Whether regarded as a theologian, as a philosophical thinker, or as a general scholar and critic, Dr. Smith was one of the most gifted and accomplished men of his time. Such was the opinion of him often expressed by those best qualified to judge, both at home and abroad. Unfortunately, with the exception of his invaluable History of the Church of Christ, in Chronological Tables, his writings consist chiefly of occasional discourses, essays, and reviews. But, although occasional, they discuss many of the most important and vital questions of the age; and they do it with such exhaustive power, that in several instances the discourse or essay might readily be enlarged into a book, with no other change than that of greater fulness of statement and illustration. His address at Andover in 1849, on The Relations of Faith and Philosophy, may serve as an example. The strong points are so vividly presented, the principles involved are set forth with such distinctness, the discussion is so luminous and complete, that a whole treatise on the subject could hardly add to the force of the argument. This address was greatly admired, and at once attracted to its author general attention. It was reprinted in Edinburgh, and elicited the highest praise from such men as Sir William Hamilton and Rev. Dr. John Brown. Referring to this address, and to the inaugural discourse on Church History, Mr. Bancroft, the eminent historian, wrote to Dr. Smith, "I know no one in the country but yourself who could have written them." It is not too much to say that the United States has produced no theologian who combined in a higher degree than Dr. Smith great learning, the best literary and philosophical culture, wise, discriminating thought, and absolute devotion to Christ and his kingdom.<sup>1</sup> It is deeply to be regretted that he was not spared to give to the public his theological system. It had been elaborated with the utmost care, contained the ripe fruit of his genius, as well as of his faith and his lifelong studies, and would have been a lasting boon to the world. Its informing idea is happily expressed in his early address at Andover; as, e.g., in the passage, "Christianity is not only an historic revelation and an internal experience, but also an organic, diffusive, plastic, and triumphant force in human history; and in this history, as in the revelation and as in the experience, the centre around which all revolves is the person of Jesus Christ." Professor Smith was specially gifted as a theological teacher, arousing enthusiasm in his students, inspiring them with reverence for the Holy Scriptures, fostering in them a devout, earnest, catholic spirit, dealing gently and wisely with their doubts; and impressing upon them continually, alike by example and instruction, the sovereign claims of their Redeemer, the glory of his kingdom, and the blessedness of a life consecrated to him. His services to the Union Theological Seminary were varied and inestimable. The Presbyterian Church in the United States also owes him a lasting debt of gratitude. He has been called "the hero of re-union," and certainly no man better merited the praise. His genial influence as a teacher of divine truth was equally wide and strong, and, wherever felt, it was an ennobling and irenic influence, tending to exalt the faith once delivered to the saints, and to draw closer together all sincere disciples of Jesus. Nor did his influence cease with his death. His name continues to be spoken with love and reverence; his opinions are still full of vital force; and all schools of Christian thought appeal to him as to a master in Israel. A very full and admirable account of him will be found in Henry Boynton Smith: his Life and Work, edited by his wife, New York, 1881. Smith*, edited by Dr. Prentiss, New York, 1877; Apologetics, a Course of Lectures, 1882; *Introduction to Christian Theology, comprising (I.) A General Introduction, (II.) SMITH, John, the Cambridge Platonist; b. at Achurch, near Oundle, in Northamptonshire, 1618; entered Emmanuel College, Cambridge, April, 1638; chosen fellow of Queen's, 1644; d. there Aug. 7, 1652. His fame rests upon his posthumous Select Discourses (London, 1660, 4th ed., Cambridge, 1859), which "show an uncommon reach of understanding, and penetration, as well as an immense treasure of learning in their author." See his biography in the Discourses; JOHN TULLOCH: Rational Theology, vol. ii.; art. PLATONISTS (CAMBRIDGE).

SMITH, John Cotton, D.D., Protestant-Episcopal; b. at Andover, Mass., Aug. 4, 1826; d. in New-York City, Monday, Jan. 9, 1882. He was a descendant of John Cotton and Cotton Mather, and a grandson of Dr. Leonard Woods; graduated at Bowdoin College in 1847; was from 1850 to 1852 rector of St. John's Church, Bangor, Me.; from 1852 to 1859, assistant minister in Trinity Church, Boston; and from 1860 till his death, rector of the Church of the Ascension, New-York City. He was an able scholar, an eloquent preacher, a most influential leader of thought in his church, and one of the originators of the "Church Congress;" while in his public relations he was a large-hearted philanthropist, ready to do all in his power for the general good; prominently connected with the Bible Society, the Evangelical Alliance, the Board of Missions, and particularly interested in temperance-house reform. He edited Church and State, was a frequent contributor to the press, and published Miscellanies, Old and New (New York, 1876), and Brier Hill Lectures on Present Aspects of the Church, New York, 1881. By his writings, sermons, and addresses, and by the attractive influence of his personal character, he did more, perhaps, than any one person of his time to develop a generous spirit of toleration between various schools of thought, and that state of harmony which now prevails in the Episcopal Church. G. F. FLICHTNER.

<sup>1</sup> "Ich habe HENRY B. SMITH, John Pye, D.D., LL.D., b. at Sheffield, May 25, 1774; d. at Guildford, Surrey (London), Feb. 5, 1851; an English Congregational divine and author; studied theology at Rotherham College, under Rev. Dr. Edward Williams; was professor of theology at Homerton College from 1805 to 1850. A man of unusual learning, and of most admirable Christian spirit. He was one of the earliest among dissenters to recognize the value of the contributions to theology made by German scholars, and to essay a reconciliation between modern science and divine revelation, bringing on himself thereby no small suspicion on the part of less enlightened brethren. His Scripture Testimony to the Messiah (London, 1818-21, 2 vols., 6th ed., 1868) is an elaborate exegetical study of all the passages of Scripture referring to Christ. In Four Discourses on the Sacrifice and Priesthood of Jesus Christ (London, 1828, 5th ed., Edinb., 1868) he defends the Evangelical against the Socinian doctrine. Scripture and Geology (London, 1839, 5th ed., 1854) was the Congregational Lecture for 1839. His First Lines of Christian Theology was published after his death (1854, 2d ed., 1860), and contains his lectures to his classes, in syllabus form. See J. MEDWAY: Memoirs of the Life and Writings of John Pye Smith, London, 1853. F. H. MARLING.

SMITH, Samuel Stanhope, D.D., LL.D., Presbyterian; b. at Pequea, Penn., March 16, 1759; d. at Princeton, N.J., Aug. 21, 1819. He was graduated from Princeton College, 1767; tutor there, 1770-73; first president of Hampden Sidney College, 1775; professor of moral philosophy, 1779; and president, 1794-1812. In 1786 he was a member of the committee which drew up the Form of Government of the Presbyterian Church. He had a high reputation as a pulpit orator and a college president. He published Sermons, Newark, N.J., 1799; Evidences of Christian Religion, Phila., 1809; Moral and Political Philosophy, Trenton, N.J., 1812; Principles of Natural and Revealed Religion, New Brunswick, N.J., 1815; (posthumous) Sermons, with Memoir, Philadelphia, 1821, 2 vols. See SPRAGUE: Annals, iii. 335-345.

SMITH, Sydney, Church of England; b. at Woodford, Essex, June 3, 1771; d. in London, Feb. 22, 1845. He was graduated at Oxford, 1792; took holy orders, 1794; was minister of Charlotte Episcopal chapel, Edinburgh, 1797-1802; canon of Bristol, 1828; and canon residentiary of St. Paul's, 1831. He is one of the most famous of English wits; but he was also a forcible, earnest preacher, and a sagacious critic and reviewer. He was the first editor of The Edinburgh Review. Besides numerous Sermons, he published Letters on the Subject of the Catholics by Peter Plymley, London, 1808, which did much to promote Catholic emancipation, and Elementary Sketches of Moral Philosophy, 1850. See his Memoir by his daughter, Lady HOLLAND, London and New York, 1855, 2 vols., and the art. in ALLIBONE.

SMITH, William Andrew, D.D., a leading minister of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South; b. at Fredericksburg, Va., Nov. 29, 1802; d. at Richmond, Va., March 1, 1870. His parents dying when he was quite young, he was kindly cared for and brought up in the family of Mr. Hill, a worthy merchant of Petersburg, Va. He professed religion at seventeen years of age, prepared for the ministry, and was admitted into the Virginia Conference in 1825. He rose rapidly to eminence in the conference. In 1833 he was appointed agent for Randolph-Macon College, then in its infancy. In September of that year, by a painful accident, he was made a cripple for life. He continued to fill many of the most important stations in his conference until 1846, when he was called to the presidency of Randolph-Macon College, and while here he raised, largely by his own personal efforts, an endowment of one hundred thousand dollars. This position, as well as that of professor of mental and moral philosophy, he filled with great acceptability and efficiency until 1866, when he moved to St. Louis, Mo. After serving here as pastor of Centenary Church for two years, he became president of Central College, located at Fayette in that State, and raised for the institution at once, by his personal exertion, about a hundred thousand dollars. About this time he became the victim of a fatal malady, which two years later, while on a visit to Richmond, Va., terminated in his death. He was a member of every general conference from 1832 till his death. At the eventful general conference of 1844 he took a specially prominent part; and in the celebrated appeal of Rev. Francis A. Harding, and in the extra-judicial trial of Bishop James O. Andrew, he won a national reputation for deliberative and forensic eloquence and for rare powers of argument and debate. From that time he became one of the foremost men in Southern Methodism. He was a hard student and an earnest thinker. His sermons were clear, forcible, and instructive, being able discussions of the cardinal doctrines of the gospel. He was more of a logician than of an orator, yet his logic was not cold and dry, but steeped in emotion, and aglow with zeal. His ministry was blessed with powerful revivals. He was always bold to avow and defend his sentiments, regardless of consequences. The vigor and clearness of his intellect, his candor, independence, energy, and unquestioned ability, caused him to stand in the front rank of the leading minds in the Methodist-Episcopal Church South. (See biographical sketch by Bishop J. C. GRANBERY, in the General Minutes for 1870.) His Philosophy and Practice of Slavery (Nashville, 1857) attracted wide attention, and was universally recognized as one of the ablest presentations of the Southern side of the slavery question ever published. W. F. TILLET.

SMYRNA, situated on the Hærmæan Gulf on the coast of Lydia, became very prosperous after the time of Alexander the Great, and was, during the first two centuries of the Christian era, one of the principal commercial centres of the world, and the richest and most beautiful city of Asia Minor. It contained a Jewish and a Christian congregation, and the latter had occasion to prove its faith under persecutions instituted by the former (Rev. i. 11, ii. 8). Its venerable bishop, Polycarp, suffered martyrdom under Marcus Aurelius in 169. The city was almost totally destroyed by an earthquake in 178. It has now a mixed population of about 180,000.

SMYTH, John, founder of the General Baptists; date of birth unknown; d. in Holland in 1612. Like many of the separatists he was a Cambridge man; matriculated as a prizeman of Christ's College, 1571, where John Milton afterwards studied; took his B.A. 1575-76; was elected a fellow, and commenced his M.A. 1579; afterwards he was lecturer at Lincoln, and then became vicar of Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, Eng. Seized by the time-spirit, he was restless, fervid, earnest, and thoroughgoing. At the university he was cited before the vice-chancellor for defending Sunday, and at Gainsborough he battled against the separatists in defence of the English Church. But his persistent pursuit of truth precluded content with Puritanism. For "nine months" he was perplexed about the "separation," and disputed with the chief Puritan leaders, but only to become pastor of a church of the separatist or independent type in the year 1602. How he became a Baptist is not clear. An old church book at Crowle, Lincolnshire, whose authentic character Dr. Dexter vehemently denies, says he was baptized in 1600, at midnight, in the River Don, by Elder John Morton. But his adversaries charged him with baptizing himself. Be that as it may, it is clear that he emigrated, along with his little flock, to Amsterdam, where "he was sometime pastor to a company of honest and godly men," forming "the Second English Church at Amsterdam," and sustaining himself by practising physic. Since 1591 James Arminius had been setting forth his theological theses in opposition to Gomarus; and the "First English Church," a Barrowist or separatist Church, of which Francis Johnson was pastor, and Henry Ainsworth teacher, was vigorously discussing the burning question of the hour, — the nature of a visible church. In these circumstances Smyth accepted Arminian doctrine, took an anti-Pædobaptist view of baptism, and, along with Thomas Helwys, published a "Confession of Faith" in twenty-six articles, of the General-Baptist pattern. Smyth died; but Helwys and some of his comrades came to London, and founded the General-Baptist Church of England. Smyth was a man of incorruptible sincerity, beautiful humility, glowing charity, a fair scholar, and a good preacher.

Smyth wrote Principles and Inferences concerning the Visible Church (Amsterdam, 1607), Parallels, Censures, Observations (1609), Character of the Beast (1609), Differences of the Churches of the Separation, Amsterdam.

General Baptists, also called Arminian, Free-will, and Free Baptists. I. Origin. — Traces of churches of the General-Baptist type are found in the reign of Henry VIII., at Eyethorne, Kent, Eng., and Bocking, or Braintree, in Essex. But the organized life of the General Baptists dates from 1611 (that of the Particular or Calvinistic Baptists from 1633), and becomes a distinct historical and continuous force under the leadership of John Smyth (q.v.), Thomas Helwys, John Morton, Leonard Busher, Henry Denne, and Dr. Du Veil.

II. Their Doctrinal Basis embraced, (1) the universality of redemption, hence the name of "General," (2) the obligation of baptism on all believers in Christ, (3) the essentially spiritual character of the church, and (4) the principle of absolute religious liberty, along with other doctrines common to the Reformed Faith of the opening years of the seventeenth century. Professor Masson, in his Life of Milton, vol. iii., states that the General Baptists were the first to pronounce with energy and distinctness in favor of the great modern idea of absolute liberty of conscience. Cf. Busher's book quoted at end.

III. Their organization embraced, (1) "assemblies," for the transaction of business common to the welfare of all the churches, not annual at first, but as occasion required; (2) "messengers," or "apostles," who visited the churches to "stir them up," and were also sent out to preach, not only in different parts of England, but also to Ireland, and even to Virginia and South Carolina (MS. Proceedings of General Baptist Assembly, vol. ii. 32); (3) "elders," or pastors of churches; (4) "deacons," or helps in government. The churches were not fixed to any one building, but consisted of members scattered over wide areas, meeting in several buildings, and sometimes having two or three "elders." The discipline was most rigid, and extended to speech and dress. In this and other matters they were closely akin to the early Friends, or Quakers.

IV. Growth. — The General Baptists spread rapidly in the first quarter of a century of their existence. In 1645 there were forty churches in London. During the Commonwealth they were planted in most of the midland and southern counties of England, and had grown so extensively, that Thomas Grantham (1634-92), author of Christianismus Primitivus (published 1678, London), describes a petition presented to Charles II. in 1662, as representing 20,000 General Baptists. Increased to 30,000 in 1692, they must have been one of the most numerous, as they were one of the most vigorous, of the English religious bodies.

V. Decay. — Several causes contributed to the rapid decline which followed. (1) They lacked organizers, like George Fox and John Wesley, and not a few General-Baptist churches passed over to the Quakers. (2) Men of culture and ability were rare in the ministry. An educated pastorate was slighted. (3) They made their centre rural, and not metropolitan. (4) But chiefly they fell under the blight of that negative and critical spirit which nearly destroyed English Presbyterianism, enervated the Particular Baptists, Independents, and Episcopalians, and made the eighteenth century one of feeble convictions and sharp debate, of acute reasoning and practical godlessness. Matthew Caffyn, one of the "messengers," and elder of Horsham Church, in Surrey, was charged with Arianism. Discussion concerning the person of Christ became heated and hurtful; and in 1696 a rupture took place, and a fresh body, called "The General Association," was formed, in repudiation of Arianism. Three years afterwards a reconciliation was effected on a seemingly orthodox basis; but it was not enduring, and in 1709 the friends of comprehension withdrew, and re-organized themselves on the "Six Principles" of Heb. vi. 1, 2, and the declarations of the Assembly of 1663. This division lasted till 1731, when they came together again on the understanding that difference of opinion concerning the Trinity and the person of Christ should be allowed.

VI. The New Connection. — For the next forty years Arianism was quietly gaining sway, when in 1770 the New Connection of General Baptists was formed in Whitechapel, London, out of (1) ten churches, containing 659 members, belonging to the assembly, and located in the south; (2) five churches, embracing 870 members, in Leicestershire, Derbyshire, and Warwickshire, that had formed themselves on the General Baptist type solely by the study of the Scriptures; and (3) a community of 69 members, which arose in a similar fashion in Yorkshire under the Methodist Dan Taylor (q.v.), who forthwith became the leader of the New Connection. The object of this new federation was "to revive experimental religion or primitive Christianity in faith and practice;" and the basis of agreement added to the principles above named (§ ii.) the declaration that "our Lord Jesus is God and man united in one person, or possessed of divine perfection united to human nature in a way which we pretend not to explain, but think ourselves bound by the word of God firmly to believe." The 1,600 members were 3,178 in 1795, 7,673 in 1820, 17,913 in 1845, 21,066 in 1870, and 26,621 in 1883. A college (now at Nottingham, Rev. Thomas Goady, B.A., principal) was started in 1797 by Dan Taylor. It has two scholarships (value, £30 each), a large library, thirteen students, an income of £800 per annum, and is affiliated for classical and scientific tuition with the Nottingham University. Home-mission work was started in 1811, and last year received over £2,000. Missions to Orissa, India, sprang in 1816 from the impact of the earnest spirit of the Rev. J. G. Pike (1784-1851), author of Persuasive to Early Piety, etc., and were greatly promoted by Francis Sutton, D.D. (1802-54), author of the hymn "Hail, sweetest, dearest tie that binds," and originator of the missions of the Freewill Baptists of America to Northern Orissa, and of the Baptist mission to the Telegus. The society also works in Rome, Italy. Income, £8,000 per annum. The Building Fund, established in 1865, has a capital of £6,000. Four thousand pounds were spent on Sunday-school work in 1882. The Messenger, started in 1798, has a large circulation. Rev. John Clifford, M.A., D.D., editor. There are 191 churches in England, with 25,131 members, and 143 ministers; in Orissa, 9 churches, 16 mission-stations, 16 missionaries, 22 native ministers, 5 ministerial students, 1,175 church-members, and a native Christian community of 3,064; in Rome there is one church of 18 members, two mission-rooms, a missionary, and an evangelist.

VII. In the original body an unaggressive Arianism has gradually gained the ascendant; and for more than a century there has been a steady decline in numbers, interest, and power. Some of the churches have joined the new body; others have united with the Pedobaptists; but more have become defunct. In 1801 they were reduced to thirty-five churches and 1,300 members; in 1883 there is not half a score of churches, nor 500 members; and the only two churches that are thriving have pastors from the New Connection, who have been accepted without any surrender of belief.

VIII. Present Numbers. — In England, 25,431; Orissa, 1,175; Rome, 18; in America, — Free- will (date from 1770), 78,000; Church of God (1830), 30,000; Free Christian Baptists of New Brunswick, and Free Baptists of Nova Scotia, 14,000; Generals, of the West (1824), 13,000; Separate, 7,000; the Original Freewill or General Baptists of North Carolina, 10,000; Cumberland Free Baptists, 1,000; the Goldsborough Baptists, 4,000. Total, over 183,000.

From 1794 until 1830 he was a minister of the Methodist-Episcopal Church; but in 1830 he joined in the organization of the Methodist-Protestant Church, and took thenceforth a prominent position in it. He preached in all parts of the country, and was much admired for his eloquence. SOCIALISM. This word, of modern origin, does not explain itself fully. By its connection with social, socialize, it ought to denote a doctrine or system which aims to make men social, or, more exactly, to bring about the ends involved in the social nature of man; or, if we give prominence to the supposed abuses of society, the system of equity and equality by which the abuses which are found in society, especially in old, established societies, may be removed. Giving to it some such definition, we find it to be a broader term than communism, which, by rules freely adopted, or by public force, aims at a common life on principles of equality, as far as their application is possible amid the natural differences of human beings. But communistic experiments, although numerous if we glean them carefully out of the history of mankind, are all on the small scale, and, for the most part, are tried for particular purposes, such as for the pursuit of a religious life; or they are merely philosophical speculations, which seldom are put into practice. They are temporary, like the early Christian community at Jerusalem, where the exceptional poverty of many believers led to an equality of goods; or they are sanctioned by political communities, owing to a pervading opinion of their religious character, or for some other use, like monastic brotherhoods; or, whatever be the principle of their unions, they need the consent of the government and society to their existence, and thus depend on the general will of the great community around them, as well as on the permanent will of a succession of members, to keep up the same forms of common life. Thus, unless the society which surrounds them, although constructed on wholly different principles, defends and protects them, they will dwindle away, or will disband of themselves. Where they have been tolerably successful, their success seems to be partly due to an abridgment of the rights of the families of which they are composed, and to a mode of life, which, if adopted by all, would be far from promoting the ends of human brotherhood.

Communism, then, is no cure, on any theory, for the evils or corruptions of society. If it had a cure within itself, it could be of little avail, inasmuch as it withdraws its healing influences from society, and yet depends on society for protection. All separate communities, therefore, contain an anti-social principle. They are in spirit unlike families, and to a certain extent there is an opposition between their feeling and that of families. The family is so small a society, that it is obliged to look for the supply of a multitude of wants to the outside world, and feels the protection of society in all things and continually. "The union of family life and communal life," as we have elsewhere remarked, "is not fitted to make the community system flourish. The two are different, and, to an extent, hostile principles. The family must draw off the interests of its members from the larger or communistic body which encloses it, and concentrate them on itself." "The family implies a sort of privacy and seclusion from the world, without separation: the community implies separation from the world, and a new unity, inconsistent with, or controlling, the family union." Plato, in his republic, would not let the citizens of the warrior class know who their own children were, because they would thus have separate and personal interests. The communistic spirit, as distinguished from the socialistic, is indifferent to the good of the family, or hostile to it, and makes use of the power of society for its own protection, without doing any thing for society in return. If a whole nation were divided up into communities, the national strength and the family tie both would be weakened. A state so constituted would resemble, in important respects, one consisting of small brotherhoods, or gentes, or septs, but with much less of the family tie than is found in the latter when general society is as yet undeveloped.

We now come to consider the essence and genius of socialism: and here at the outset we labor under a serious difficulty; it has never been tried, and remains as yet a theory. Communistic systems have been tried, and one system learns from the failures and follies of an earlier system, without doing any great harm to society and the state; or it may remain untried, a beautiful vision, serving to show the distance of society at present from the perfect idea of a commonwealth. But a socialistic theory cannot be put to the test without becoming part of the public law, or, rather, without having a power given to a government, by which the state exercises control over labor and capital, and over every thing into which they enter. And, in order to do this, the existing capital must be prevented from doing what it does now: hence as capital, through the rights of testament and inheritance, now presents a firm front to sweeping changes of laws, and has continued to do this for ages, there must be a sudden or a gradual crippling of these rights, and a destruction of capital on a scale such as the world has never seen. No conquest of civilized lands by barbarians ever swept from a land its motives to industry, its landowners, its manufacturers, its capital in general, to such an extent as such a system of reform. A revolution in industry, in property, in ownership, more thorough than has ever been known, must be the preface of this new social system; and the principles on which the revolution would be begun would prevent the system of free competition, free movement and choice of work, free use of capital, from appearing again, except by a similar revolution long afterwards, begun on the ruins of a vast social experiment.

It is evident, that, in order to bring about such a revolution in the relations of capital to labor, the government itself must be invested with new power, such as no constitutional government has ever had, and no people has ever favored. The necessity of absolute power in the state has been acknowledged by socialists to be indispensable, as a means of overthrowing the existing relations of capital to labor. And, indeed, the necessity is too apparent to be doubted. If the state itself is to take the office of being sole capitalist, all other proprietors must be sooner or later "expropriated." If it is to be the sole producer, through its capital invested in machinery and land, it can have, of course, no competitor. If, for instance, it decides what kinds of stuffs for wear shall be made, of course no others from abroad can be imported and sold in the land. It must determine the quality and quantity of things made. It must own the manufactories, it must put an end to all money-lending by private persons. Its power is shown to be tremendous by the single consideration that it must be authorized to remove laborers en masse from place to place, and to decide practically what objects shall be made in all the employments of life.

The experiment of modern times which comes nearest to socialism is that initiated by Louis Blanc, who has recently died, after winning distinction by his historical writings, and who was so prominent in his party at the downfall of Louis Philippe, in 1848, as to be chosen a member of the Provisional Government in France. He had, however, but a brief opportunity to put his plan of organizing labor into practice. Being compromised in the disturbances of May, 1848, he fled to England, where he lived many years. His social starting-point is not a new one.

"It is not the man who is responsible for his wrong-doings, but society; and hence a society which is strong, and settled on a good basis, will make the individual good. The evils of slavery flow from inequality, and that from property. Property, then [i.e., personal or family property], is the great scourge of society: it is the veritable public crime.

"Government should be the supreme regulator of production, and be invested with power enough to accomplish its task. It should raise money, which should be appropriated without payment of interest, for the creation of social workshops (ateliers) in the most important branches of national industry. In these workshops there should be the same wages for all. They should form a solidarity among themselves, and thus, when united with agricultural labor, would consolidate in one the whole industry of the country. The funds necessary for this organization of labor could be in part derived from lapsed collateral inheritances. The effect of thus aiding the ateliers would obviously be to render it impossible for private undertakers to compete with the national shops. Thus concurrence would cease, and private work would yield to the public, or socialistic system.

"In 1848 this system of Louis Blanc was so far put to the test that public ateliers were opened; and in Paris a hundred and fifty thousand workmen were employed in them at a daily expense of fifty thousand dollars. National ruin was near, if the system should continue. The workmen proved to be a dangerous element in the population. The emeute of May and that of June, in which many of the workmen in these national ateliers took part, furnished a pretext for putting an end to the experiment."—See COMMUNISM AND SOCIALISM, pp. 123, 124, by the writer of this article.

The importance of what Louis Blanc projected lay, not in the novelty of his suggestions, but in his bringing the minds of men to a practical point, where the transformation of society could begin without any preparatory overturning. It was also instructive in showing what could be easily foretold,—that the difficulties of a transition from a condition of individual property and free acquisition to the abolition of individual property is no easy one. In fact, a change like this could not be accomplished without a struggle of classes and interests such as has seldom, if ever, been known in the world; and, if it should succeed in a single country, every contiguous country, every civilized country, would feel the necessity of resisting it to preserve its own prosperity, its commerce, its safety against the strife of classes, its good hopes for the future. Yet the danger in a number of European states from socialistic doctrines was soon shown to be serious. A class of society, which was now called the proletariat, or the laboring-class, began to take an attitude of hostility to the bourgeoisie, or class of employers, in many parts of Europe, and a division of society began to arise which had been unknown on so large a scale and in such favorable circumstances before. One peculiarity of the new movement was that the modern science of political economy had come to be propagated among the operatives of the towns; another was the free movement of opinions from one country to another; a third, the increasing decay of religious faith and the spread of free thinking; another still, the impunity with which demagogues could spread revolutionary opinions through the lower strata of society, and, again, the greater ease of co-operation, not only among the laborers of the same crafts in the same centres of industry, but also among workmen of all civilized lands. These causes, appearing not suddenly, but by slow degrees, together with the increased communication between different lands, with the growth of individual liberty, and, to an extent, with the progress of education, seemed to be leading society into new breakers on a great scale, and to be bringing on an antagonism between governments and large masses of their subjects.

Before the February revolution in 1848, there had been workmen's associations in several countries of Europe, and some very able leaders began their career before that period, such as, among the Germans, Marx (recently dead), Engels, and Liebknecht; but the International Workingmen's Association was not formed until 1864. Long before this, Marx aided in a manifesto of the communist party, which called on the proletariats of all lands to unite. "It demanded the abolition of private property in the soil, centralization of credit in a state bank, union of the means of intercourse in the hands of the state, national workshops, fertilizing and tilling the soil on a common prescribed plan, and gratuitous instruction." The plan of the General Association contemplated an annual congress of deputies, consisting of one from each branch association, section, or group, or of two when the members of the primaries amounted to more than five hundred. A general council of fifty was to meet at London, and every subordinate union, also, was to have a committee or council. The union spread through nearly all the countries of Europe, except in the German lands and in Austria, where the Workingmen's Union, founded by Lassalle, had pre-occupied the field.

Our limits forbid us to speak of the proceedings of this union at any length. At the congress of Lausanne, in 1867, it was maintained that "modern production on a great scale renders co-operative industry a necessity," and "that the state ought to be made the holder of the means of transport and circulation in order to annihilate the powerful monopoly of great companies." At the congresses of 1868 and 1869 a report on property revealed a difference of opinion, proving that the extreme theorists had not yet got complete ascendancy. In 1868 it was decided that the ways of communication, and forests, soil, mines, coal-pits, and railroads ought to be common property. Dupont, general secretary of the International, used at this congress the following language: "We want no governments any longer, for governments oppress us by taxes; we want no armies any more, for armies butcher and murder us; we want no religion any longer, for religion stifles the understanding." At the congress of Basel, in 1869, it was moved and carried that society may abolish individual property, putting collective property in its place in the soil. On the same occasion a motion that the right of inheritance ought to be completely and "radically" abolished did not meet with entire acceptance.

In consequence of the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian war, no congress of this union was held in 1870; and the horrors during the siege of Paris in 1871, which were, without due cause, ascribed to the members of the International as originators, put the International under the ban of Europe. Socialism could not stand under the crimes of those with whom it sympathized.

The Workingmen's Union was founded a little after the International, by a brilliant and accomplished man, Ferdinand Lassalle, whose early death was followed by the division of his adherents. Universal suffrage adopted by the North German Confederation weakened it again by satisfying the more moderate of the German socialists. In 1869 Liebknecht, an old socialist, founded the Social Democratic Workingmen's Party; and this was succeeded by the Socialistic Workingmen's Party, at Gotha, in 1875. The extreme principles of the International prevailed in this new organization, as they have done in Germany ever since, over the more moderate form of socialism that was in vogue before.

Meanwhile, in 1871, the new empire was established; and, in the Reichstag, socialistic representatives, few, yet in increasing numbers, have had an opportunity to ventilate their opinions. Outside of the political arena, several professors of political economy have some leaning toward socialistic doctrines, although disagreeing among themselves. Such are Brentano, Schmoller, Schaeffle, F. A. Lange. The socialistic party is also extremely active in propagating its opinions through the press. Its strength at the polls has been estimated as being in 1877 from six to eight hundred thousand.

We close our sketch of socialism with considering some of the results to society from the system, if it should ever become predominant.

1. At present the instruments of work belong to the class of the capitalists. The dependence of the working-class, due to this fact, is held to be a cause of misery and servitude in all its forms. To liberate work, the means of production must be converted into the common property of society. Thus all land and instruments must cease to belong to private persons. All capitalists must be stripped of their possessions, however small in extent. The incomes of the present owners may be converted into terminable annuities, if states are able to take on them such a burden.

2. The reward of work, or wages, is, according to the doctrine of Marx, to be measured by time spent in work. Whether this principle would not ruin the whole plan is doubtful; for a sense of injustice on the part of the faithful would be roused against the idle, and thus some other measure of comparative wages would be demanded.

3. Tickets of work are to be given to each workman, which will entitle him to the value of his day's work, estimated in the productions which he needs. As all production is for the state, and all wants supplied by the state, there is an infinite complication in the process, when the government takes the work of supply into its own hands.

4. By this process all money is superseded, except so far as dealings with foreign lands, where barter cannot be made use of, are concerned. Drafts must be issued by the government, and be payable in so many tickets of work.

5. The government, being the only employer, is free from all competition. But what is to prevent over-production, which is checked at present by want of sale? What is to prevent comparative over-production of articles in great use; for instance if too little food were produced to meet the amount of things manufactured?

6. The government, being the only transporter and distributor, will be liable to an infinity of mistakes, which are at present reduced to their minimum by individual caution. Wants of one thing, or in one place, cannot be supplied in another place, or of another thing, by competition; for competition is excluded by the system. Every change must be provided for by the government, and new wants be met by new supplies, according to its judgment. The present rapid movements of industry would be retarded by the clogs and breaks necessary in the action of central power.

Could so vast a city as London, or even as New York, be sure of not being exposed to famines on the plan of destroying private capital?

7. International exchanges would add to the difficulties of a socialistic state. It must own vessels, collect things produced elsewhere, and pay for them by barter of productions not needed at home, or by purchasing gold and silver. Here, again, the stimulus of competition being necessarily absent, the agents of a government would be brought into straits which might be of most serious injury.

8. It must not be supposed that all the final results of labor will accrue to the laborer. The certificates of work will amount to an immense sum; but the deductions from them must be immense also. The expenses of governments, the support of all transporters, of education, of the poor, the sick, the disabled, the police, of legislation, official salaries, — which in such a state would include the payment to all who buy, sell, or carry, — the prevention, trial, and punishment of crime, the care of roads, protection of every sort, would still continue, and would of course involve an amount of certificates of work, which must be deducted from the reward of work, to an extent which no one can foresee. Lawyers, it is true, would, for the most part, cease. Inheritance would, or might, cease also, — at least the savings from labor invested in certificates of work would be, no doubt, small; and the absence of private means of acquisition would take away a principal stimulus to work beyond the supply of pressing wants. A general equality just above the subsistence-point would, it is probable, prevail, and take away another most important stimulus.

But perhaps we have indulged in a useless method of looking at socialism on the industrial side, when there is so much uncertainty in the action of causes under new conditions. We turn to another side of the subject, — to its relations to the family, the state, to individual character and the progress of society. Here, whatever side we take, we can form opinions only which may prove to be wide of the mark. And first as to the family: if we judged from the free thoughts of many socialists in regard to marriage, divorce, free-love, and the like, we should not feel very hopeful that socialism would long retain in its purity the Christian idea of the family tie; nor should we be ready to think that a system which cut off the middle class of society altogether from existence would preserve the best models for a wholly new system. Yet there is at least no light or especial hope drawn from the prospect which socialism holds out. I can believe, that, in some places, every thing would be hopeful, while elsewhere the phalansteries of Fourierism would be realized with the fewest redeeming features.

The state, as we have seen, must be invested, in socialism, with all power over industry; which thus may be called practically unfree. It must be a state of serfs with a democratic government over them. Is it harsh or unjust to say that the slaves on a Southern plantation, under a slave-driver, were in some respects better off; for the master himself, over against the driver, might represent clemency and kindness?

Religion will not stand very high in the regard of socialists. Schaeffle says, in his Quintessence of Socialism, that it is "through and through irreligious, and hostile to the church." But perhaps this may be owing to the fact that the religious institutions of society have hitherto been bulwarks against revolutionary causes like socialism, and that religious feeling involves a spirit of subordination to existing order, except when such order strikes at the roots of religion itself. In the social state it would be wholly uncertain whether a nation of laborers could or would restore religious brotherhood on the foundation of the New Testament, when once state churches should be overthrown.

And again: how would socialism affect individual character? Here we notice, first, that mere equality, with no power to rise above the condition of birth, — a form of life where competition, and advantage from special energy or ability are cut off, — would deaden nearly all the motives by which human nature is at present carried forward. Do we not thus come back again to a state of serfdom? And, if all have an equal voice in the choice of the governors of society, are not all equally under a government most absolute? The monotony, listlessness, and want of hope, of such a state of things, are not likely to improve human nature, or become a remedy for evils handed down from the past.

But we may ask whether the system of socialism in which the destruction of private capital, entire equality, the government's absolute control, are essential features, can ever become a reality. Certainly not, we should say, unless it can be shown that society on its present basis is incapable of becoming better, or unless there is an inevitable tendency in every change, toward the point aimed at by socialism; for otherwise, society as at present constituted would rise en masse against the movement. The spirit of the household, the spirit of capital, all that is interested in the present, every landholder down to the smallest farmer, every one who has property, would resist to the death. And all governments would form a mutual insurance against the theorists who should demand universal change. If freedom of opinion on the most practical of subjects became explosive, it would be met everywhere by common resistance; for all have a common interest to shield each other from ruin. In such a case, there would be no middle ground between the ruin of socialists and the ruin of society.

SOCIÉTÉ ÉVANGÉLIQUE DE GENÈVE (the Evangelical Society of Geneva), the oldest of the Continental evangelical societies, was founded in 1831 for the spread of sound apostolic doctrine throughout Switzerland and France. It has a theological school at Geneva, supports numerous missionaries, pastors, and colportors, and is entirely dependent upon the funds yearly collected, not only in Switzerland, but in different parts of Europe, and from the United States of America. It is undenominational, having as its confession of faith substantially the creed of the Evangelical Alliance. It is the product of the revival of gospel truth which attended the labors of Robert Haldane (see art.). In the society's theological school, Gaussen, Malan, Pronier, and Merle D'Aubigné have taught. In the year from March, 1881 to March, 1882, the receipts were, from gifts and sales, 251,187 francs. In 1881 it celebrated its fiftieth anniversary, and issued a memorial volume, Récits et Souvenirs de quelques-uns de ses ouvriers. See its Annual Reports.

SOCIÉTÉ CENTRALE PROTESTANTE D'ÉVANGÉLISATION. This society, connected with the Reformed Church of France, was founded in 1852. Its centre is Paris, but it operates in all parts of France. Its object is to develop the faith of Protestants, and in every way advance the Protestant cause. It supports theological schools at Tournon and Batignolles, and numerous churches, preaching-stations, and schools. It has also so fostered forty-two churches, that now they are independent of its help. During 1882 its receipts were 281,029 francs.

SOCINUS (Faustus) AND THE SOCINIANS. Faustus Socinus, or Fausto Sozzini, was b. at Siena, 1539; d. at Luclawice in Poland, 1604. Left an orphan at a tender age, his early education was neglected. Following the example of his ancestors, he at first devoted himself to the study of law, but corresponded with his uncle Lelio Sozzini about religious questions. In 1559 the misfortunes of his family forced him to leave Italy; and he went to Lyons, and then to Zürich, where he spent three years examining the manuscripts of his uncle. It was from there, as he himself says, that Socinus got the suggestion of some of the characteristic features of his later system. His literary activity was inaugurated with an exposition of the first part of the first chapter of John (1562), which appeared anonymously. From 1562 to 1574 he was again in Italy, and at the court of Francesco de Medici in Florence, who heaped honors and offices upon him. The most of the time between 1574 and 1578 he spent in Basel, occupied with the elaboration of his system and disputations. The latter were the occasion of two of his principal writings, — De Jesu Christo servatore, against the Protestant preacher Covet, and De statu primi hominis ante lapsum, against the Florentine Pucci. In 1579 he went to Poland, where the name of his uncle was still held in honor, and remained there till his death. At Cracow, Socinus applied for admission to the society of Unitarians, but was refused, except on condition of his being rebaptized, the Unitarians being leavened with Anabaptist notions. Socinus, not accepting admission on these grounds, employed his powers and influence to have the law changed in this regard. He was active with his pen and at synods, and he lived to see his view accepted at the synod of Rakow in 1603. In 1583 he married into a Polish family of noble birth. He was not free from abuse and persecutions, and in 1598, while ill, was taken out of his bed by Cracow students who had been incited by Roman-Catholic priests, dragged half naked through the city, and scourged, but was rescued by a university professor, Martin Vadovita. On this occasion, all of his books, papers, and manuscripts were burned in the market-place.

In 1605, immediately after Socinus' death, the so-called Rakow or Socinian Catechism appeared in the Polish language, for which he had made preparations. It was completed, upon the basis of these and his writings, by Statorius, Schmalz, Moscorovius, and Völkcl. A German translation was made in 1608, and a Latin one in 1609, of which a second, third, and fourth edition appeared at Amsterdam in 1665, 1680, 1684. This catechism is a very good compendium of the Socinian theology. At Socinus' death there were a number of Unitarian congregations in Poland, made up largely of noblemen. Good schools were connected with them. The city of Rakow was the chief citadel of Unitarianism, and the excellent institution of learning was attended at one time by nearly a thousand students, three hundred of whom were of noble birth. The general synod of the Socinians met there every year. Many of their theologians and preachers were celebrated. Among these were Schmalz (d. 1622), who wrote fifty-two works in defence of Socinianism; Völkcl (d. 1618), a student of Wittenberg, and for a time amanuensis of Socinus, whose work, De vera religione, is a systematic presentation of the Socinian theology; Ostorodt (d. 1611), who advocated the specific Anabaptist principles of refusing to do military duty, serve in public offices, etc.; and Moscorovius (d. 1595), who, amongst other things, wrote the Defence of the Socinians, which he sent to the king. Among the more distinguished men of the succeeding generation were Crell (d. 1631), a very prolific author, whose biblical commentaries, two books De uno Deo patre (the keenest Socinian attack upon the doctrine of the Trinity), and other works, fill vols. iii. and iv. of the Bibl. fratrum Polonorum; Schlichting (d. 1661), the author of a confession of faith (1612), De trinitate, de moralibus V. et N. T. itemque de eucharistiæ et baptismi ritibus (1637), etc.; Ludwig von Wolzogen (d. 1661), a distinguished exegete, and author of Compendium rel. christ.; Wiszowaty (d. 1678), author of sixty-two works, editor of the Bibl. frat. Polon., etc.; and Morskowski, author of Politia ecclesiastica (1646). In the reign of Sigismund III., and his son Wladislav IV., who were completely under the influence of the Jesuits, the Socinian congregations were persecuted and legally abolished. By a decree of 1638 the school at Rakow was suppressed, and the church taken away from "the Arians;" the immediate occasion of these harsh measures being the blasphemy of some of the students in stoning a wooden crucifix outside of the precincts of the city. Rakow, forsaken of the Socinians, is now a poverty-stricken village. John Casimir, who ascended the Polish throne in 1648, treated the remaining Socinians who dared to show their faces at the approach of the king of Sweden as traitors; and at the diet of Warsaw (1658) it was decreed that the confession and promotion of Socinianism should be punished with death. Two years were allowed to intervene before the execution of the edict, and during that time many Socinians emigrated. A fresh edict in 1661 confirmed the preceding one. In Germany, Socinian doctrines were first taught by Ernst Söner, professor of medicine and physics at Altdorf. He taught clandestinely, but with success, till his death, in 1612. His principal writing is a treatise upon the eternal duration of future punishment. Altdorf became the hearthstone of Socinianism, but the Council of Nürnberg forbade the publication of Socinian views there. Socinian synods were held in Kreuzburg in 1661 and 1663. Some of the Polish exiles were permitted to remain for a while at Mannheim. In Germany the movement was always very weak and insignificant. In Holland it was more successful; and, in spite of persecutions, the Socinians increased. In 1653 the States-General demanded a pledge of the University of Leyden that it would not tolerate Socinian teaching. Some of the Polish exiles found their way to Holland. Among them three especially deserve mention: Felbinger (b. 1616), Sand (d. at Amsterdam, 1680), who wrote the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum (1684), a full literary history of his sect, and Zwicker (d. at Amsterdam, 1678), whose work, Irenicum Irenicorum, produced a great excitement. The Socinians finally were identified with the Remonstrants. For the history of the movement in England and the United States, see art. UNITARIANS.

The doctrines of Socinianism are not to be regarded as identical with the doctrines of modern Unitarianism, and are laid down in the writings of Socinus, the Rakow Catechism, and the works of the principal Socinian writers down to the middle of the seventeenth century. The genuine Socinians held firmly to the authority of the Scriptures and to a very positive supranaturalism. The Rakow Catechism begins with the question, "What is the Christian religion?" Answer. "The Christian religion is the way revealed by God for securing eternal life." Christianity is a special revelation. It is made known in the Scriptures, which, clothed with divine authority, is the only source of religious knowledge. The authority of the Old Testament, which only has an historical value, rests upon the testimony of the New Testament. Both the Testaments are inspired documents. The sacred writers wrote under the impulse and dictation of the Divine Spirit (divino Spiritu impulsu eoque dictante). The Socinians, however, taught that only the essential parts, those pertaining to doctrine, were of immediate divine inspiration. The views concerning the relation of reason to revelation differ somewhat from those of orthodox Protestants. Reason is man's spiritual eye; and, in all controverted matters, it is judge, and not the Pope or the believing Christian. The truths of revelation are above reason, but never contrary to it. Miracles are above reason, and credible. The doctrines of the trinity and divinity of Christ are contrary to reason, and therefore incredible. Wiszowaty, in his Religio rationalis, went so far as to teach the agreement between the true philosophy and religion. Thus the latent rationalism in genuine Socinianism became more and more prominent.

In the department of theology proper the usual attributes are attributed to God. His omniscience is defined in such a way that it does not conflict with the contingency of events and the freedom of the will. God does not know in such a way that whatsoever he knows will surely come to pass. If God's knowledge, says Crell, were to make every thing to happen necessarily, which does happen, then there would be no real sin, or guilt of sin. In the doctrine of the mode of the divine existence, it is taught that God is one. This proposition is based upon such passages as Deut. vi. 4, Mark xii. 29, Gal. iii. 20, Eph. iv. 6, etc. The antagonism to the threefold personality of God forms the centre of the Socinian opposition to historical Christianity, and it is the special and single aim of many Socinian works to prove the doctrine of the Trinity irrational and unscriptural. The plural Elohim, Socinus explained, with Beza, as the plural of majesty. The thrice-repeated "holy" (Isa. vi. 3) is properly explained to be used for the sake of emphasis. In the case of the three men who appeared to Abraham (Gen. xviii.), it is shown that only one of them was called "Lord." To the argument from passages in the New Testament in which the Son and Holy Spirit seem to be placed on an equality with the Father, as in the formula of baptism (Matt. xxviii. 19), it is replied that he in whose name believers are baptized is not necessarily God, as appears from the case of Moses (1 Cor. x. 2), etc. In regard to the apostolical benediction (2 Cor. xiii. 14), it is asserted that the Son and Holy Ghost are distinguished from the Father. The genuineness of the passage of the three witnesses in 1 John is denied. The rational argument against the Trinity is specially emphasized, as would naturally be expected.

Man was created in God's image. That image consists essentially in the dominion which was given him over all creatures. Mind and reason are included under this head, as they are the efficient cause of this dominion. Socinus denied that immortality was a constituent in this image. Man was created mortal. The passage in Rom. v. 12 means that Adam's sin involved eternal death. Socinus expressly said that Adam would have died if he had not sinned. The first sin is treated almost exclusively as the result of ignorance and inexperience. So far as Adam's knowledge was concerned, he was armed against temptation. Original righteousness was not a created attribute, but subject to man's volition and voluntary activity. The reason was not absolute mistress of the sensual nature. Sin is an act of the free will, and as such it was not even known in advance by God. The sin of Adam did not entail upon his posterity the loss of freedom; that is, the ability to choose between the right and the wrong. So far as the doctrine of original sin is in opposition to this view, the Socinians most positively denied it. The ἐφ' ᾧ of Rom. v. 12 is explained to mean quoniam, quatenus. The doctrine of original sin is opposed to the Scripture which calls upon men to repent and be converted. The mere inclination to sin, Socinus held, might exist in all, but did not necessarily so exist. But this inclination is not a consequence of the sin of Adam; and, if this were the case, it would cease to be sin, for sin exists only where there is guilt. Hence no corruption came upon the human family by Adam's sin.

In the Socinian system, Christ is not divine. He was more than a mere man. His attributes were extra-human, but he was not of divine nature. He had to be a man in order to redeem. Immortality, the goal of the Christian religion, was mediated by the resurrection of Christ. If, on the other hand, his superiority to men had consisted in his divinity, he could not have died. The argument from Scripture and reason is pressed. The divinity of Christ cannot be derived from the affirmation that he was God's Son, for all men are called the sons of God (Rom. ix. 26); and, when Christ is called the only-begotten Son, it is simply meant that he was the chief and highest of the sons of God, as Isaac and Solomon are also known by this designation. The expression "I and my Father are one" (John x. 30) refers to unity of will and power, as in John xvii. 22. The passages referring to Christ's pre-existence are explained away easily. In John i. 1, the expression "in the beginning" is declared to mean "in the beginning of the gospel," or the Christian dispensation. The statement that "all things" were made by Christ (John i. 3; Col. i. 16) refers simply to all things pertaining to the gospel; and the statement, "the world" was made by him (John i. 10), has reference either to the reformation of mankind by the gospel, or to the future world. From such passages as John iii. 13, 31, vi. 36, xvi. 28, the conclusion is drawn, that Christ was caught up into the heavens for a season, like Paul. Stress is laid, in the argument against Christ's deity, on his habit of praying to the Father, his being sent by the Father, his ignorance of the day of judgment, etc. Christ, however, was more than man. He had superior endowments to the mass of mankind. He was (1) conceived of a virgin, (2) was perfectly holy, and (3) was exalted to absolute power, all things being made subject unto him.

Christ's work is treated in the Catechism under his threefold office of prophet, priest, and king. As prophet, Christ ordained the Lord's Supper, which is simply a memorial feast, a declaration of that which we already possess by faith. He also promised the Holy Ghost, who is not a person, but a power or activity of God, and eternal life. Looking at the priestly office, Christ is regarded as a mediator; but the view that salvation was secured by his sufferings and death is declared to be false and pernicious. The Scripture teaches very often that God forgives sins gratuitously (2 Cor. v. 19, etc.), and the idea of satisfaction is at complete variance with a free gift (Eph. ii. 8, etc.). It is the resurrection upon which the stress is laid; and Socinus expressly declares, that it is the head and ground of all our faith and salvation in the person of Christ (caput et tanquam fundamentum totius fidei et salutis nostræ in Christi persona). The obedience Christ rendered to the law was due from him, for God had commanded him to obey. But the guilt and punishment of one cannot be borne by another. Christ had to obey for himself, and could not obey or suffer for others. The word "redemption" in the New Testament does not contain the notion of satisfaction, but simply means emancipation. The reconciliation accomplished by Christ consists simply in this, that to us who were enemies of God he showed the way to become converted, and return to God. The meaning of the atonement is, that God in Christ has shown himself to be above measure gracious (propitius). Christ's high-priestly office consists in the help he gives us. He delivers us from the punishments of sin by reason of the absolute power which he received from the Father, and which protects us. He delivers us from the bondage of sin by keeping us from all manner of sins. This he does by presenting to our thought his own person, which remained sinless in temptation. Predestination is nothing more than the divine decree to give eternal life to as many as believe on Christ. Faith consists of assent to the doctrine of Christ, trust in God through Christ, and obedience to God's commandments. Justification consists in this, that God treats us as righteous; and it is not an imputation of Christ's righteousness. The theory of an apprehension of his righteousness is a human fiction.

In the Socinian theology scriptural and unscriptural elements strangely meet. It was the real forerunner of modern rationalism, and in this consideration lies its chief claim to prolonged attention.

SOCINUS, Lælius, uncle of Faustus: b. at Siena in 1525; d. at Zürich, May 16, 1562. He was an antitrinitarian.

SOCRATES. The life and death, teaching and influence, of Socrates, were so remarkable, that although he was known as "the moral philosopher of Athens," and has always been known as "the parent of philosophy," he is also entitled to a scarcely less conspicuous place in the history of religion.

The events in the life of Socrates are so few and so familiar, that we need not dwell upon them. The following epitome will suffice for the purposes of this article. He was born in Paeania, a deme of Attica, 469 B.C. His father, Sophroniscus, was a sculptor; his mother, Phænarete, was a midwife; and as in youth he followed successfully, if we may believe Pausanias, the occupation of his father, so, as he playfully remarked, he devoted his manhood, even till old age, to the assiduous practice of the profession of his mother, in bringing to birth, like a spiritual midwife, the thoughts and characters of his youthful countrymen. In three battles — at Potidæa, at Delium, and at Amphipolis — he proved himself a brave and efficient citizen-soldier. At the age of sixty, as a senator (member of the βουλῇ), — the only instance in which he accepted office, — he showed his moral and political heroism by withstanding alone the excited passions, and for the time thwarting the perverse and vindictive purpose, of the people in their popular assembly. At the age of seventy (B.C. 399) he was accused of corrupting the youth, and not worshipping the gods of his country, tried before the popular dicastery, condemned by a small majority of votes, and died by drinking hemlock.

The philosophy of Socrates is not so much a system of doctrines as a spirit of inquiry, and a method of search for the truth. That method, the method of question and answer, was so characteristic of Socrates, and at the same time so full of life and power, that it was adopted more or less by all his disciples, and has ever since been known as the Socratic method. It is seen in its perfection in the Dialogues of Plato, which are the idealized conversations of the idealized Socrates. The subject-matter of the Socratic philosophy is ethics in contradistinction to physics; its aim is practical to the exclusion of barren speculation; and conscious ignorance, modesty, moderation, pure and high morality, humble inquiry at the oracles of God about humble "human things," in a word, that childlike spirit, which, as Lord Bacon says, is the key both to "the kingdom of science and the kingdom of heaven," is among its most marked characteristics.

The chief good, our being's end and aim, according to the Socratic ethics, is happiness; not, however, that which most men call happiness; not εὐτυχία, but εὐπραγία and εὐδαιμονία; not the pleasure which springs from the possession of riches, honor, power, and the gifts of fortune, but that well being which results from well doing in obedience to the will of God and with the blessing of Heaven. The true, the beautiful, and the good are all essentially identical with each other, since they all consist in the useful and the fitting; and that which is good for nothing is neither good nor beautiful nor true. Xenophon and Plato agree in making Socrates teach that he who knows justice is just, and the man who understands virtue is virtuous: in other words, he resolves all virtue into knowledge. But it is plain from both these writers that he used knowledge in a high and comprehensive sense unusual in ethical treatises, but strikingly analogous to that in which it is used in the Scriptures. He makes knowledge identical with wisdom, and ignorance with folly and sin, just as in the Bible piety is wisdom, and sin is folly: the wicked have no knowledge, while the righteous know all things. He who is truly master of the science or profession of virtue will be truly virtuous. In this high sense, knowledge is virtue, since really to know is certainly to do, and to do is the only way truly to know.

Socrates believed in the existence of one supreme Divinity, the Creator and Disposer of the universe, the Maker and Father of mankind, the Ruler and Governor among the nations, invisible, all-powerful, omniscient, and omnipresent, perfectly wise and just and good. His method of demonstrating the existence of such a being was strictly Baconian, the same argument which Paley uses in his Natural Theology: indeed, we almost seem to be reading Paley when we read the chapters in which Xenophon records his master's arguments in proof of the divine existence and benevolence. And when we read, in the same author, of those unwritten laws in the soul of man which execute themselves, and make it impossible for any man to be unjust, or impure, or licentious, without paying the penalty (which proves a greater and better than any human law-giver), we seem to be sitting at the feet of Bishop Butler himself.

The doctrine of Socrates touching the inferior deities, whose existence he admits, and whose agency he recognizes, particularly in the providential care of human affairs, probably did not differ essentially from the Christian doctrine of the angels; though it marks the greater elevation of the Christian revelation and the Christian consciousness, that what the most enlightened heathen called gods, and worshipped, Christians consider as only ministers of God, whom to worship were idolatry.

We have not space to enlarge upon the teaching of Socrates respecting providence and prayer. He believed himself to be under the constant guidance of a divine voice, which always warned him when he was in danger of going or doing wrong, and thus, indirectly, always led him in the right way; and he taught that every man might have the same divine guidance; and he could not but wonder at the folly and madness of men who preferred a blind and ignorant guide to one who was unerring, and perfectly acquainted with the way in which they should go. Hence his one only and constant prayer was, that God would guide him, and give him, not riches, pleasure, honor, power, which were as likely to prove a bane as a blessing, but what was best for him; since God only knew what was for his true and highest good.

Socrates held the doctrine of the immortality of the soul and the future life as strenuously as Plato did, but without those dreams and chimeras of its pre-existence and successive transmigrations, by which the creed of the latter was disfigured; and, with these exceptions, he doubtless relied on the same arguments in proof of the doctrine which have been stated in the article on Plato and Christianity: and—what has been usually wanting in heathen philosophers, and too often in the lives of Christians also—it was the beauty and glory of Socrates' character, that his doctrine of providence and prayer and a future state was the controlling principle of his life. And so he died a martyr's death with a cheerful composure, in the full persuasion that it was God's will and the consummation of his mission, and that it was better for him to die than to live; not in the certainty, but in the belief, that death was not an evil, but the highest good and the richest blessing. "Bury my body as you please," he said to his friends, "but do not mourn as if you were burying Socrates. Think of me, rather, as gone to be with the wise and the good, and with God, the fountain of wisdom and goodness, in that world where alone wisdom is to be found.' Such teachings, illustrated by a conscientious, unselfish, heroic, missionary life, and sealed by a martyr's death—these are the main secret of his power, and these exhibit him in his true relation to Christianity. It would not be difficult, on the one hand, to point out defects in his teaching, and imperfections in his life, nor, on the other, to magnify the points of resemblance between him and the founder of our holy religion. Such comparisons have been elaborately made by Priestley, for example, in his tract, Socrates and Jesus Compared, and by Baur, in his Sokrates und Christus, the second of those three treatises (Drei Abhandlungen), which were re-edited by Zeller in 1876. But the disparity is so great as to forbid comparison. The intuitions of Rousseau, sceptic as he was, taught him this: "What prejudice," he says (Émile, bk. iv.), "what blindness, must it be to compare the son of Sophroniscus to the son of Mary!" If the life and death of Socrates were those of a sage, the life and death of Jesus are those of a God." Socrates himself would have aspired to no higher honor than that of being a forerunner of Christ among the Greeks. That honor justly belongs to him; and his propædæutic influence can easily be traced, like that of Plato, and largely through him and his followers, in the history and philosophy of the Greeks and Romans before and after Christ, while the power of his teaching and his life is still felt in the literature, the philosophy, and the religion of all Christian nations.

SOCRATES, the Greek church historian, was born in Constantinople about 380, and lived there as scholasticus. His work is a continuation of that of Eusebius, and encompasses the period from 306 to 439. It is a simple and natural report of facts, supported by rich extracts from the sources, and marred by comparatively few mistakes; but it is not distinguished by an artistic form, nor is the author above his time with respect to a critical sifting of miraculous stories. It has been edited (Greek and Latin) by Valesius, Paris, 1659, together with the histories of Eusebius and Sozomen; by R. Hussey, Oxford, 1853, 3 vols., Greek text separately, with Introduction by W. Bright, Oxford, 1878. See DUPIN, in his Nouvelle Bibliothèque, iv.; HOLZHAUSEN: De fontibus quibus S. et usi sunt, Göttingen, 1825; and BAUR:

SOD'OM, the most important of four cities (Gomorrhah, Admah, Zeboiim, and Sodom) in the vale of Siddim, which were destroyed by "brimstone and fire" out of heaven, on account of the great wickedness of their inhabitants (Gen. xix. 24). Lot lived there (Gen. xiii. 12, xix. 2), and there his daughters married (Gen. xix. 14). Chedorlaomer and his allies plundered the cities, but the captives and spoils were recovered by Abraham (Gen. xiv.). The fate of Sodom and the other cities of the plain is held up in the Bible as a warning (Deut. xxix. 23; Isa. i. 9, 10; Amos iv. 11; Matt. x. 15; 2 Pet. ii. 6-8; Rev. xi. 8), and so deeply impressed itself upon the neighboring peoples, that Strabo, in his description of the Dead Sea (16, 2), which he erroneously calls the Sirbonian Sea, and Tacitus (Hist. 5, 7), relate, that, according to tradition, there once were cities and fruitful plains where then there was death. The question, whether these cities of the plain were upon the southern or northern end of the Dead Sea,—for the old opinion, that the sea covers the site of the cities, is given up as contradicted by geology,—is one of the most vexed in biblical geography. For the southern end the arguments are: (1) Tradition from the time of Josephus (Antiq. I., 11, 4; War. IV., 8, 4), Eusebius (Onomast., s.v.), and Jerome (Ep. cviii. 11; Comm. in Esa., xv. 5); (2) The mountain of salt at that end is called Jebel Usdum, apparently an echo of Sodom; (3) Pillars of salt detached from the great salt cliffs at that end have been called "Lot's Wife;" (4) Abraham, standing near Hebron, saw the smoke of their burning (Gen. xix. 27, 28); (5) Numerous slime-pits, i.e., bitumen (Gen. xiv. 10) are found at that end; (6) The portion of the sea south of the Lisan Peninsula is very shallow, as if it were beyond its original limits. If the sea now covered the site of the cities, this would be the case. This view has been advocated by Robinson, Lynch, Porter, Baedeker, Schaff, and many others. For the northern end, the arguments are, (1) Lot chose the Plain of Jordan (Gen. xiii. 11), which must have been at the northern end, for in that case only could Abraham and Lot have seen it from Bethel; (2) Since the hill near Hebron was midway between the two ends of the sea, Abraham could just as well have seen the burning if it was at the northern end as if it was at the southern; (3) The presence of numerous slime-pits in the vale of Siddim, at the northern end; (4) The account of Chedorlaomer's attack fits best with the northern site for Sodom. Prominent advocates for the northern site are Grove, Tristram, and Merrill.

The destruction of the cities of the plain was probably the result of natural causes under divine control. The explosion of gas would easily account for it all. The soil, soaked with bitumen, would easily convey the fire until all the cities were destroyed.

SODOR AND MAN, an English bishopric (Sodor comes from Suduregar, Southern Isles, corresponding to Norduregar, Northern Isles), is the name applied to the western islands of Scotland, especially to those contiguous to the Isle of Man; and hence the name of the bishopric. The income of the bishop is £2,000.

SOHN, Georg, b. at Rossbach, Dec. 31, 1551; d. at Heidelberg, April 23, 1589. He studied theology at Marburg and Wittenberg, and was appointed professor at Marburg in 1574, and at Heidelberg in 1584. He was a pupil of the Melancthonian school, and considered himself a member and teacher of the Reformed Church. His works,—the principal of which are Synopsis corporis doctrine Phil. Melancthonis, De verbo Dei, Methodus theologiae, etc.—appeared in a collected edition at Herborn, in 4 vols., 1591. HEPPE.

SOISSONS, a town of France in the department of Aisne, was the seat of a number of important synods.—I. The synod of 743 was convened by Pepin the Short, and presided over by Boniface, Archbishop of Mayence. Besides a number of secular lords, twenty-three bishops were present; and the canons issued by Carloman in 742 were confirmed, forbidding the clergy to hunt, to marry, etc., prohibiting unknown persons from performing ecclesiastical duties, enjoining the counts to suppress Paganism, etc.—II. The synod of 852 numbered twenty-six bishops, and Charles the Bald was present. The Archbishop of Rheims, Ebbo, had some time previously been deposed for participation in a revolt against the king,—a quite frequent accusation against the Frankish bishops,—and Hincmar had been made his successor. As Ebbo, however, shortly after, was appointed bishop of Hildesheim by Lewis the German, and confirmed by the Pope, he continued to ordain priests. But there was a canon forbidding the transference of a bishop from one diocese to another, unless with the consent of his brother-bishops; and the validity of Ebbo's ordinations was now impeached on account of that canon. The synod declared them invalid.—III., IV., and V. The synods of 861, 862, and 866 treated the same subject.—VI. The synod of 1092 was convened to decide in the controversy between Anselm of Canterbury and Roscelin. The former accused the latter of tritheism, and the latter was compelled to recant.—VII. The synod of 1121 was convened by the Papal legate, Bishop Conon of Preneste, to examine the writings of Abelard. As Abelard refused to attempt any defence of what he had written, he was compelled to throw his works into the fire with his own hands.—VIII. The synod of 1201 was convened by the Papal legate, Octavian, for the purpose of cancelling the permission to a second marriage which the French bishop had given King Philip August, and compelling the king to take back his first wife, the Danish princess Ingeborg, whom he had repudiated.—IX. The synod of 1449, finally, was convened by the Archbishop of Rheims, John Juvenal Ursinus. It adopted the decrees of the Council of Basel concerning liturgy, and treated a number of misuses which had crept into the church. See CHR. W. FR. SOLITARIUS, Philip, a Greek monk who lived in the latter part of the eleventh century in Constantinople, wrote a work in verse and in the form of a dialogue, under the title Διόπτρα, "the mirror:" it is a representation of the ascetic views of the Greek mysticism of the time. It found much favor, was commented by Michael Psellus, and translated into Latin prose by the Jesuit, Jacob Pontanus. Ingolstadt, 1601; but the translation, which is also found in the Bibl. Mar. patr. Lugd., vol. xxi., is very incorrect. Of the Greek text, only a few fragments have been printed by Oudin, Lambecius, and Cotelierius. GASS.

SOLOMON, second son of David by Bathsheba, his successor upon the throne, and third king over Israel, who reigned forty years (1015-975 B.C.; according to Ewald, 1025-986). Compare 1 Kings i.-xi.; 2 Chron. i.-ix.; Joseph., Ant., VIII. 1-7. His early education was intrusted to the prophet Nathan, who called him Jedidiah, i.e., the beloved of Jehovah (2 Sam. xii. 24, 25). Through the influence of his mother, Nathan, and Zadok the priest, Solomon, at the age of twenty, was made king while his father was yet alive. Riding on the mule, attended by Nathan and Zadok, and by the king's special company of the thirty mighty men, and the body-guard under the command of Benaiah, he went down to Gihon, and was proclaimed and anointed king. His first acts, showing moderation, prudence, and energy, were well adapted to gain for him the esteem and confidence of his people. The death of Joab, who had insidiously killed Abner and Amasa, and who had openly sided with Adonijah, combined justice with prudence, fulfilling at the same time David's dying counsels. Shimei also is killed at David's wish; Adonijah is put to death; Abiathar is deposed and exiled, sent to a life of poverty and shame, and the high-priesthood transferred to another family, that of Zadok. To the descendants of Barzillai he shows kindness. Such a firm and circumspect appearance secured to the new king general obedience. Soon he displayed signs of wisdom which made him known throughout the country; and, as it was the king's intention to walk in all the ways of Jehovah, the God of his father granted his desire, and endowed him with true royal wisdom.

His name and his deeds made Solomon a prince of peace, under whose sceptre the people and the country prospered. But at the beginning and towards the end of his reign, in the south, north, and west some princes rose. Hadad the Edomite, who had fled into Egypt, when he had heard that David and Joab were dead, returned into his country, of which he takes possession (1 Kings xi. 21, 22, 25). Rezon, also, gathered some men unto him, and took Danascus; but he had at last to yield to Solomon. The little kingdom of Gazer, or Geshur, between Israel and Philistea, rose also, but fell into the hands of the king of Egypt, who gave it to Solomon when he married his daughter. Solomon's success against the usurpers was sufficient to secure his authority, even beyond the confines of his own country; and for a long time peace reigned throughout his kingdom. In the beginning of his reign he married the daughter of King Psuchennes of Egypt.

Many structures which Solomon had erected made his name very famous in the east and in the west. Like his father, he secured builders from Hiram, king of Tyre. For the lower menial work he used at first the "strangers," the remnant of the Canaanitish races; afterwards his own people, too, had to help in the work. The first great building was the magnificent temple, built after the pattern of the tabernacle, but executed in accordance with the plans which David had received from the hand of the Lord (1 Chron. xxviii. 11, 19). After seven years and a half the work on the temple was completed. About the time of the feast of tabernacles, the temple was dedicated with great solemnities: the king himself addressed the assembly (1 Kings viii.). As the temple, like the Holly of hollies, was intended to be the habitation of God, the "cloud," "the glory of the Lord," filled the house of the Lord. With the building of the temple a new organization of the order of the priests and Levites, which was made by David, undoubtedly took place. He appointed twenty-four orders for the service at the temple, and the same number for the choir of the temple-music. The second great building was his palace, which was built south of the temple (Neh. iii. 25). It consisted of many divisions, which served partly as magazines, partly as rooms for the king and his queens. The main building was a hundred cubits long, fifty cubits wide, and thirty cubits high. In the porch stood a great throne of ivory, and overlaid with the best gold. It stood on six steps, and twelve lions stood on each side of the same, while two lions stood beside the stays (1 Kings x. 18-20; 2 Chron. ix. 17-19). The palace was connected with the temple by steps. A special seat was reserved for the king. That he also erected many other buildings, etc., we infer from 1 Kings ix. 1, 19; Eccles. ii. 4-6; Song of Songs viii. 11. He also fortified the capital, and many fortresses were built. In the organization of his army he imitated the Egyptians. He had a thousand and four hundred chariots and twelve thousand horsemen, whom he bestowed in the cities for chariots, or put them in small cities. The inner administration of the kingdom was also regulated. The highest officer was the chancellor; next to him was the "scribe," who also regulated the finances. Besides he had a captain over his body-guard. The king's enormous household was supplied with provisions by the provinces of his domain.

Trade and commerce became also very flourishing under Solomon, and the revenues from these commercial enterprises by land and by sea enriched the royal treasury. Besides these direct revenues, the kings and princes of the subject-provinces paid tribute in the form of gift, in money and in kind, "at a fixed rate year by year" (1 Kings x. 25).

Thus Solomon's reign marks the entrance of Israel on a nearer intercourse with the Asiatic peoples. That such an intercourse was not without an influence upon the intellect of the Jewish people, is certain. A special wisdom, whose most prominent representative Solomon himself was, was cultivated. The Queen of Sheba, attracted by his wisdom, came to his court to hear him. He also cultivated poetry (he himself is said to have composed a thousand and five hymns, besides three thousand proverbs); and historiography, no doubt, found in him a great patron.

In spite of his greatnesses, Solomon had his blemishes. Nathan his teacher was dead, without leaving another person in his stead to protect and guide the king. Outwardly Solomon appeared to have fulfilled the duties of the theocratic ruler, without exactly needing such a support as David had in Nathan and Gad. By and by the consciousness that such royal glory was incompatible with the advancement of the true theocracy was awake and alive: the prophets Ahijah of Shilo, Shemaja, and Iddo were not favorably disposed toward the king; the first sees the coming of the ruin. The people was dissatisfied on account of the many oppressive contributions which were laid upon it. The greatest stumbling-block, by which he wounded the religious feeling of the people, was his harem; for, whatever might have been the number of his wives, the harem was in opposition to the spirit of true Jehovah-religion, and the more so as most of these women were foreigners, "who turned away his heart after other gods." It was not Solomon's intention to change or abandon the religion of Jehovah, but "his heart was not perfect with the Lord his God" (1 Kings xi. 4). Beside the worship of Jehovah, he allowed the worship of strange gods, and built altars for Ashtaroah, Milcom, and Chemosh. Thus Solomon came more and more in opposition with the true patriotic spirit of the people; and the pious Jew connects, therefore, his highest hopes, not with his name, but with that of his father David, whilst among heathen and Mohammedans Suleiman is still highly celebrated. SOMASCHIANS, The Order of the (or Christi regulares S. Majoli Papie congregationis Somasche), the most important institution resulting from the anti-reformatory revival within the Roman-Catholic Church in the first half of the sixteenth century, received its name from the village Somascho, between Milan and Bergamo, in which its founder, Girolamo Miani, or Hieronymus Emilianus, first established the association, and wrote its rules. Miani was born in 1481, and descended from a rich and distinguished family. He served in the campaigns against Charles VIII. and Louis XII.; but having been taken prisoner at the storming of Castelnuovo (1508), and shut up in a German dungeon, he was converted, and, after his release, he devoted himself to the nursing and education of poor orphans and the conversion of fallen women. In 1525 he formed the first orphan-asylum, and in 1532 the first Magdalen asylum in Venice; and soon similar institutions were established in Milan, Bergamo, Pavia, and other cities. In 1533 he founded an association to administer his institutions, and before his death (Feb. 8, 1537), the association had grown into a regular monastic order. It was confirmed by Paul III. in 1540, and by Paul IV. in 1563, and adopted the rules of St. Augustine. It was for a short time united with that of the Theatines (1546-55), and with that of the Fathers of the Christian Doctrine (1616-47), but succeeded best when alone. In 1661, under Alexander VII., it comprised three provinces. SOOTHSAYER. Soothsaying and oracles owe their origin to the natural human desire to know the future, or, in doubtful cases, the best. This desire, in turn, springs partly from unwillingness to think deeply, and partly from the notion that the divine intention can be found out or influenced; that it is directed haphazardly and arbitrarily at men. Soothsaying is therefore characteristic of nature-religions. It was forbidden in the sternest manner in the Mosaic law, and punished with death by stoning, as essentially idolatrous (Lev. xix. 26, 31, xx. 6, 27; Jer. xxvii. 9), particularly because the divine will had been distinctly revealed to Israel in its history. Yet there were legitimate ways by which the divine will could be known; e.g., by the Urim and Thummim, and by the seers. Soothsaying existed in Israel notwithstanding the law, and in one case Saul had recourse to a witch at En-dor. Here it was in the form of necromancy. The deceit practised is plainly revealed in the straightforward narrative (1 Sam. xxviii. 7-25). The king did not see the apparition of Samuel. The witch was apparently behind a curtain; and only after she had uttered her curse upon the king, who had done his utmost to extinguish her trade, did she come out. In some cases ventriloquism was perhaps employed. The Hebrews also employed the teraphim in soothsaying. In the New Testament a soothsaying slave-girl is spoken of in Acts xvi. 16 sqq. This form was Greek, and characterized by raving and convulsions. See DIVINATION, NECROMANCY; SAALSCHÜTZ: Mosaisches Recht, Berlin, 1852, pp. 510 sqq., and the commentaries. L. DIESTEL.

SOPHIA (Gr., wisdom), a name which occurs very often in the catalogues of saints and martyrs in the ancient church; but the stories told there can in no case be verified. — One Sophia, a Christian widow, is said to have suffered martyrdom in Rome under Hadrian, about 120, together with her three daughters, Fides (faith), Spes (hope), and Caritas (love); but the very names of the daughters make the story suspicious. See Act. Sanct., Sept. 30. — Another Sophia, Sophia Senatrix, was married to a Byzantine senator, but retired, after the death of her husband and their six children, to the monastery of Aenos in Thracia, became a nun, and devoted herself to deeds of charity. See Act. Sanct., June 4. — For other Sophias, see Act. Sanct., April 30 and June 4, and Martyrolog. Roman., Sept. 8. GASS.

SOPHIA, St., Church, now mosque, of. See ARCHITECTURE, p. 131.

SOPHRONIUS, a native of Greece; made the acquaintance of Jerome in Palestine, and is mentioned in De viris illustribus (cap. 134). He translated parts of the Old Testament, and some of Jerome's works, from Latin into Greek. His name has excited most interest, however, in connection with the Greek translation of De viris illustribus, which Erasmus and Fabricius ascribed to him, while Vossius simply considered it a Greek exercise of Erasmus. The translation is mentioned by Suidas, however, but can hardly be the work of Sophronius. See Vallarsius, in his edition of the works of Jerome, vol. ii. part 2, p. 818. — Another Sophronius, a monk from Damascus, is known from the Monothelite controversies as a violent adversary of the mediating attempts of the Emperor Heraclius. For a time he yielded to the admonitions of Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople; but when, in 634, he was elected patriarch of Jerusalem, he issued an Epistola encyclicæ (see Harduin: Acta Conc., iii.), in which he rejected all concessions to the Monophysites, and caused thereby the emperor to promulgate the Ekthesis. Other writings by him exist in manuscript. GASS.

SORBONNE, The, was originally simply a college for poor students, connected with an elementary school for the philological and philosophical education of ecclesiastics, but succeeded so well, developed so great an energy, and exercised so decisive an influence, that in course of time it came to be quite generally identified, not only with the theological faculty, but even with the university itself.

The origin of the university of Paris may be dated back to the time of Charlemagne; but a real Corpus Universitatis, with distinct faculties and nations, and a sufficient number of colleges, was not in active operation until the twelfth century. When John of Salisbury arrived in Paris (1136), he found two flourishing faculties in the university, — artes (rhetoric and philosophy, or rather dialectics) and theologia (Scripture, the Fathers, the councils, and canon law). After Gratian's compilation of decretals had been accepted and confirmed by Eugenius III., in 1151, a faculty of law was established; and its professors, though theologians, lectured not only on canon law, but also on civil law, especially after the discovery of the pandects of Justinian by the surrender of Amalfi. A faculty of medicine was not founded until 1180. In 1160 people who wanted to study medicine were still compelled to go from Paris to Montpellier. Celibacy was obligatory on all professors, also the medical.

A college was originally destined only for the material wants of the students: it was their home. They lived there under strict rules, yet with more freedom than in a monastery. The lectures were given in the schools; the theological generally in the Domus, the archiepiscopal palace, though William of Champeaux lectured in St. Victor, and Abelard in Ste. Geneviève. The oldest college in Paris was founded by Robert de Dreux, a son of Louis the Fat, under the name of S. Thomas du Louvre. But as a course of theology comprised from seven to nine years, and the custom soon arose that the older students in a college instructed the younger, and as doctors issuing from a certain college often continued to reside there for a long time, and a library generally was formed in connection with the institution, the college naturally became a kind of minor university. Such was more especially the case with that of the Sorbonne, founded by Robert of Sorbon, or Sorbonne, in Champagne (d. 1277). He was chaplain to Louis IX., and very zealous for the promotion of the study of theology. From the king he obtained a suitable site in the Coupe-gorge ("Cut-throat" Street), — a rather significant name; and there he built a magnificent college for his Con- gregatio pauperum magistrorum studentium in theologica facultate, which congregation was confirmed by Clement IV. in 1268.

After the example of the Franciscan and Dominican orders, a teacher of theology was also appointed at the Sorbonne; and the happy choice of the first teachers — William of Saint-Amour, Eudes of Donai, and Laurent l'Anglois — contributed much to increase the reputation of the establishment. Afterwards a considerable number of great doctors took up their abode in the college; and, when the regular lectures of the faculty were removed from the archiepiscopal palace to the Sorbonne, it was quite natural that people in general should identify the college with the faculty; so much the more natural as its theology really determined the character of the theology of the faculty. The general tendency of that theology was that which must underlie all true theology, — a perfect mediation between faith and knowledge, religion and science, theology and philosophy; but, in pursuing that tendency, the Sorbonne always kept its doctrines pure, that is, in harmony with the teachings of the church, though without submitting in a slavish manner to ecclesiastical misuses or sacerdotal eccentricities. It was the Sorbonne which drove the scandalous Feast of the Fools out of the church; and it was also the Sorbonne which successfully opposed the introduction of the Peter's-pence and of the Inquisition into France. Among its other merits may also be mentioned, that it established the first printing-press in Paris, 1470; and, as an indication of the high rank it held in the world's estimation, it may be added that it represented the university of Paris at the councils.

The decadence of the Sorbonne began when it fell into the hands of the Guises, and became the handmaid of Ultramontanism; and the public soon discovered the antiquated and re-actionary tendencies of its activity. In 1624 it obtained an edict of the Parliament forbidding, under penalty of corporal punishment, and even death, to teach any thing against the accepted authorities. The edict was directed against Descartes; and the Sorbonne was so far from learning any thing from Malebranche, Fénelon, or Leibnitz, that it wanted to have the edict renewed in 1671. The president of the Parliament, Lamoignon, found it difficult to refuse, until, one day, he found on his table Boileau's burlesque, Arrêt donné en la Grande Chambre du Parnasse. That decided the case. In 1751 appeared Voltaire's Le tombeau de la Sorbonne; and no voice was raised in its defence, when, in 1790, the state seized all its property, as belonging to the nation; and disposed of it for other purposes.

SOTER (pope 168–176 or 177), a native of Campania, is said to have written a work against the Montanists, which was refuted by Tertullian; but the work is lost, as is also his Epistle to the Corinthians, which was not uncommonly read in the congregations at Sunday service. The decretals bearing his name are spurious. NEUDECKER.

SOTERIOLOGY (ΣΩΤΗΡ, σωτήριον) is that branch of Christian theology which treats of the work of the Saviour, — the doctrine of salvation, so far as such salvation has been wrought out by the second person in the Holy Trinity. It is to be carefully distinguished from soteriology, or christology (v. CHRISTOLOGY), which treats solely of the person of the Redeemer, — his incarnation, his divinity, and his humanity, and the combination of these two elements in his single and perfect personality. Yet it should be borne in mind always, that any adequate conception of his soteriological work must be based on right views, antecedently obtained and established, respecting the Christ as he is in himself, — the appointed and qualified Saviour of men.

Soteriology does not include the concurrent work of the Son of God in other spheres, such as creation, or providence, or moral administration. Nor does it include those aspects of salvation which involve, on the one side, the elective purpose and love of the Father, or, on the other, the interior ministry of the Spirit in the application of saving grace. While the Son is concerned with the Father in the original plan of redemption and in the selection of those in whom that plan becomes effectual (v. PREDESTINATION), his specific work lies rather in the execution of that plan, and in the actual securing of redemption to all who believe. While, again, the Son is concerned with the Holy Spirit in the conviction of sinners, and in bringing them, through regeneration and sanctification, into the full enjoyment of the salvation provided (v. HOLY SPIRIT), his primary work is rather the provision itself on which, as a divine foundation, this subsequent work of spiritual restoration must be based. The Father creates, preserves, governs, plans, elects, as introductory; the Spirit enlightens, educates, sanctifies, and completes the saving process in the individual soul; the Son, acting as intermediate, represents, reveals, instructs, atones for sin, placates law, and lays a foundation in justice, whereby, under an economy of grace, every one who believes in him, the Father and the Spirit concurring, may be saved.

The most general conception of this specific work of the Son of God is expressed in the term mediation (v. MEDIATOR, MEDIATION). His peculiar mission is to interpose, in the temper of grace and for the purpose of both forensic and spiritual reconciliation, between man as a sinner, and the Deity against whom man has offended, and with whom he is morally at variance. As a mediator, the Son of God, who was also the Son of man, was amply qualified, both by inherent endowment and through official appointment; and in his work of mediation he is actually successful in removing alienation, in restoring the lost harmony between God and the sinner, and in securing to man a complete and blessed and eternal at-one-ment with his heavenly Father. This generic work of mediation is generally described by Calvinistic theologians under the three specific forms indicated in the terms prophet, priest, and king (v. JESUS CHRIST, THREE OFFICES OF). It has been questioned whether this distribution is in all respects desirable; whether, by the division of the one work into these three parts or offices, our sense of the essential unity of that work is not impaired; and whether the underlying idea of mediation is not weakened by such multiplicity of particular functions and relations. (VAN OOSTERZEE: Christian Dogmatics, see cviii.) Is this central idea adequately expressed in these three forms? Do they contain neither more nor less than the underlying conception? And, where the distribution is made, are these three offices always kept in their proportionate place, and severally invested with their proper dignity and value in the one mediatorial work? Whatever answer may be given to these questions on exegetical or speculative grounds, there is no adequate reason for rejecting an analytic presentation which has gained such definite expression in current evangelical creeds (Heidelberg Catechism, Ans. 31; Westminster Confession, chap. viii.), and which has been so extensively adopted as a regulative guide in modern theology.

Studying soteriology in this triple aspect, we may first note the prophetic function of the Saviour, as including that entire revelation of saving truth which he, as the divine Logos, came among men to make (v. PROPHET, PROPHECY). All religious, and especially all inspired, teachers who were prior to him as revealers of sacred doctrine or duty, were only messengers to prepare the way before him; and all who followed after had it as their mission simply to elucidate and expand what he taught. Christ was the one perfect Logos, in virtue both of his eternal relationship within the Trinity (v. TRINITY) and of his specific appointment as the Word of the Godhead to man. In him resided all the qualifications requisite to the complete fulfilment of this prophetic work, and from him came in highest form, and with most commanding power, all the truth which man needs to know in order to his salvation. This prophetic function may be subdivided into direct and indirect, — direct teaching through the formal enunciation of saving truths, and indirect teaching through the superadded power of example and personality. Christ, as teacher and prophet, becomes an enduring pattern also. In himself, as well as in his message, was light; and the light was the life of men. It may be queried, whether, in consequence of the strong inclination of evangelical Protestantism to exalt the priestly work of our Lord as central, this prophetic mission has not been relatively too much ignored, and, more specifically, whether the biblical view of him as the true norm and example of our humanity has not been surrendered too much to the uses of those who altogether reject his priestly character and mission.

Concerning this priestly function, it is needless to repeat what has been said elsewhere (v. ATONEMENT, JUSTIFICATION, JESUS CHRIST (THREE OFFICES OF), PRIESTS, PRIESTHOOD, OFFERINGS IN THE OLD TESTAMENT, etc.). The essential fact in the case is the voluntary and vicarious surrender of himself by our Lord as a sacrifice before God for sinners, on account of their sin, and in order to expiate sin, and to render possible the reconciliation and restoration of man as sinful. As a sacrifice, Christ was inherently and judicially perfect, a lamb without blemish and without spot: as a priest, he was in every way qualified for the sacrificial work in which he was thus engaged; and his administration of the priestly office was voluntary, official, and acceptable. In him both the Aaronic priesthood and the peculiar priesthood of Melchisedec were singularly blended. He was, in his own person, the absolute culmination of the priestly as well as the prophetic order and idea. As priest and as sacrifice he was perfect.

That this vicarious intervention and offering of himself in behalf of sinners and for sin was an essential part of the mediatorial work of our Saviour, is too clearly revealed in Scripture to be questioned by any who receive its testimony in the case as conclusive. It was not a merely arbitrary scheme, resting on no recognizable necessity: it was rather a scheme imperatively demanded by the ethical nature of both God and man, and by the character of the salvation which man as sinful needed. The exigencies of that moral government against which the sinner had rebelled, the requisitions of justice as an eternal principle in the Deity, and the needs of the soul itself in order to its spiritual recovery, alike required — as the Bible in multiplied ways asserts — such a sacrifice of himself, even unto death, on the part of our Redeemer. Without this, mediation would have been both inadmissible and ineffectual.

Whatever may be the precise method or methods in which that sacrifice in the divine economy becomes efficacious in satisfying justice, in placating law, in revealing grace, and making that grace potential, there can be no question in believing minds as to the fact. It must needs be that Christ to this end must suffer; and it must needs be that through his suffering, vicarious and substitutional, we are saved.

The nature and the extent of the atonement, as thus exhibited specifically in the priestly work of Christ, are matters respecting which wide differences of opinion have long existed within evangelical circles. Whether he personally assumed our guilt, and became, by the direct imputation of that guilt, a transgressor, deserving the infliction of actual penalty, or simply took our sin upon him as a weight to be carried and removed, meanwhile himself remaining sinless, alike in person and before the law; whether he endured the actual penalty of human transgression, being literally made in his representative relation a curse for us, or simply suffered what might be equitably regarded as an equivalent for penalty remitted, and a sufficient ground for the bestowal of pardon and all other spiritual blessings; whether his work was an actual and special provision for the redemption of the elect only, or was rather a generic arrangement of which all men may, through grace, alike avail themselves, a salvation offered implying in the fullest sense a salvation provided, — these are questions respecting which evangelical minds have differed, and which need no discussion here. Whatever may be the views of believers as to either the nature, or the extent and scope, of this sacrificial work of Christ, all are agreed in regarding the fact itself as both unquestionable and vital. That our Lord suffered as well as taught, and that he suffered on account of our sin and in order to save us from it, and that through his suffering we are actually saved from both the condemnation and the power of evil, and that this salvation is immediate and certain, and will be complete at last, — these are the great facts of grace which lie at the basis of the evangelical system, and which constitute the foundation of all evangelical hope.

Justification is the divine act of pardoning sin, and accepting sinners as if they were righteous, on the ground generically of all that Christ has done in the Munus Triplex of mediation, and specifically on the ground of what he has suffered as well as done in our behalf as our great high priest and sacrifice. The unconditional pardon of sin, with no appropriate regard for the nature of moral government and the claims of justice, would be an act unworthy of God. To accept the sinner as if he were righteous, and to adopt him (v. ADOPTION) into the family of God, and make him an heir of spiritual privileges and blessings, without requiring from him repentance, and return to loyalty, as conditions, and with no provision for his deliverance from the legal penalties incurred by his sin, would be a transaction still more unworthy. And the only adequate warrant for such pardon, acceptance, and adoption, must be found, not in any worthiness inherent in the nature of man or any merit seen in his life, nor even in his faith and repentance viewed as concomitants or consequences, but simply in the mediatorial, and especially in the sacrificial, work of Christ only. Our justification is in him, and in him alone.

The kingly office of the Saviour is a necessary element in his broad work of mediation. He is king because he has been prophet and priest; he is also king inherently, as divine. His kingdom commences in the believing heart, and is essentially spiritual: it is an authority exercised in love, and for the purpose of salvation. His church, as composed of those who have thus submitted to him personally, is his gracious empire; and over that empire he is the supreme head, everywhere and always. Within that church there can be no authority to supersede, or even, in the papal sense, to represent his: all its laws, officers, administration, activities, are subject entirely to him. This kingdom was founded by him before his earthly advent; it has been extended through many lands and centuries by his grace and power; it will continue to increase, through the agency of the forces now incorporated in it, until it has filled the earth. The notion, that, as a kingdom of love, it will ere long be supplanted by a kingdom of power, in which Christ will visibly appear as an earthly monarch, subduing his enemies by irresistible strength, and exalting his saints with him to a species of temporal domination (v. MILLENNARIANISM), is at variance with the view here presented. Beyond this earthly empire of our Lord as already defined, we discern his princely exaltation even now, at the right hand of the Father, to be advocate and intercessor for his people. This advocacy and intercession are to continue until all who are his are finally brought together with him into what is literally the kingdom of heaven.

Returning from this survey of the specific functions or offices of Christ to the underlying idea of mediation, we are able to comprehend in one view the full doctrine of salvation as wrought out by him on our behalf. There is indeed a subjective soteriology, which includes especially the work wrought within the soul of man by our Saviour through his spirit, and which is expressed in the terms regeneration and sanctification. But objective soteriology, such as we are considering, is summed up rather in the triple phrase of Aquinas, — Christus Legislator, Sacerdos, Rex. To the Protestant mind it is pictured forth essentially in the term justification, which, equally with regeneration and sanctification, shows us wherein the divine salvation consists.

SOTO, Dominicus de, b. at Segovia in 1494; d. at Salamanca, Nov. 15, 1560. He studied at Alcalá and in Paris; began in 1520 to teach philosophy at Alcalá, where he re-established realism in its old rights as the true principle of philosophy, and published Commentarii in Aristotelis Dialecticam (Salamanca, 1544), Categorías (Venice, 1583), Libris viii. physicorum (Salamanca, 1545), etc. In 1524 he entered the Dominican order, on which occasion he changed his baptismal name Francisus for that of Dominicus; and in 1532 he was appointed teacher of theology at Salamanca. By Charles V. he was sent as a deputy to the Council of Trent in 1545; and there, too, he appeared as a staunch champion of realism, publishing De natura et gratia (Venice, 1547), Apologia (Venice, 1547), etc.; but, after the transference in 1547 of the council to Bologna, he returned to the court, where he was appointed confessor to the emperor. In 1550 he resigned that position, and retired to Salamanca, where he spent the rest of his life, partly as teacher in the university, and partly as prior in a monastery. Among his works from this last part of his life, are commentaries on the Epistle to the Romans (against the Protestants) and on the Gospel of St. Matthew (unprinted), and De iustitia et iure, Salamanca, 1556, etc. NEUDECKER.

SOTO, Petrus de, a passionate adversary of the Reformation; b. at Cordova; d. at Trent, April 20, 1563. He entered the Dominican order in 1519, and accompanied Charles V. as confessor to Germany, where he was appointed teacher of theology at Dillingen. Afterwards he went with Philip to England, and taught theology at Oxford; but after the death of Mary, in 1558, he returned to Dillingen, whence he was called in 1561 to the re-opened Council of Trent, by Pius IV. He wrote Institutiones Christianæ, Augsburg, 1548; Methodus confessionis, Dillingen, 1553; Compendium doctrinæ catholicæ, Antwerp, 1556; Tractatus de institutione sacerdotum, Dillingen, 1558, etc. NEUDECKER.

SOUL-SLEEP, or PSYCHOPANNYCHISM (from soul-sleep), denotes a peculiar view of the state of the soul between the death and the resurrection of the body, according to which the soul is asleep. It somewhat resembles the still grosser error of soul-death, or thnetopsychism, which was defended by Petrus Pomponatius (d. 1525), and according to which the soul is actually dead from the death of the body to the day of the last judgment. The idea of soul-sleep originated among the Arabian and Armenian sects, but found also some favor in the west: traces of it occur in the writings of the Fathers. It was condemned by the councils of Lyons (1274), Ferrara (1438), Florence (1439), and Trent (1545-63); though Pope John XXII. (d. 1304) accepted it and openly advocated it. In the period of the Reformation it was revived by the Socinians and Arminians, and fully developed by the Anabaptists. Calvin wrote against it in his De psychopannychia, 1534, and in his Tract. var., vol. ii. See C. F. GÖSCHEL: Zur Lehre von den letzten Dingen, Berlin, 1850, and Der Mensch nach Leib, Seele, und Geist, Leipzig, 1856. C. F. GÖSCHEL.

SOULE, Joshua, D.D., a bishop of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South; b. at Bristol, Hancock County, Me., Aug. 1, 1781; d. at Nashville, Tenn., March 6, 1867. He was converted in June, 1797, was licensed to preach the following year, and in 1799 was admitted into the New-England Conference. In 1804 he was appointed presiding elder, and served as such, with one year's exception, until 1816, when he was appointed Book Agent in New-York City. He was the author of the plan for a delegated general conference of the church, which was accepted at Baltimore in 1808. He was editor of the Methodist Magazine from 1816 to 1819. In 1820 he was elected to the episcopacy, but declined to accept the office on the ground that the office of presiding elder had been made, by the General Conference of that year, elective, rather than subject to the appointment of the presiding bishop. In 1820-22 he preached in New-York City, and in 1822-24 in Baltimore. In 1824 he was again elected bishop, and accepted, as the office of presiding elder had now been made again subject to episcopal appointment. After his election to the episcopacy, he resided for some time at Lebanon, O. In 1842 he went as a fraternal delegate to the British Wesleyan Conference. At the division of the church in 1844, he adhered to the Methodist-Episcopal Church South, and thereupon moved to Nashville, Tenn. He continued active in the discharge of his episcopal duties until about ten years before his death, which occurred in the eighty-sixth year of his age. He was a presiding officer of great executive ability. In the graver and more important councils of the church he had no superior for discreet judgment, and prudence in counsel. He was eminently fitted in mind and character for controlling wisely and successfully measures and men. As a preacher he was slow and deliberate, but always sound in doctrine, strong in argument, and vigorous in style. His discourses evinced both breadth and depth, and are said to have been at times overwhelmingly impressive. He was a man of remarkable strength, both of character and of intellect. W. F. TILLET.

SOUTH, Robert, b. at Hackney, a suburb of London, in 1633; d. in London, July 8, 1716. His father was a wealthy London merchant, who afforded his son every advantage for a thorough education. His preparatory studies were pursued in the Westminster School, where he became a king's scholar, under the famous master, Dr. Busby. South is said to have read the Latin prayers in the school on the day of the execution of Charles I., and prayed for him by name; thus early showing that attachment to the established government and religion which ever afterwards distinguished him. In 1651 he was admitted as a student of Christ Church, Oxford, at the same time with John Locke. In 1655 he took the degree of bachelor of arts. During this year he composed a Latin poem congratulating Oliver Cromwell on the peace which he had concluded between England and Holland. As this was a prescribed university exercise, it is not necessary to infer that South was ever a Cromwellian at heart. Indeed, he appears to have been unpopular, even at that early day, with the Puritan party then in power; for when, in 1657, he obtained the degree of master of arts, John Owen, then dean of Christ Church, opposed his application. South was ordained in 1658 by one of the bishops who had been deprived of his bishopric during the Protectorate. In 1660, the year of the restoration of the monarchy, South was elected orator to the university of Oxford, and preached before the royal commission a sermon entitled the Scribe instructed, which immediately placed him in the front rank of English preachers. He delivered the university oration when Clarendon was installed Chancellor of Oxford, — a discourse which so impressed Clarendon, that he appointed him his domestic chaplain. This led to his installation, in 1663, as the Prebendary of St. Peter's, Westminster. In the same year he took the degree of doctor in divinity; and in 1670 he was made a canon of Christ Church, Oxford. In 1677 South accompanied the son of the Earl of Clarendon, Lawrence Hyde, on an embassy to congratulate John Sobieski upon his election to the crown of Poland. He gave an interesting account of what he saw abroad in a letter to Pococke, the professor of Hebrew at Oxford, and a fellow-canon. Soon after his return to England, in 1678, he was presented to the rectory of Islip in Oxfordshire, the revenue of which, some two hundred pounds, he applied, half to the payment of his curate, and half to educating and apprenticing the poorer children of the parish. South soon became one of the king's chaplains, and preached a sermon before Charles II., marked by invective against Cromwell, and, what is not very common with South, violation of good taste. This recommended him to the monarch, who suggested his appointment to the next vacant bishopric. But South declined all such offers, both in this reign and in that of James II. While he was a strenuous defender of the English Church, he was a determined enemy of the Roman-Catholic. The concealed Popery of Charles and the open Popery of James met with no support, but with determined opposition, from South. His stiff loyalty led him to refuse to sign the invitation, drawn up by the archbishop and bishops, to the Prince of Orange to assume the throne, saying, that "his religion taught him to bear all things; and, however it should please God that he should suffer, he would, by the divine assistance, continue to abide by his allegiance, and use no other weapons but his prayers and tears for the recovery of his sovereign from the wicked and unadvised councils wherewith he was entangled." But subsequently, when James had formally abdicated the throne, and the crown was settled upon William and Mary, South gave in his allegiance to the new government. He would, however, accept no bishopric from it, though his friends exerted themselves in this behalf. And he continued to be of this mind, when in the next reign, that of Anne, the same effort was repeated to raise him to what is the height of worldly ambition for many churchmen. But, while he did not seek the honors of the Establishment, he was the determined enemy of Dissent, and preached against it. He opposed the Act of Toleration. When an attempt was made, through a royal commission, to unite the Dissenters with the Established Church, by modifying the Liturgy, South entreated them to part with none of its ceremonial. In 1693 he had a controversy with Dr. William Sherlock, a fellow-churchman, and dean of St. Paul's, who, in his construction of the doctrine of the Trinity, fell into tritheism. South advocated the Nicene view with "great power of argument, and infinite wit and humor; more, indeed, than suited the solemnity of the subject."

The last part of South's life was clouded with sickness and debility which laid him aside from the active duties of his calling. His life was prolonged; and Dean Swift, it is said, waited impatiently, with other aspirants, for his decease, that he might get his prebendary and rectory. South died at the age of eighty-three, and was buried beside his old master, Dr. Busby, in Westminster Abbey.

South's distinction is that of a preacher, and he is second to none in any language. No one has combined and blended logic and rhetoric in more perfect proportions. Every sermon is founded upon a clear and clean plan that can be analyzed, and presented in its parts; and yet every sermon moves forward, from beginning to end, like a flowing stream, without break. He argues closely and rigorously; but the argument never interferes with the fluency and impetuosity of the discourse. The fire of his intellect kindles into a flame all his materials, however heavy and unwieldy. Even such subjects as predestination and the trinity are made popular and interesting by his powerful grasp and handling. And all this is heightened by his remarkable style. His mastery of English is almost unrivalled. The closeness and intimacy of the connection between the thought and the word is hardly excelled even by Shakspeare himself.

South was a Calvinist at a time when the drift of the High-Church Episcopacy, which he favored, set strongly towards Arminianism. Though anti-Puritan, and bitterly so, in regard to polity, both civil and ecclesiastical, he was a Puritan in theology. John Owen was not a higher predestinarian than he, and Richard Baxter was a lower one. It must have been from an intense conviction of the truth of this type of doctrine, that South, in the face of all his prejudices and of his ecclesiastical and courtly connections, defended it with might and main. For this reason, the great anti-Puritan has had, and always will have, warm admirers among Puritans and Nonconformists.

South's Sermons have been often reprinted; e.g., Oxford (1823, 7 vols.), Boston (1867-71, 5 vols.), London (1878, 2 vols.); and in these editions memoirs will be found. A volume of selections, with a memoir entitled The Wisdom of the Fathers, appeared in London, 1867. W. G. T. SHEDD.

SOUTHWELL, Robert, poet and martyr; was b. at Horsham, St. Faith's, Norfolk, about 1562; and hanged at Tyburn, Feb. 22, 1595. He was educated at Paris, Douay, Tournay, and Rome; received into the Society of Jesus, Oct. 17, 1578, when not yet seventeen; ordained, 1584, and made prefect of the English college at Rome; sent as a missionary to England, 1586; chaplain to the Countess of Arundel; betrayed to the government, 1592, imprisoned for three years in the Tower, found guilty of "constructive treason," and executed. According to Cecil, he, though "thirteen times most cruelly tortured, cannot be induced to confess any thing, not even the color of the horse whereon, on a certain day, he rode, lest" thereby his friends might fall into the same trouble. His poems were published shortly after his death, and a complete edition appeared 1856, edited by W. B. Turnbull. Some of them, since then widely copied, are of a very high order, and no less philosophic than Christian. F. M. BIRD.

SOZOMENOS, Salamanes Hermias, a contemporary of Socrates; lived, like him, as a scholasticus in Constantinople, and wrote, like him, a history of the church from 323 to 439, edited by Valesius (1659), together with the histories of Eusebius and Socrates, and found in Dupin, Nouvelle Bibliothèque. He seems to have known and used the work by Socrates. What he adds of his own, concerning hermits and monks, is of no great interest. But his style is better than Socrates'.

SPAIN. Christianity penetrated into Spain from North Africa. It is uncertain whether St. Paul carried out his intention to visit Spain. The first Christians were found in Andalusia. The story of the martyrdom of the apostle James at Compostella dates from the ninth century. Towards the end of the fourth century the whole country was Christianized, and divided into ecclesiastical provinces. The Council of Elvira (306) was attended by nineteen bishops and twenty-six presbyters, under the lead of Hosius. The councils and synods were presided over by the oldest bishop, afterwards by the metropolitan, of the province. Communications with Rome began during the Priscillianist controversy, and became more frequent and intimate after the conquest of Spain by the Visigoths, in 456. The Goths were Arians, and the Orthodox Church naturally sought for support from without. Nevertheless, when the Goths adopted the Catholic faith, at the Third Council of Toledo (589), the Spanish Church at once assumed a proud and reserved attitude with respect to Rome. The pallium was not asked for in Rome; and, when Gregory the Great sent it to Leander, the reason was simply that the latter was an intimate friend of his.

Towards the end of the seventh century Spain numbered sixty-six bishops. They were originally elected by the congregations, but afterwards appointed by the king on the presentation of the churches of the diocese, and finally by the king alone with the concurrence of the Archbishop of Toledo. They could be deposed only by a council, just as a minister could be deposed only by a synod. The oldest monasteries date from the sixth century. They had rules of their own, and multiplied rapidly after the victory of the Catholic Church. They stood at first under the absolute control of the bishops; but, on account of the frequent complaints, the episcopal authority was afterwards limited. The clergy were subject to the secular jurisdiction in all cases but the ecclesiastical ones, which were decided in the bishop's court. The general standard of the Spanish clergy seems to have been rather low; though several brilliant names occur, such as Orosius, Leander and Isidore of Hispalis, Ildefons, and Julian of Toledo, and others.

During the rule of the Visigoth kings (456-711) the Jews were kept under strict ecclesiastical supervision, on account of their dangerous connections with their co-religionists in Africa; but, under the Arabian dominion (711-1492), all spiritual and political pressure was removed, and they prospered very much. They produced men of consequence in almost every department of life; and by their wealth and commercial talent they exercised great influence, even in the Christian states of the country, though they generally excited the hatred of the people by their avarice. As soon, however, as the Christians gained the ascendancy, persecutions were instituted; and in 1492, the year of the conquest of Granada, all Jews were expelled from Spain. Many were converted to Christianity, and remained in the country; but their conversion was generally nothing but a mask; and, whenever the Inquisition detected the fraud, it was cruelly punished.

Under Arabian rule (711-1492) the Christians were allowed to retain their faith; though very heavy taxes were levied on them, — one-tenth of their revenue on those who submitted without resistance, and one-fifth on those who were subjugated by armed force. They were commanded not to speak disparagingly of the Koran and the Prophet, not to marry a Mohammedan woman, not to try to convert a Moslem to Christianity, not to make alliances with the enemies of Islam, etc. They were requested not to wear the same dress as the Mohammedans, not to build their houses higher than the Moslem, not to let their bells be heard, nor their cross be seen, in the street, not to drink wine or eat pork in public, etc. In the north-eastern part of the country, which, since the days of Charlemagne, stood under Christian rule, a peculiar liturgy, the so-called Mozarabic, was in use, until the Roman Liturgy was introduced in Aragonia in 1071, and in Castile in 1086. Between the twelfth and the sixteenth centuries, monasticism spread widely in the country. The Franciscans, who came to Spain in 1206, had a hundred and twenty-one monasteries there in 1400, and a hundred and ninety in 1506.

The revival of letters in Italy in the fifteenth century was soon transplanted to Spain; and there, as everywhere, it effectively prepared the way for the Reformation. The Protestant doctrines found from the very first many adherents among the Spaniards, especially among the higher classes; and several Spanish translations of the Bible were published, — by Francisco Enzinas (Dryander) in 1543, Juan Perez in 1556, Cassiodoro de Reyna in 1569, and Cypriano de Valera in 1596. King Philip II., however, and Pope Paul IV., supported by the Inquisition and the Jesuits, finally succeeded in completely suppressing the movement. But the means they employed are among the greatest horrors history ever heard of. The first auto-da-fé took place at Valladolid, May 21, 1559: when Charles II. celebrated his marriage with Louise of Orléans in 1679, an auto-da-fé formed part of the solemnities, and for fourteen hours the young couple sat looking at the burning of twenty-three heretics. During the latter part of the eighteenth and the first part of the nineteenth century, various moves were made in a more liberal direction. In 1780 the Inquisition performed the last auto-da-fé, and its office was reduced to the mere censorship of books. In 1835 the Jesuits were expelled, and all monasteries numbering less than twelve monks were closed. But with the concordat of 1851 a heavy re-action set in. The Virgin was appointed generalissimo of the Spanish army in 1854; and in 1861 a number of persons engaged in the Protestant propaganda, which had its seat in Gibraltar, were seized, and condemned to the galleys. It proved impossible, however, for Queen Isabella to carry out the concordat: it finally cost her the throne. [The new constitution of 1876 grants toleration, and makes all civil and political rights independent of denomination. The number of Protestants is hardly 60,000, of a population of nearly 17,000,000.] KLOSE.

SPALATIN, Georg, b. at Spalt in the diocese of Eichstädt, 1484; d. at Altenburg Jan. 16, 1545. He studied at Erfurt and Wittenberg; was ordained a priest in 1507, and appointed librarian, secretary, and chaplain to the Elector Frederick the Wise in 1512, and superintendent of Altenburg in 1525. As he was an intimate friend of Luther and the other Reformers, and enjoyed the full confidence of Frederick the Wise and his successors, he exercised a very great influence on the course of the Reformation. See his life by CHR. SCHLEGEL, Jena, 1693 (Latin), and by J. WAGNER, Altenburg, 1830 (German). NEUDECKER.

SPALDING, Johann Joachim, b. at Tribsees in Pommerania, Nov. 1, 1714; d. in Berlin, May 26, 1804. He studied theology at Rostock and Halle, and was appointed pastor of Lassahn in 1749, of Barth in 1757, and of the Church of St. Nicholas in Berlin in 1764, from which last office he retired in 1788, after the promulgation of the Wölner edict. He early abandoned the old-fashioned, scholastically developed Lutheran orthodoxy of his time, and occupied a position between the rationalism of the Wolfian philosophy and the sentimentalism of the pietists, from which stand-point he fought with vigor and success against the deism and atheism, which, from France and England, penetrated into Germany. His principal works are Über die Bestimmung des Menschen (1748), Über den Werth der Gefühle im Christenthum (1761), Über die Nutzbarkeit des Predigamts (1773), Vertrauten Briefe, die Religion betreffend (1781), etc., most of which were several times reprinted, and translated into French. He also left an interesting autobiography, published by his son, Berlin, 1801. HAGENBACH.

SPANGENBERG, Augustus Gottlieb, b. July 15, 1701, at Klettenberg, Prussia; d. Sept. 18, 1792, in the eighty-ninth year of his age, at Berthelsdorf, Saxony; was a bishop of the Moravian Church, and, next to Count Zinzendorf (q.v.), its most illustrious leader. He attended the grammar-school at Ilfeld, and the university of Jena, where an exegetical lecture of Buddeus, at which he happened to be present, induced him to give up the study of law, and devote himself to theology. He graduated in 1726 as master of arts, and soon after began to lecture in the university, and occasionally to preach. The free schools in the suburbs of Jena, established by a circle of pious students to which he belonged, enlisted his ardent support; and he was particularly active in training teachers for this work. In 1727 he met Zinzendorf, who made a deep impression upon him. Their acquaintance soon ripened into a warm friendship; and, on the occasion of a visit to Herrnhut (1730), Spangenberg formed a very close fellowship with the Brethren. His labors at Jena continued to be crowned with great success. After having declined various advantageous offers, he was induced, in 1732, to accept the position of adjunct of the theological faculty of the university of Halle, and superintendent of the schools connected with Francke's Orphan-House. But it soon became evident that he was not in sympathy with his colleagues. They took offence at some of his doctrinal views, at his association with separatists, and especially at the intimate connection which he persisted in keeping up with the Brethren. Complaints were lodged against him, and in 1733 he was dismissed from the university by a royal mandate. He immediately went to Herrnhut, and entered the service of the Moravian Church, laboring in various parts of Germany, in America, in the West Indies, and in England, where he organized (1711) the Society for the Furtherance of the Gospel among the Heathen; which association still exists. His work in America was particularly distinguished. After having been consecrated a bishop in 1741, he stood at the head of the Moravian Church in this country, with occasional interruptions, until 1762. He showed himself to be a wise ruler, a faithful pastor, an ardent evangelist. So prudent was the forethought with which he cared for his brethren, both in temporal and spiritual things, that they gave him the name of "Joseph," which he adopted, often signing official documents in this way. Nor was his work confined to his own church. The settlers in various Colonies, and especially the Indians, learned to know and revere him as a faithful messenger of the gospel. In 1762 he returned to Europe, took an active part in framing the new constitution of the Brethren's Church, and became the most prominent member of its governing board. The enthusiasm of Zinzendorf, which sometimes led him beyond bounds, was supplemented by the prudence and wisdom of Spangenberg. Among his numerous writings the most important are Idea Fidei Fratrum, oder Kurzer Begriff der christl. Lehre in den evangel. Brüdergemeinen, Barby, 1782, translated into English by La Trole, and entitled Exposition of Christian Doctrine, London, 1784; and Leben des Grafen von Zinzendorf, 1775, in 3 vols., abridged English translation by Jackson, London, 1838. Spangenberg composed many hymns, some of which are known and used wherever the German tongue is spoken; for instance, Die Kirche Christi die Er geweiht (Eng. trans., Moravian Hymnal, No. 612, "The Church of Christ, that he hath hallowed here"), and Heil'ge Einfalt, Gnadenwunder (Eng. trans., abridged, Moravian Hymnal, No. 432, "When simplicity we cherish"). The two most important biographies of him are, Leben Spangenbergs, von JEREMIAS RISLER, Barby, 1794. French trans., Neuchâtel, 1835, and LEDDERHOSE'S Leben Spangenbergs, Heidelberg, 1846, Eng. trans., London, 1855.

BISHOP E. DE SCHWEINITZ.

SPANGENBERG, Cyriacus, b. at Nordhausen, June 7, 1528; d. at Strassburg, Feb. 10, 1604. He studied theology at Wittenberg, and was in 1551 appointed court-preacher to the Count of Mansfield. As a passionate adherent of Flacius, he became implicated in the controversy concerning hereditary sin, and was in 1575 compelled to flee from Mansfield, disguised as a midwife. Appointed pastor of Schlitzsee-on-the-Fulda shortly after, his stubborn advocacy of the Flacian views once more disturbed the peace of the congregation, and again drove him into exile, in 1590. He found refuge at Vacha in Hesse, but only for a time, finally returning to Strassburg. His writings are devotional, polemical, and historical. See his life by J. G. LEUCKFELD, Quedlinburg, 1712.

G. H. KLIPPEL.

SPANHEIM is the name of a family which has produced several noticeable theologians. — Friedrich Spanheim, b. at Amberg in the Upper Palatinate, Jan. 1, 1600; d. at Leyden, April 30, 1648. He studied at Heidelberg and Geneva, visited Paris and England, and was in 1631 appointed professor of theology at Geneva, and in 1641 at Leyden. He was a very prolific writer, and wrote in the controversy with Amyraut, Disputatio de gratia universali, 1644; Exercitationes de gratia universali, 1646; Epistola ad Matthæum Cottierium, 1648; Vindicia exercitationum, 1649. — Friedrich Spanheim, son of the preceding; b. at Geneva, May 1, 1632; d. at Leyden, May 18, 1701. He studied theology and philosophy at Leyden, and was appointed professor of theology at Heidelberg in 1655 and at Leyden in 1670. He wrote in defence of Calvin against Descartes and Cocceius. His collected works appeared at Leyden, 1701–03, 3 vols.

SPARROW, William, an eminent theologian of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, United States; descended from a highly respectable Irish family; b. in Massachusetts, March 12, 1801. His parents returning to Ireland in 1805, he attended boarding-school in the Vale of Avoca. Returned to America, 1817. In his seventeenth year was appointed principal of Utica Academy; student at Columbia College, New York, 1819–21; professor of Latin and Greek at Miami University, 1824–25; ordained in 1826; collaborer with Bishop Chase in founding Kenyon College; eleven years Milnor professor at Gambier; professor of systematic divinity and Christian evidences in the Theological Seminary of Virginia, 1840–74; for thirty years delegate to General Convention from Virginia, and chairman of standing committee. Died at Alexandria, Va., Jan. 17, 1874.

During the civil war (1861–64) he carried on the work of the seminary in the interior of Virginia. At its close his unique relations to both sections enabled him to exert important influence in restoring the church in Virginia to its former ecclesiastical relations. As he had by the fame of his powers raised the Virginia seminary to an important position, so now his hand was chiefly concerned in its restoration.

Dr. Sparrow was recognized as the ablest theologian and the most original thinker of the evangelical school in the Protestant-Episcopal Church. His acute and powerful intellect, enriched by accurate learning, and strengthened by patient thought, moved with freedom among the profoundest questions of metaphysics and of theology. He bowed with unquestioning faith to the supremacy of Scripture, yet he welcomed modern criticism as an ally; and all his thinking proceeded on the conviction of the ultimate harmony of revelation and science. An earnest evangelical and a zealous Protestant, he was usually classed as Arminian in theology; yet he abhorred the narrowness of theological systems, and led his pupils up into the pure atmosphere of independent thought and rational inquiry. By the hundreds of young men who sat at his feet at Gambier and at Alexandria he was looked up to as a great teacher; and many of the best minds in the church have acknowledged their indebtedness to his suggestive and stimulating instruction. He was an earnest Episcopalian, but he put doctrine before order: hence he felt himself at one with Protestant Christendom, and rejoiced in the Evangelical Alliance as an expression of Protestant unity. He earnestly maintained the scriptural character of the Prayer-Book, but desired a revision, to remove ambiguities, and to relieve weak consciences. Accordingly, though he sympathized with the difficulties of Bishop Cummins, he deprecated his secession, and remained firm in his adhesion to the church. Perhaps no man of his time in America did more to check the spread of the tractarian theology.

He was also an earnest antagonist of the dogma of a tactual apostolical succession, holding it to be essentially unscriptural and anti-Protestant. To his great intellectual powers he added the influence of exalted piety, a character of great modesty and humility, and a life of simplicity and self-denial. He sealed his deep interest in Christian missions by the cheerful surrender to the Chinese mission of a daughter of remarkable talents. His lifelong feebleness of health, combined with an almost morbid aversion to appearing in print, unhappily prevented his entering the field of authorship; but a number of his occasional sermons and addresses saw the light, and a posthumous volume of Sermons appeared in 1876, New York (T. Whittaker).

The spirit of his teaching and of his life is well summed up in words of his own, graven on his tomb: "SEEK THE TRUTH, COME WHENCE IT MAY, COST WHAT IT WILL." See his Life and Correspondence, by Rev. C. WALKER, D.D., New York, 1876.

SPEE, Friedrich von, b. at Kaiserswerth in 1591; d. at Treves, Aug. 7, 1635. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1610; taught grammar, philosophy, and morals in the Jesuit college in Cologne; was for several years engaged in the persecution of witches, and led more than two hundred of them to the stake; and worked during the last years of his life as a missionary among the Protestants of Northern Germany. He published a book, Cautio criminalis, against the common method of trying witches, but is chiefly known as a religious poet, — Trutz-Nachtligal, Cologne, 1649 (edited by Huppe u. Junkman, 1841), and Göldene Tugendbach, probably published in the same year (last ed., Coblenz, 1850). Selections from those two collections of poems have been made by W. Smets and Karl Forster. SPENCER, John, D.D., Church of England; b. at Borton-under-Blean, Kent, 1630; d. at Cambridge, May 27, 1695. He was graduated M.A. at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, 1652, and elected fellow 1655. Ten years later he became D.D.; on Aug. 3, 1667, master of his college, and in the same year archdeacon of Sudbury. In 1672 he was made prebendary of Ely, and dean of Ely 1677. His fame rests upon his De legibus Hebræorum ritualibus et earum rationibus, Cambridge, 1685, 2 vols. fol.; reprinted, The Hague (1686), Leipzig (1705), Cambridge (1727), edited by L. Chappelow; reprinted, Tübingen, 1732, ed. C. M. Pfaff. In the two editions last-mentioned the fourth book, left in manuscript by the author, for the first time appears. The object of this very learned book is to show that Jewish law and ritual are in origin independent of those of surrounding nations, and expressly designed to fix a gulf between the Jews and their neighbors. Yet Spencer has been accused by Witsius, in his Ægyptiaca, and by Archbishop Magee, in his Atonement, of maintaining the hypothesis of the Egyptian origin of the Jewish ritual. Besides this famous work, Spencer wrote A discourse concerning prodigies, London, 1663, 2d ed. with Discourse concerning vulgar prodigies, 1665; Dissertatio de Urin et Thummin, Cambridge, 1669 (a comprehensive work upon several obscure Bible matters, e.g., Hebrew lustrations and purifications, circumcision, music, dancing, and burials).

SPENER, Philipp Jakob. Among the theologians of the Lutheran Church of the seventeenth century, Spener was the purest and most spotless in character, and the most successful in his work. He was born Jan. 13, 1635, in Rappoltsweller, in Upper Alsace, and d. at Berlin, Feb. 5, 1705. But as both father and mother came from Strassburg, and he himself was chiefly educated in that city, Spener usually called himself a Strassburger. With justice he is counted among those who retained their baptismal grace, and in it harmoniously continued to develop their Christian life. This natural piety was nourished by congenial family associations, by his relations to the noble widow of the Count of Rappoltstein, and by his study of the ascetic productions of Arndt, as also of Sonthhom, Baile, Dykes, Baxter, and other English writers at that time much read along the Rhine. His principal instructor, and the spiritual forerunner of the Spener period, was the court-preacher at Rappoltstein, Joachim Stoll, who in 1615 became his brother-in-law. "I owe to him among men the first sparks of Christianity," says Spener. On Stoll, cf. Rohrich: Mittheilungen aus der evang. Kirche des Elssasses, 1855, iii. p. 321.

After being thus privately prepared, the pious youth in 1651 entered the university of Strassburg. According to his own statements, he lived a very retired life, devoting himself entirely to his books. His theological leaders were Dorsche, Dannhauer, Johann Schmid, Sebastian Schmid. The first-named, a strict Lutheran theologian, Spener called his "preceptor;" the last-named was the most famous exegete of his day; and in Johann Schmid Spener saw his "father in Christ." In accordance with the custom of the day, a peregrinatio academica completed his course of studies. He first went to Basel to sit at the feet of the younger Buxtorf, at that time the most celebrated teacher of Hebrew. Then he spent a year in Geneva, which long stay tended to widen the mental horizon of the young Lutheran theologian; and he found much to praise in the organization of the Reformed Church as there represented. Labadie's fiery eloquence so influenced him, that he translated his Manuel de prière into German.

In 1661, in company with his pupil, the young Count of Rappoltstein, he paid a visit to Württemberg, and remained there five months. His qualities of mind and heart gained him many friendships in Stuttgart and Tübingen; and his permanent employment in Württemberg was only frustrated by a call to become pastor in Strassburg in 1663. He secured a situation which gave him leisure as a magister to deliver various courses of lectures at the university on history and philosophy.

In 1666 he received a call to become pastor and senior in Frankfurt-am-Main; and, after consultation with his political and ecclesiastical superiors, he accepted this vocation, so honorable for a man but thirty-one years of age. He endeavored to awaken a consistent and live Christianity in the Frankfurt churches, but was prevented to a great extent by the senate and city government. Cf. Bedenken, iii. pp. 105, 215, iv. 66. He first attempted to revive a thorough system of catechetical instructions, which had sadly fallen into decay. Mechanical memorizing was the first object of his attack; and, to effect his reformation in this regard, he published his Einfältige Erklärung der christl. Lehre, 1677, and his Tabulæ catechetice, in 108 tablets, in 1683. In his sermons his chief object was to inculcate purity of doctrine; but he no longer considered himself bound to confine himself to the pericopes, his endeavors being to make his congregation acquainted with the contents of the whole Scriptures. Then he brought about a more thorough preparation for the first reception of the Lord's Supper in connection with confirmation. He was successful, however, only in the country congregations. Cf. Bedenken, iii. 395. For a reformation of church discipline he could do little or nothing. His sermons, always mild, exerted a vast power. Although chiefly of a didactic character, yet they were marked by experience, and a deep knowledge of Scriptures; and his influence began to extend far beyond the boundaries of Frankfurt. Even his polemics against mechanical Christianity were not aggressive or challenging. Yet in 1669 a sermon on the false righteousness of the Pharisees caused a division between the earnest and the careless members of his flock, and in 1670 the former effected a closer union among themselves. The result was an organization, at first only of a few, for practical religious purposes. It met at first in Spener's study, and read different ascetic works, considered the last sermon, and the like. Soon assemblages were held in other houses also. In 1682 Spener succeeded in receiving permission to hold these meetings in the church, which somewhat changed their character.

Spener's days in Frankfurt were pleasant. He says, "In the honorable ministerium of Frankfurt, during the twenty years I was its senior, the God of peace kept us in brotherly harmony." His own character and nature contributed most to bring about this state of affairs. He continued to abide by his strict theological views, and thus did not as yet give any offence. In 1675 he published his famous Pia Desideria. In them he laments the corruption of the Evangelical Church, and recommends six different remedies. His Desideria were an earnest word to his church, and found an echo in many hearts in Germany. Only in Strassburg did they meet with a cool reception. More injurious to Spener's reputation were his collegia pietatis. Such private associations for religious purposes had before this already found favor, even with the heads of orthodoxy; but after their multiplication they also developed peculiarities looking toward a separation from the church, and thus "Pietists" gradually was regarded as the name of a sect. Among others, Spener's former friend, Mentzer, the court-preacher in Darmstadt, now also became his enemy. Dilfeld, in Nordhausen, in 1679, published his Theosophia Horbio-Speneriana, in which he maintained that regeneration was not necessary for true theology. Spener answers in his Gottesgelahrtheit, etc., and this controversy ended. Spener himself strongly opposed the separatistic tendency among his followers, especially in his Die Klagen über das verdorbene Christenthum, Missbrauch und rechter Gebrauch, 1684.

Spener had thus labored with great success in Frankfurt for twenty years, when in 1686 a call to become court-preacher, and member of the consistory at Dresden, usually regarded at that time as the highest ecclesiastical position in Germany, was extended to him. This was done at the especial request of the elector, George III., who had seen and heard Spener in Frankfurt, and learned his upright character through personal experience. The latter modestly put a low estimate on his Frankfurt work, and had no great plans for his labors at the Saxon court. His departure from Frankfurt on the 10th of July, 1686, was a day of sorrow for the whole city.

The new position indeed offered the possibility of greater influence and power than he exerted in Frankfurt, but this was measured by the personal influence over the elector. To gain this over the warlike George III. was not an easy task, as Spener soon discovered (Andenken, ii. 702). The first opposition to Spener came from Leipzig. The theologians at this university — such as Olearius, Carpzov, and Alberti — were indeed no longer representatives of the iron-clad orthodoxy in vogue at the beginning of the century, and even were anxious for practical piety; but many reasons aroused them against Spener. He was a stranger, and had obtained a situation which was the object of high ambition; and he had induced the consistory to censure the theological faculty for neglecting exegetical studies. When, then, the collegium philobiblicum, commenced in Leipzig for the purpose of studying the Scriptures in the original tongues, through Francke, Anton, Schade, and others, developed into German collegia biblica, in which laymen also took part, and which entered into closer relationship with Spener, Carpzov began to preach against the "Pietists." He was seconded by Alberti, formerly Spener's good friend; and when, in 1688, Spener's relative, Thomasius, published satires on the clergy, — and especially on Carpzov, Alberti, and Pfeifer, — Spener was accused of being responsible for these.

In Dresden itself, Spener's zeal and conscientious firmness as confessor of the wild elector caused him trouble, and finally brought about his removal to Berlin. He attempted to re-introduce catechetical instructions extensively, instructed the children himself, and for this reaped ridicule and abuse. The elector soon lost his interest in his court-preacher, seldom listened to his sermons, and avoided confession. When Spener, in his concern for his prince's spiritual welfare, wrote a letter to him, the displeasure of the sovereign fell upon him. The prince declared that "he could not longer endure the sight of Spener, and would have to change his residence on his account." The sudden death of George soon after opened the way for Spener's acceptance of a call to Berlin to become a member of the consistory of Brandenburg, and probst of St. Nicolai. When the displeasure of the elector first became known, the opposition to Spener began to assume large proportions, especially under the leadership of the Leipzig Carpzov, who assisted Roth, pastor in Halle, in editing his abusive pamphlet Imago pietismi. Spener's position in Berlin was in some respects more pleasant than that in Dresden. The Elector Frederick III. indeed showed no interest in his work; and his wife, Sophia Charlotte of Hanover, was an acknowledged sceptic, and hostile to him: but Spener's congregation was larger; and among the councillors of the throne he found at least one sympathetic person, Herr von Schweinitz, — vir pietate nulli secundus, as Spener says. Schade, his Leipzig friend, also soon came to Berlin; and in him he found a congenial soul. Here again, as in Frankfurt and Dresden, Spener immediately began his work with catechetical instructions, and the establishment of a collegium philobiblicum. He sought also to secure appointments for earnest pastors; and, chiefly through his influence, Breithaupt, Francke, and Anton, the later leaders of the pietistic movement, were made members of the theological faculty at Halle. In all church troubles, not only at Berlin, but also elsewhere, his voice was ever in favor of peace. His colleague Schade, through his inability to distinguish between use and abuse, had in blind zeal condemned private confessions in toto, and it was with great difficulty that Spener could allay the storm. Later he complains that his greatest sorrows had been caused, not by his enemies, but by his inconsiderate friends. And from abroad now come the accusations that Spener was the source of the many fanatical sects springing up everywhere. The war made upon him, in contrast with the thorough theological discussions of previous decades, was entirely of a personal and rancorous character: no means were too low for the purpose. The masterpiece among these libels is the Christlutherische Vorstellung, etc., published by the entire Wittenberg faculty in 1695. No less than two hundred and eighty-three heterodox views are here catalogued against Spener. This document, the production of the mentally weak senior of the faculty, Deutschmann, proved harmless fabrication; which fact Spener attributes to the influence of a kind Providence. This and the many other polemical writings, Spener answered in a becoming spirit. His principal work in this department is his Aufrichtige Uebereinstimmung mit der Augsburgerischen Confession, directed against the Wittenberg faculty. These answers show learning, research, and a deep piety.

In an indirect way he was drawn into another controversy of the church. The movement inaugurated by Calixtus had assumed a Romeward tendency; and several prominent teachers in Königsberg, and others, were strongly inclining in that direction. The elector authorized Spener, in conjunction with two other prominent theologians, to defend the Evangelical Church against the accusations of this new movement. This he did in a thorough manner in his Der ewangel. Kirche Rettung vor falschen Beschuldigungen, 1695; which work produced a marked effect. Two years later, however, Spener experienced the grief of seeing his former pupil, Frederick August of Saxony, join the Roman Church.

Spener did not live to see the victory in Berlin of the movement he represented. This took place when the king of Prussia in 1705 took as his third wife Sophia Louisa von Mecklenburg. Under the leadership of the court-preacher, Porst, prayer-meetings were held even in the royal castle, in which the king at times would participate. Just after having finished his work on dogmatics, entitled Von der ewigen Gottheit Christi, the noble teacher, who had been the guide for so many unto righteousness, himself entered into his final rest, Feb. 5, 1705. His death-bed scene and end are described by the eye-witness v. Canstein. Blankenburg, his former assistant, was appointed his successor.

Spener's wife, a lady from Strassburg, was one with him in mind and soul. Of his eleven children, eight survived him; but not all of these caused him joy.

In theological culture Spener was equal to any of his contemporaries. His sermons and polemical works show that he was a thorough exegete. In systematic theology he rivalled the best of his day, but did not depart from the formalistic and logical method of treating the dogmas so common at that time. Of the defects in his style and rhetoric, he himself was conscious. It was his principle to submit to the confessions of the church. Calovius himself acknowledged that he had found nothing heterodox in Spener; and, in fact, such is the case: he is in perfect harmony with the great Lutheran theologians, Gerhard, Meissner, Meyfart, V. Andrea, etc., whom he constantly cites. Only the abuses in the church, such as confidence in the opus operatum, the misuse of the confessional, the one-sided doctrine of faith and justification by faith, did he attack. He came to the conviction that purity of doctrine and pureness of life did not always go together, although he did not deny that departure from the truth would bring with it a departure from a proper Christian life. He saw in the Reformed Church errors, "in theory rather than in practice" (Bedenken, iv. 496), and hence was charitable in his judgment of it. Further, it was Spener's endeavor to bring the so-called third estate, the laity, into active co-operation in the service and government of the church. This was, indeed, the theory of the Reformation, but had not been practised. Personally, Spener cannot but excite admiration. Mildness, humility, and love may be regarded as the chief features of his character; but with these he joined manliness and courage. Even over against his bitterest enemies he preserves his dignity and equanimity. He himself declares that "the attacks of his opponents had never caused him even a single sleepless night." Spener cannot be called the father of pietism as it was developed later at Halle and elsewhere. Cf. THOLUCK's Lebenszeugen der luth. Kirche and Akademisches Leben, etc., vol. ii. He was indeed the most influential centre of this movement, but chiefly through his marked personality and moderation of his theological stand-point. In literature he was very active. Canstein's list of his works embraces seven volumes folio, sixty-three in quarto, seven in octavo, and forty-six in duodecimo.

SPENCER, Lazarus, b. at Nuremberg, March 13, 1479; d. there Nov. 7, 1534. He studied philosophy and jurisprudence at Leipzig, and held throughout life various important positions in the civil service of his native city. He joined Luther immediately on his appearance as a Reformer, was present at the Diet of Worms, stood in intimate relation with all the Reformers, and was very active for the consolidation and establishment of the Reformation. His life was written by Urban Gottlieb Haussdorff, Nuremberg, 1741. NEUDECKER.

SPENSER, Edmund, b. at East Smithfield, probably in 1553; d. at Westminster, Jan. 16, 1599; has a place in sacred literature by his Faerie Queene (1590-96), wherein religion, though subordinated to poetry, is by no means absent, and more definitely by his Hymnes of Heavenly Love and Beauty (1596), in which "may be found the germ of Paradise Lost, including the epitome of Milton's 'great argument.' He graduated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, 1573; issued The Shepheard's Calendar, 1579; was intimate with Sidney and Raleigh; held offices, and received an estate in Ireland; was expelled and ruined by the insurgents in Tyrone's rebellion, 1598, and ended his life miserably in London. His works, whether read or not, continue to be printed and praised; and his rank among the poets of that great age is next to Shakspeare. F. M. BIRD.

SPERATUS, Paulus, an active Reformer and much esteemed hymn-writer; b. at Rottweil, Franconia (whence the surname a Rubilis), Dec. 13, 1484; d. at Marienwerder, Aug. 12, 1551. He studied theology in Paris and Italy, but embraced the Reformation, and preached its ideas at Dinkelsbühl, Würzburg, Salzburg, and Vienna, whence he was compelled to flee, in 1521, on account of a sermon against the monastic vows: Von dem hohen Gelübde der Tauff, Königsberg, 1524. Appointed preacher at Iglau, he became middle-man between Luther and the Moravian Brethren, and made so deep an impression on the inhabitants, that he was arrested by Bishop Thurzo of Olmütz, and accused of heresy. Released at the instance of Margrave Albrecht of Brandenburg, he went to Wittenberg, where he aided Luther in his collection of German hymns, and was in 1525 made court-preacher to Duke Albrecht of Prussia. To this period belong most of his own hymns, original and translated; and in 1529 he was made bishop of Pomerania, in which position he was very zealous for the consolidation of the Protestant Church in Prussia. His life has been written by COSACK (1861), [PRESSEL (1862), and TRAUTENBERGER (1868)]. D. ERDMANN.

SPICE AMONG THE HEBREWS. By spice, especially aromatics are meant, which the Israelites used in common life. The common word for these aromatics is besamin: another term seems to be neshek (1 Kings x. 25). The terms rokuch, rikuchim, merkachah, mirkachath, signify more especially salves prepared from aromatics; whilst merkach seems to be the general term for aromatic plants. In the gardens of kings and nobles, such exotic plants were often raised (Cant. i. 12, iv. 13 sq., v. 13); but the gums, wood, etc., for the preparation of incense and salves, were mostly imported to Palestine and Egypt from the south of Arabia, Sabaa, and India, and negotiated by the Phœnicians (Ezek. xxvii. 22) and Ishmaelites (Gen. xxxvii. 25). Some of the species belonging here have already been treated, as BALM (q.v.), BELLUM (q.v.), FRANKINCENSE (q.v.), GALBANUM (q.v.), MYRRH (q.v.). We must not omit the ladanum and spikenard. As to the former, which is mentioned in Gen. xxxvii. 25 and xliii. 11 (Authorized Version, "myrrh"), it is the name of a bitter, aromatic, slimy, and sticky resin, flowing from the juice of cistus, of which there are several species. It was gathered from the beards of goats, where it is found sticking. The ancient versions, knowing the meaning of the Hebrew word no more, rendered it "stacte," — pistachionut, or chestnuts. As to spikenard, the far-famed perfume of the East, there were several kinds, one a very precious, the other less valuable. The former was gathered from a plant growing in North and East India, South Arabia, and Gedrosia, and belonging to the family valeriana. It still grows at the foot of the Himalayan Mountains. The Phœnicians imported this perfume to the West, and thus it came also to Palestine. Less precious than the Indian was the Syrian (especially well prepared at Tarsus), which was composed of oils, most of which also belonged to aromatic plants of the valeriana family. It was sold in small alabaster boxes (Mark xiv. 3), and was carried in smelling-bottles. It was used not only as salve, but also for seasoning the wine. With such precious nard, Mary of Bethany anointed the Saviour six days before the passover (John xii. 1). This oil was also used for the purpose of preserving the dead. The name "nard" is of Sanscrit origin, and points to the home of the plant: it denotes "giving an odor." Besides these different species, the Bible also mentions the following spices. Aloes (Num. xxiv. 6; Prov. vii. 17; Cant. iv. 14; Ps. xlv. 8; John xix. 39), a fragrant wood (hence aloë-wood) growing in India, where it is called aghil. The Europeans call it lignum aquilæ [i.e., eagle-wood]. The wood is resinous, of a dark color, heavy. The Indians regard the aloë-trees as holy. Another aromatic wood is the algum, from Ophir (1 Kings x. 11 sq.; 2 Chron. ii. 8, ix. 10); also almug, not "pearls," as the rabbis explain, but probably sandal-wood. Besides the wood we must also mention the bark of different trees growing in India, and which the Hebrews at a very early period counted among the spices; thus especially the cinnamon (Exod. xxx. 23, where it is enumerated as one of the ingredients employed for the preparation of the holy anointing oil). It also occurs Prov. vii. 17; Cant. iv. 14; Rev. xviii. 13. The home of the cinnamon is Ceylon. According to Nees von Esenbeck (Disp. de cinnamomo, Bonn, 1825), the cassia was not a distinct species, but only a wild or original form of the Cinnamomum Ceylonicum. There are two Hebrew words rendered "cassia," — kiddah and ketsiah, — which were among the ingredients of the holy incense, according to the rabbis. To these ingredients the Talmud adds also the koshet, the costus-root. Another ingredient was the calamus (kaneh bosesem, also kaneh ha-tob, Exod. xxx. 23; Jer. vi. 20; Isa. xliii. 24) and karkom, or saffron, only mentioned in Cant. iv. 14. To the resinous and balsmy spices already mentioned we may perhaps add the nekoth (Gen. xxxvii. 25, xliii. 11), some kind of gum; the libneh, or poplar (Gen. xxx. 37), by some regarded as the storax-tree; the mastic (Susan. v. 54), a tree growing in Greece, Asia Minor, and Palestine, — the Pistacia lentiscus. It is extensively used in the East in the preparation of spirits, as a sweetmeat, as a masticatory for preserving the gums and teeth, as an anti-spasmodic in medicine. To the spices we may also add the cypress-branch (kopher, A.V., camphire, but in the margin cypress, Cant. i. 14, iv. 13), carried by the Mohammedan women in the bosom. The powdered leaves, which are mixed with the juice of citrons, are used to stain therewith the hair and nails. The sicpard, in Isa. lv. 13, translated "brier," is, according to some (Eichhorn, Ewald), the white mustard. Finally, we mention the gourd (kikayon, Jon. iv. 6-10), whose growth was miraculous: it is the Ricinus communis, or castor-oil plant. In the Talmud the kik-oil is mentioned, prepared from the seed of the ricinus.

LEYRER.

SPIERA, Francesco, the unfortunate man, who, for worldly considerations, denied his Protestant profession, and in consequence died in a condition of maddened despair and remorse; was b. at Citadella, near Padua, Italy, about 1498; d. there December, 1548. A lawyer and public official in his native city, greatly honored, rich, and ardently devoted to the pursuit of wealth, he accepted the message of the Reformation; and experiencing peace, comfort, and joy in a remarkable degree, according to his own account, he preached everywhere, on the streets and in private, to his fellow-townsmen. He studied the Scriptures carefully. His change of life produced a great excitement. He was accused by the priest of the town at Rome. When Spiera learned that he was about to be summoned to appear before the papal authorities, he lost courage, and went of his own free will, but only after a terrible struggle with his conscience, to Venice, to confess repentance to the papal legate, della Casa. He subscribed a penitential document which the legate drew up, and read a similar document, recanting the doctrines of the Reformation, in the church of Citadella, before two thousand people. No sooner, however, had he arrived at his own home than he was overcome by the most terrible fears of the judgment and eternal condemnation. He could not leave his bed, lost his appetite, attempted several times to take his own life, was carried to Padua, but brought back to Citadella, and died a few days afterwards in despair. These experiences, and the manner of Spiera's death, produced an intense excitement. Spiera believed he had committed the sin against the Holy Ghost, and refused all the consolations drawn from the consideration of the divine mercy. He held he belonged to the number of those who were lost, and lost eternally. "Oh, if I were only greater than God! for I know he will not have mercy upon me," he exclaimed. In his assurance that God had forsaken him, he had the most painful visions. Devils surrounded him, stuck needles into his pillow; a fly buzzed about his head, which was sent by Beelzebub; and, in his terrible consciousness of sin, he often roared like a lion, causing those about him to tremble.

Criticising the history of Spiera, we come to the conclusion, that in spite of his preaching the gospel, and laying claim to the finest Christian experiences, he was never truly penitent for his sins. He professed to accept the doctrine of justification by faith, but did not accompany his profession by a forsaking of sin. Calvin and the other Reformers took a deep interest in the case; and Calvin, who wrote a preface (December, 1549) to the account of Henricus Scotus, regarded his sufferings and remorse as a terrible judgment of God, sent to awaken Italy. He regarded Spiera as one of those who deceive themselves with the belief that they are of the predestinate, when they are not. There have been other cases similar to that of Spiera, as Henry IV. of France. Other cases are mentioned in CONQUEREL: Hist. des Eglises du Desert. Spiera is to be looked upon as one of the negative evidences for the truth of Protestantism. We have no instance of any pervert from the Roman-Catholic Church to Protestantism having a similar experience. There are several accounts of Spiera's life and death. Those of VERGERIUS, GRIBALDUS (professor of law at Padua), HENRICUS SCOTUS, and GELOUS (professor of philosophy at Padua), are contained in the work Francisci Spiera . . . historia, a quatuor summis viris summa fide composita, cum clariss. virorum præfationibus, Calii S. C. et Jo. Calvini, et Petri Pauli Vergerii Apologia, accessit quoque Martini Borrhæi de usu, quem Spiera tum exemplum, tum doctrina afferat, judicium. See ROTH: Francesco Spiera's Lebensende, Nürnberg, 1829; [BACON: Francis Spira, Lond., 1665, 1710; SCHAFF: Sünde wider den heiligen Geist, Halle, 1841, Appendix]. HERZOG.

SPIFAME, Jacques Paul, Sieur de Passy, b. in Paris, 1502; beheaded at Geneva, March 23, 1566. He studied law in his native city, and was in the course of a brilliant career as councillor to the Parliament, when he suddenly broke off, and entered the service of the Church. In this field, too, he made a brilliant career; became vicar-general to the Cardinal of Lorraine, whom he accompanied to the Council of Trent; and was in 1548 made bishop of Nevers. But in 1559 he resigned his see in favor of his nephew, and went to Geneva, where he embraced the Reformation. One of the reasons for this move was his relation to Catherine de Gasperne, a married woman whom he had seduced, and who lived with him after the death of her husband. At Geneva they were married; and Spifame was ordained a minister of the Reformed Church, and appointed pastor of Issoudun. In 1562 he went to Francfort as the ambassador of the Prince of Condé; and in 1564 he went to Pau as an agent of the Queen of Navarre, Jeanne d'Albret. But he made the queen his irreconcilable enemy by saying that her son, Henry IV., was not the son of Anton of Bourbon, but of Merlin; and on his return to Geneva he was arrested. During the investigation, some forgery with respect to his own marriage was proved against him; and he was sentenced to death, and beheaded. THEODOR SCHOTT.

SPINA, Alphonso de, a Christian apologist of Jewish descent; lived in Spain in the fifteenth century; entered the Franciscan order after his conversion; was for some time rector of the school of Salamanca, and became finally bishop of Orense in Galicia. His celebrated work,  Fortalitium fidei contra Judæos, Saracenos, etc., was written in 1458, but not printed until 1484; especially the part against the Mohammedans is of great historical interest. SPINOLA, Cristoval Rojas de, a Roman-Catholic unionist; d. March 12, 1695; a native of Spain, and general of the Franciscan order in Madrid; came to Vienna as confessor to the wife of Leopold I., a Spanish princess, and was made bishop of Wienerisch-Neustadt in 1685. A peaceable union between the Protestant churches and the Church of Rome was the great idea of his life; and the religious indifference of the Protestant courts in Germany, the disgust of the higher classes at confessional controversies, the mild character of the school of Helmstädt, etc., made, for a time his exertions look successful. A conference took place in 1683. Spinola presented his Regulæ circa Christianorum omnium ecclesiasticam reunionem, and the Helmstädt theologians, their Methodus reducendæ unionis, etc. But, though the Emperor and the Pope were in favor of the scheme, serious Roman Catholics considered Spinola a fool, and serious Protestants were scandalized at Molanus. The negotiations, however, continued after the death of Spinola. See LEIBNITZ and MOLANUS.

SPINOZA, Baruch de, b. at Amsterdam, Nov. 24, 1632; d. at The Hague, Feb. 21, 1677. His parents were Jews who had been driven from Portugal by religious persecution. His teacher in Hebrew was the celebrated rabbi, Saul Levi Morteira, who introduced him to the study of the Bible and the Talmud; besides, he studied Latin under the celebrated physician, Franz van der Ende. Differences between his views and the Jewish doctrine were soon noticed, and so he was expelled from the Jewish communion on account of "frightful heresies." He left Amsterdam, and lived in the vicinity from 1656 to 1660, then at Rhynsburg and Voorburg, near The Hague. Finally he settled at The Hague; residing there to the end of his life, and supporting himself by grinding lenses. In 1673 he refused to take a call as professor of philosophy to Heidelberg, saying that he might be hindered there in his liberty of philosophizing.

Clearness and calmness are the main features of his character. He was never seen laughing, nor very sad, but kind and gentle to all. Free from hypocrisy, a man of few wants, he was the image of a true sage.

His writings are, Renati Descartes Principiorum philosophiæ, pars i. et ii., etc., Amstelodami apud Joh. Rieuwertsz, 1663; Tractatus theologico-politicus, Hamburgi apud Henricum Künraht, 1670; Baruch de Spinoza's Opera posthuma, Amsterdam, apud Joh. Rieuwertsz, 1677, containing Ethica ordine geometrico demonstrata, etc., Tractatus politicus, Tractatus de intellectus emendatione, Epistolæ; Baruch de Spinoza tract. de Deo et homine ejusque felicitate (recently discovered); The unfinished Essays of Spinoza, ed. Hugo Ginsberg, Heidelberg, 1882. We shall only consider here the Ethics and the Tractatus theologico-politicus as the most important works for philosophy and theology.

Spinoza, the second great philosopher in the course of the purely rationalistic development of modern philosophy, stands in very close connection to his great predecessor, Descartes. The fundamental notion of Spinoza's system is the notion of substance, which is thus defined: "By substance I understand that which is in itself, and which is conceived by itself; i.e., the conception of which does not need the conception of another thing in order to be formed. There is but one substance, which is identical with God. We cannot predicate any thing of it, as omnis determinatio est negatio, and the infinite cannot contain any negation, because it is the absolute affirmation of existence." All predicates used by Spinoza to define its nature are therefore but a circumlocution of the first definition.

In order to comprehend something of the infinite substance, we must look to the second important notion in the system, — the notion of the attributes. Substance cannot be comprehended by its mere existence, but only by attributes, which are what reason perceives as constituting the essence of substance. The attributes, therefore, belong only to our mind, not to substance itself, which cannot admit any determination, i.e., negation. Our mind may therefore ascribe a number of attributes to substance. Spinoza, however, considers substance only under the attributes of thought and extension. The cause of these two attributes is not in God, but in the human mind, which finds both thought and extension in itself. The attributes are independent of each other, and must be comprehended per se, not by substance; as the notion of attributes is not dependent on the notion of substance, which excludes every determination. Res cogitans and res extensa are the same thing, i.e., considered from different stand-points; but it is indifferent to substance how it is considered.

The notion of substance, being but one, seems to imply that substance = every thing existing, i.e., the world. But how can the finite proceed from the infinite? This question is senseless according to Spinoza, because the finite, as the finite, does not exist; for all determination is non esse, and the finite is determination. The finite things have real being only as far as they are in God, in whom omnia sunt simul natura. This produces the third important notion, — the notion of the modes or affections. Modes are the accidents of substance, or that which is in something else, i.e., in God, by whom, also, they are conceived. For modes are nothing in themselves: they are like the waves of the ocean. There is nothing existing outside of God, and it would be absurd to say that God was composed of modes. It is false, therefore, to say of Spinoza that he taught God and the world were identical, because we can conceive of the world only as being composed of single objects. Single objects do, therefore, not exist as such, but only as modifications and accidents of substance.

There is a threefold mode of considering things. The first kind of cognition, which he calls opinio or imaginatio, is cognition through unregulated experience or signs, by which we connect certain ideas. The second kind of cognition, ratio, is cognition through the peculiarities of things, and notiones communes. The third kind of cognition is the intuitive knowledge of the mind, or true knowledge. Looking at the world through imagination, it appears to us as being composed of real things; and so we have the idea of a natura naturata, i.e., of a world. But it is the nature of our mind to know things as necessary or external; and substance considered in this way, i.e., the true way, produces the idea of a natura naturans.

There is no relation between both, not even the relation of causality. Spinoza, speaking, however, of causality, means an immanency of causality. God is therefore only the substance, or the substratum of objects.

As will is but a mode, it is self-evident that God cannot act with free will: everything follows from his necessity, i.e., his nature being his power. It is foolish to assume that God acts according to aims, for this means to subject him to something else. The basis of his being is the basis of his acting. The law of causality rules, however, in the natura naturata.

In like manner as substance is conceived under the modes of thought and extension, single objects must be conceived, because they are modes of thought and extension; for the world is either a material world, or a world of ideas. Being modes of the same substance, they must stand in accordance, so that the order and connection of ideas is identical with the order and connection of things. A thing is, however, caused only by a thing, and an idea by an idea; not a thing by an idea, or an idea by a thing. This is true of all single modes, which are things or ideas according to the way they are considered. All things are therefore animated, but they differ in the grade of animation. Body and soul are, according to this, identical, considered under different modes. It is self-evident that the mind cannot act upon the body, and the body cannot act upon the mind. But, as there is an idea of the human body, there is also an idea of the soul, or the idea of the idea.

The individual man is therefore nothing but a mode of the divine substance. The human mind may thus be called a part of the divine reason, and we can say that all intellects together form the infinite intellect. Man, being only a mode of substance, stands in an endless series of causes. His will as a modification of the body is therefore also determined. Men think to be free because they are not conscious of the determining causes. Will is the faculty to affirm or deny: this is again determined by the idea of that which is to be affirmed or denied. Will and intellect are therefore identical. We are active when any thing happens of which we are the adequate cause; passive, however, if any thing happens of which we are not, or only partly, the cause. The mind is therefore active only when having adequate ideas; passive, when having inadequate ideas, or being under the influence of the imagination. The endeavor to become free from this, and to reach a state of perfection, is called will, or, speaking of the body, appetite. The transition of the mind to greater perfection is joy: the opposite is sadness. Joy accompanied by the idea of its external cause is love: sadness accompanied by its external cause is hate. All other passions are derived from these. The servitude of man consists in his inability to control his passions. The common conceptions of good and evil are wrong. These terms denote nothing positive which exists in themselves, but are conceptions and notions which result from our comparing of things. The evil, or sin, is nothing positive; for nothing happens against the will of God. It is therefore a negation which appears to be something only in our conception. There is no idea of the evil in God; for, if sin was something real, then God would certainly be its author. In order to get a precise notion of the terms "good" and "evil," he defines good to be that of which we know with certainty that it is useful to us, and evil, that of which we know with like certainty that it hinders us in the attainment of any good.

Virtue is nothing but the power to produce that which is according to one's nature. I do not sin against all laws, or approve crimes, because it is against my nature; and reason does not require any thing which is against nature. That is of real usefulness which brings man to a greater perfection. But as the true nature of reason is knowledge, then nothing is useful but that which serves knowledge. The highest good is the knowledge of God. Joy is something good; sadness, something bad; likewise all passions which involve sadness, like compassion, meekness, or repentance. A passion ceases to be a passion, i.e., a state of suffering, as soon as we have a clear idea of it. Every man may thus free himself of his passions, because he is able to have a clear idea of the passions of his body. This is possible by looking at things as being necessary. He who knows his passions rejoices, and has at the same time the idea of God; i.e., he loves God. This love, or the intellectual love of God, results from the third kind of cognition, — the cognition sub specie eternitatis, by which we know God as an eternal being. God, being superior to all passions, can, strictly taken, neither love nor hate; and whosoever wishes to be loved by God wishes that God should cease to be God. But, as our ideas are really thoughts of God, we may say that our love to God is a part of God's infinite love to himself. Our blessedness and freedom consist in this eternal love of God, and in this sense we may say that man is eternal (immortal). The idea of eternity has nothing to do with time or duration. Knowing things under the third form of cognition, man will be free of his passions, and will not fear death, because his spirit is eternal. This eternal part of the spirit is the reason; the part disappearing, his imagination. Even if we knew nothing of our eternity, virtue and piety would be our aim, for blessedness is not the reward of virtue, but virtue in itself is blessedness.

These are the outlines of Spinoza's philosophy as contained in his Ethics, the principal work of his life.

The Tractatus theologico-politicus, one of his earlier essays, was probably caused by his personal experience, and is very important as a defence of liberty of thought.

The difference of men is nowhere more distinctly shown than in their opinions, especially their religious opinions. It must be left, therefore, to the judgment of every individual to believe whatever he wants, as long as his belief produces good works; for the State has not to care for the opinions of men, but for their actions. Faith, religion, and theology have no theoretical importance or truth: their object is an entirely practical one, i.e., to bring those men who are not ruled by reason to obedience, virtue, and blessedness. It is the object of philosophy to give truth. Philosophy and theology have nothing in common. The reason for their difference is the following: God as the object of religion is a human being, i.e., he is represented in his relation to man; while God as the object of philosophy is not a human being, i.e., he is considered in relation to himself. Holy Scripture does not give a definition of God: it only reveals to us the attributes of justice and love. This is a clear proof that philosophical knowledge of God cannot serve as a model for human life. God is represented in Scripture to the imagination as a ruler, as just, gracious, etc. Philosophy, which deals with clear notions, cannot make use of these attributes. Theology has, therefore, no right to rule over philosophy, as the result of such a dominion will be fanaticism without peace. That will, of course, undermine the foundations of the State, and the State should not allow the encroachments of theology.

His biblical criticisms and views on the person of Christ, contained in this essay, are also of great interest.

The logical fallacies and other defects in the system of Spinoza have been frequently pointed out. The principal objections to be made are the following. The idea of substance is motionless, and insufficient for an explanation of growth and life: the modes stand, therefore, in hardly any connection with substance, and thus do not fulfil what they are intended for. The practical philosophy, although grandly drawn, does not cover the whole realm of the social, artistic, and ethical life of man: nevertheless, the system, and especially the sublime idea of substance, has had the greatest influence upon modern philosophy. Fichte, Schelling, Schleiermacher, Hegel, and many others, owe very much to Spinoza. And many of the thoughts expressed in the Tractatus theologico-politicus, for which he was persecuted by the theologians of his time, are to-day accepted as true by theology. The old reproach of atheism and pantheism, so often made by ignorance, will disappear more and more by a thorough knowledge of his writings. And, while the scholars at present disagree as to the influence of Descartes and the old Jewish philosophers upon Spinoza, they should not forget the consumptive state of the philosopher's health; for our sublimest thoughts are not reached by the syllogism of the reason, but are born in the depth of the soul. Spinoza's influence upon poetry (Goethe, Schefer, Auerbach, etc.) has therefore been almost equal to his influence on philosophy.

DR. JULIUS GOEDEL.

SPIRES, a city of Bavaria on the Rhine, is noticeable in church history as the seat of four diets concerning the Reformation. — I. The first diet was opened June 26, 1526. The situation was very trying to the emperor. Francis I. had just broken the peace of Madrid with the consent of the Pope, and the Turks were threatening in the East. Under those circumstances the emperor dropped the religious question altogether, and left to the states to manage it as they could best defend before God, until a council, œcumenical or national, should finally settle it. — II. The second diet was opened March 15, 1529, under very different circumstances. Francis I. was suing for peace, and the Turkish hordes had retired. The Roman-Catholic majority consequently decreed that the mass should be restored wherever it had been abolished, that a rigid censorship of books should be established, and that every preacher who did not recognize the real presence in the sacrament should be excluded from the pulpit. Against these decrees the evangelical minority entered a formal protest, whence their name, Protestants. — III. The third diet was opened Feb. 9, 1542; and the emperor confirmed the peace of Ratisbon (1541) in order to get the necessary subsidies against the Turks. — IV. The fourth diet was opened by the emperor in person, Feb. 20, 1544; and again the Turkish affairs compelled the emperor to concede toleration in religious matters. SPIRIT, the Human, in the Biblical Sense.

The biblical terms for "soul" are שֵׁנַּי, psychē; and for "spirit," רוּחַ, pneuma. We owe the conception of the human spirit, as, indeed, of spirit in general, to the Sacred Scriptures, to the religion of revelation. It is peculiar to these to speak of pneuma in the psychological sense as the cause of the human existence, particularly of his personal life. Where the Scriptures speak of the spirit of man in its widest acceptation, that is, of life (as in Job x. 12, xvii. 1; Ezek. xxxvii. 8; Zech. xii. 1), and ascribe to men and animals the same spirit (as in Eccles. iii. 19 sqq.; cf. Gen. vi. 17, vii. 15, 22; Ps. civ. 30; Isa. xlii. 5), they do this under the idea that this gift of life, which conditions the existence of the creature, comes from God, and binds it to God (cf. Job xii. 10, xxxiii. 4, xxxiv. 14; Ps. civ. 29). God is a god of the spirits of all flesh (Num. xvi. 22, xxvii. 16), towards man "the father of spirits," in distinction from "the fathers of our flesh" (Heb. xii. 9). Where life is, there is spirit, and the spirit points to God; for it is God's sign and God's possession, and the point at which God and the creature meet. And we thus understand how and what the Bible speaks by the spirit of man. Soul and spirit are in a number of passages interchangeable (Gen. xlv. 27, cf. Ps. cxix. 175; 1 Sam. xxx. 12, cf. 1 Kings xvii. 21 sq.; Ps. cxlvi. 4, cf. Gen. xxxv. 18; Ps. lxxvii. 3, cf. Ps. cvii. 5; Ps. xxxi. 5, cf. 2 Sam. iv. 9; Ezek. xxxvii. 8, cf. Acts xx. 10); because, in these, both are used in their primary significance, i.e., of the breath, that by which man lives, and which lives in him. Yet the Bible does make a distinction between these terms. Thus, dying is both a giving-up of the spirit and of the soul;

it is never said that the spirit dies, but that the soul dies (Num. xxxi. 19; Judg. xvi. 30; Matt. x. 28; Mark iii. 4). Only the soul is the subject of will and desire, inclination and aversion, pleasure and disgust (cf. Deut. xii. 20, xiv. 26; 1 Sam. ii. 16; Job xxiii. 13; Ps. xlii. 2, lxiii. 1; Prov. xxi. 10; Isa. xxvi. 8; Mic. vii. 1, etc.); but soul and spirit are alike the subject of perception, self-consciousness. It must not, however, be overlooked, that consciousness, perception, willing, are attributed to the heart; and soul and spirit are spoken of only as they concern the hidden state to which these functions and phenomena belong, and because some weight would be laid upon it. Again: the dead are spoken of as spirits (Luke xxiv. 37, 39; Acts xxiii. 8 sq.; Heb. xii. 23; 1 Pet. iii. 19), but the living as souls, for the soul as such outlasts death. Finally, and this is the most important difference in the Bible use of these words, whereas soul is applied to the individual, the subject of life, spirit is never so used. Spirit as an independent subject is always something different from the human spirit.

This latter distinction rests upon the original difference of the terms: πνεῦμα, "spirit," is the condition, while ψυχή, "soul," is the manifestation, of life. But for the explanation of this and the other peculiarities of usage, it is, of course, not sufficient always to call to mind the different points of view from which the inner being of man is described, now as spirit, and now as soul. One must go a step beyond the original relation of the two descriptions. Granted that spirit and soul are related as vital principle and life, still it is possible to distinguish them, not only in conception, but in fact; because the spirit, the principle of the soul, is the divine vital principle, immanent in, but not identical with, the individual life. Soul and spirit cannot be separated as soul and body, but they can be distinguished. Spirit is the principle of the soul; and it cannot be said of the spirit, which proceeds from God, and always bears the divine vital principle, that it sins or dies.

It is the knowledge of God and of the fall which leads us to make the distinction between the present actuality of life and its divine original creation. Spirit is wherever life is; and this spirit is the spirit of God, but in a peculiar manner. This spirit belongs to man. Not by the mere fact of creation does the holy spirit come to man, for this spirit is something different from the human spirit. The holy spirit is the cause of the soul, not identical with it. Sin has broken the connection between the human spirit and the spirit of God. So death came in as the opposite of the spirit wrought and filled eternal life, which was man's before the fall. Man now has a consciousness of guilt. He feels the pressure of law, and his inability to obey it. Through the impartation of the spirit, man is, however, renewed. He has life in its true sense. And this renewal affects his whole being in all its relations (Rom. viii. 11; 2 Cor. v. 5; Eph. iv. 23, 30; 1 Thess. v. 23).

The distinction between spirit and soul is the peculiar characteristic of the Bible's idea of the nature of man. But this is not saying that the Bible teaches a trichotomy. On the contrary, nothing is farther from it than such a trichotomy as, for instance, the Platonic. The biblical trichotomy, as we find it in 1 Thess. v. 23, Heb. iv. 12, and which there rests upon the knowledge of sin and the experience of salvation, does not exclude a decidedly dichotomic expression, as 1 Pet. ii. 11, where the soul is regarded simply according to her spiritual determination as the bearer of the divine life-principle (cf. Phil. i. 27).

SPIRITUALISM is a term, which, in its wider sense, is often applied to various forms of mysticism and quietism, as represented by Jacob Boehme, De Molinos, Mme. Guyon, and others; while in its narrower, but now more common, sense, it simply denotes a belief in a natural communication between this and the other world. A leading Spiritualist paper, Spiritual Magazine, established in London in 1860, defines Spiritualism as "based on the cardinal fact of spirit communion and influx;" as an "effort to discover all truth relating to man's spiritual nature, capacities, relations, duties, welfare, and destiny;" as aiming, "through a careful, reverent study of facts, at a knowledge of the laws and principles which govern the occult forces of the universe, of the relations of spirit to matter, and of man to God and the spiritual world." In this sense of the term the phenomenon has attracted more physiological than theological interest; though its devotees pronounce it an indispensable weapon in the contest with the religious indifference, materialism, and atheism of our age.

Spiritualism, or, as it is sometimes called, Spiritism, dates back only to 1848. In that year it was discovered that certain rappings which were heard in the house of John D. Fox in Hydeville, Wayne County, N.Y., and which could not be accounted for in any ordinary way, conveyed intelligent communications. In 1850 the two girls Margaret and Kate Fox came to New York; and soon "spirit-rapping," the moving of heavy bodies without any mechanical agency, involuntary writing, etc., were phenomena which everybody had witnessed, or heard discussed by witnesses. Still more powerful mediums — that is, persons of such sensitive organization that the spirits can act upon them or through them — appeared. One of the most remarkable of these was Daniel Douglas Home, a lad of seventeen years, who gave sittings before Napoleon III. in Paris, and Alexander II. in St. Petersburg. Greater things were now accomplished, — speaking in foreign languages; lighting of a phosphorescent light in the dark; producing of drawings, pictures, and photographs; and, finally, the complete embodiment of a departed spirit, at least so far as to make him recognizable to friends and relatives. Numerous books were written for and against, and a multitude of proselytes were made; but a sect or party, properly so speaking, was not formed.

The Spiritualists generally reject the doctrine of the Trinity, considering Christ simply as one of the great teachers of mankind, not in any essential point different from the founders of the other great historical religions. They also generally reject the doctrine of a personal devil, though they believe in evil spirits, ascribing to them a power over man which may amount to possession. But they all believe in a future life, and in a natural, not miraculous, communication between that life and life on earth. The idea of miracles they have completely discarded, and the miracles of Scripture they accept as natural though unexplained facts. Life on earth they consider as a preparation for the life to come; but, when the transition from the one phase of life to the other takes place through death, no very great change occurs. The new life is only a supplement to the old, and in its initial state almost wholly determined by the character of that. Communications between these two spheres of life have always been possible, though under certain conditions of which we as yet have only very slight knowledge; but the motives which bring the spirits to reveal themselves to us are simply love and mercy, a desire to convince man of the existence of a future life.

SPITTA, Karl Johann Philipp, a distinguished German hymn-writer; was b. in Hanover, Aug. 1, 1801; d. in Burgdorf, Sept. 28, 1859. His mother, a converted Jewess, was left a widow in 1805. Sent to school, Spitta's studies were interrupted for four years by a dangerous sickness. At the close of this period he was apprenticed to a clock-maker. Continuing his study of Latin and Greek in private, he again entered school in 1818, and in 1821 passed to the university of Göttingen, where he studied theology. His faith wavered for a time, and he associated with the circle to which Heinrich Heine belonged. It was re-assured by the perusal of the works of Tholuck and De Wette. From 1824 to 1828 he acted as private tutor at Lüne, near Lüneburg, then became co-pastor at Sudwald; and after holding pastorates at Hameln (1830) and Wechholt (1837), he was made superintendent at Wittingen, Lüneburg (1853), and at Burgdorf (1859). His success as a pastor and preacher brought him calls in 1844 and 1846 to Bremen, Barmen, and Elberfeld. In 1855 he was made doctor of divinity by the university of Göttingen. Spitta was a man of deep piety, and earnestness of faith. He excelled as a pastor. His fame rests upon his hymns. In May, 1826, he wrote to a friend, "In the way that I used to sing, I now sing no more. I consecrate my life and my love, and also my song, to the Lord. His love is the one great theme of all my songs, and it is the longing of the Christian hymnist to praise and magnify him adequately." He stands alongside of Albert Knapp as the best and sweetest of the recent German hymn-writers. It was not till 1833 that he acceded to the repeated requests of friends, and published a collection of hymns in Psalter und Harfe (Psaltery and Harp), which has gone through many editions. A second collection appeared in 1843, and a third in 1861 (edited by Professor Adolf Peters. [Among Spitta's best hymns are Ein lieblich Loos ist uns gefallen ("Our lot is fallen in pleasant places"), O Jesu meine Sonne ("O blessed Son, whose splendor"), O selig Haus wo man dich aufgenommen ("O happy house! O home supremely blest"), all translated by MASSIE, 1860.] See Life of Spitta by MÜNKELE, Leipzig, 1861, and PETERS's edition of the Psalter und Harfe. G. H. KLITTEL.

SPONDANUS (Henri de Sponde), b. at Mauléon, Jan. 6, 1568; d. at Toulouse, May 18, 1643. He was educated in the Reformed faith at Orthez; studied law, and entered the service of Henry IV., but was, by the writings of Bellarmine and Du Perron, induced to embrace Romanism in 1595; went to Rome; was ordained a priest in 1606, and was in 1626 made bishop of Pamiers. He published an abbreviation of BARONIUS's Annales, Paris, 1612, which was often reprinted, and translated into other languages; also a continuation from 1127 to 1622. NEUDECKER.

SPORTS, Book of, a royal proclamation drawn up by Bishop Morton for James I., issued by that king in 1618; republished by Charles I., under the direction of Laud, in the ninth year of his reign. Its object was to encourage those people who had attended divine service to spend the remainder of Sunday after evening prayers in such "lawful recreation" as dancing, archery, leaping, vaulting, May games, Whitsun ales, Morris dances, setting of May-poles, etc. The proclamation was aimed at the Puritans, and Charles required it to be read in every parish church. The majority of the Puritan ministers refused to obey, and some were in consequence suspended. See EADIE: Eccles. Cyclop., s.v., where the full text is given.

SPOTSWOOD (SPOTISWOOD), John, Scotch prelate; b. at Mid-Calder, near Edinburgh, 1565; d. in London, Dec. 26, 1639. He was educated at Glasgow University, and succeeded his father as parson at Calder, in 1583, when only eighteen. In 1601 he accompanied the Duke of Lennox as chaplain in his embassy to France, and in 1603 James VI. to England. In 1603 he was made archbishop of Glasgow, and privy-councillor for Scotland. In 1615 he was transferred to St. Andrews, so that he became primate and metropolitan. On June 18, 1633, he crowned Charles I. at Holyrood. In 1635 he was made chancellor of Scotland. He was the leader in the movement to introduce the Liturgy into the Church of Scotland, which occasioned the rebellion (1637). When the Covenant was signed (1638), he retired in disappointment to London. He wrote The History of the Church and State of Scotland (203-1625), London, 1655; best ed., Edinburgh, 1847-51, 3 vols., with life of the author.

SPRAGUE, William Buell, D.D., LL.D., b. in Andover, Conn., Oct. 16, 1795; d. at Flushing, L.I., N.Y., May 7, 1876. He was graduated with honor from Yale College in 1815; was tutor for about a year in the family of Major Lewis (whose wife was the adopted daughter of Washington), at Woodlawn, near Mount Vernon; entered the Princeton Theological Seminary in the fall of 1816; was graduated in 1819, and immediately settled over the Congregational Church in West Springfield, Mass., as colleague with the Rev. Dr. Joseph Lathrop, who was then eighty-eight years of age, and had spent his whole professional life of sixty-three years in that parish. Dr. Lathrop died in the following year, and Mr. Sprague was left sole pastor. In 1829 he accepted the call of the Second Presbyterian Church of Albany to become its pastor; and here he passed the succeeding forty years of his life, and closed the period of active labor by resignation of his charge in 1869. He then removed his residence from Albany to Flushing, L.I., where he died in the eighty-first year of his age. In 1828 Columbia College conferred upon him the degree of D.D.; he received the same honor from Harvard in 1848, and the degree of LL.D. from Princeton in 1869.

Among the preachers and public speakers of this country, Dr. Sprague attained very high eminence. In 1848 he delivered the oration before the Phi Beta Kappa Society at Harvard, in 1860 the annual address to the Yale alumni, and in 1862 the discourse to the alumni of the Princeton Seminary upon the semi-centennial anniversary of that institution. More than one hundred and fifty of his sermons and occasional discourses were published by request. He was a voluminous author. He published more than a dozen separate works, among which may be mentioned Letters from Europe (1828), Lectures on Revivals (1832), Life of Rev. Dr. E. D. Griffin (1838), Aids to Early Religion (1847), Words to a Young Man's Conscience (1848), Visits to European Celebrities (1855), Memoirs of the Rev. Drs. John and William A. McDowell (1864), Life of Rev. Dr. Jedidiah Morse (1874).

The great literary work of his life, however, which earned for him the title of "biographer of the church," was the Annals of the American Pulpit, begun in 1852, when he was fifty-seven years of age, of which nine large octavo volumes were published, and the manuscript of the tenth and concluding volume completed for publication, before his death. Vols. i. and ii. are devoted to the Trinitarian Congregationalists; vols. iii. and iv., to the Presbyterians; vol. v., to the Episcopalians; vol. vi., to the Baptists; vol. vii., to the Methodists; vol. viii., to the Unitarians; vol. ix., to the Lutheran, Reformed, Associate, Associate Reformed, and Reformed Presbyterian; and the unpublished volume includes Quakers, German Reformed, Moravian, Cumberland Presbyterian, Freewill Baptist, Swedenborgian, and Universalist. The volumes are made up of biographical sketches of all the prominent clergymen of each denomination, from the earliest settlement of the country to the close of the year 1855. The work contains about fifteen hundred of these sketches; and to each sketch are appended, as far as practicable, letters of personal recollections contributed by writers who had intimately known the clergymen commemorated. In the preparation of this work, Dr. Sprague received cordial assistance from the eminent clergymen and laymen of each denomination, and probably had a more extended acquaintance throughout the churches of this country than any other man of his time. His successor at Albany, Rev. Dr. A. J. Upson, in his commemorative discourse, referred to the Annals as follows:—

"This book of our venerated friend is successful. It may have yielded no adequate pecuniary compensation; it may not be drawn from the circulating libraries, nor sold at the book-stalls; but it is so peculiar, it fills its own sphere so completely, it can never be supplanted. It is a treasury of Christian examples. It is the testimony of a cloud of witnesses. It is a chronicle of the everlasting church. Its author has identified himself with God as his agent in fulfilling his promise, that 'the righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance.'"

Dr. Sprague was thus described by an old and intimate friend, Rev. Dr. Ray Palmer, in the Congregationalist of May 24, 1876:—

"In his personal appearance Dr. Sprague was a very notable man. More than six feet in stature, erect, large-framed, and well-proportioned, with a grand head and dark-brown hair (which was unchanged to the day of his death, in his eighty-second year), he was sure to be observed in almost any assembly. His bearing was natural, as of one entirely self-possessed, and the expression of his countenance pleasing; so that, while he impressed by his dignity, he yet attracted by a certain kindness and simplicity of manner which at once set even a stranger entirely at ease with him. In conversation one was sure to find him animated, cheerful, rich in material derived from reading, travel, and intercourse with men, yet as ready to listen as to talk, and chiefly intent on imparting the utmost possible pleasure to his friend or visitor. He had come into personal contact with many distinguished men, both at home and abroad; and he liked to describe them, to relate anecdotes of their peculiarities, and to repeat what they had finely said, or eloquent passages from their writings. He did this with great felicity. No one could spend an hour with him, and not be conscious of having enjoyed a rare pleasure. Of all that makes a Christian gentleman he was certainly a rare example."

EDWARD E. SPRAGUE.

SPRENG, Jakob (generally called Probst, from his being prepositus in an Augustine convent in Antwerp), d. at Bremen, June 30, 1562. He was one of Luther's first adherents in the Netherlands; preached his views in Antwerp, and founded a Lutheran congregation there, but was arrested, and compelled to recant; went to Spem, his native city, and continued to preach the Reformation; was arrested a second time, but escaped to Wittenberg; and was in 1524 appointed preacher at Bremen, where the Reformation was established in 1525. He left some minor treatises. See J. G. Neumann's preface to Spreng's edition: M. Lutheri Commentarius in Joannis epistolam, etc., Leipzig, 1708; and especially the rare book of SELLEN: De vita J. Præpositi, Lübeck, 1747. KLOSE.

SPRING, Gardiner, D.D., LL.D., Presbyterian, b. at Newburyport, Mass., Feb. 24, 1785; d. in New-York City, Aug. 18, 1873. He was graduated from Yale College, 1805; taught in Bermuda until 1807; admitted to the bar, 1808; abandoned law for theology, and studied at Andover Theological Seminary, 1809-10; ordained pastor of the Brick (Presbyterian) Church, Aug. 8, 1810, and held the position till his death. The first four years of his ministry were years of steady, quiet growth; but from 1814 to 1834 there were frequent revivals, the result of God's blessing upon his faithful preaching, and utterly independent of machinery. During this period he took part in the formation of the American Bible Society (1816), American Tract Society (1825), and American Home Missionary Society (1826). From 1834 to the close of his ministry, there were no revivals; but there was steady growth, and in himself great increase in his power as a preacher. It was then that he used the press to extend his usefulness, and published a number of volumes of connected discourses. His congregation first met in Beekman Street, but in 1856 removed to their present church, Fifth Avenue and Thirty-sixth Street. After 1861 he had a colleague. His ministry, both for length and power, is remarkable. His principal publications are Essays on the Distinguishing Traits of Christian Character, New York, 1813; Fragments from the Study of a Pastor, 1838; Obligations of the World to the Bible, 1839; The Attraction of the Cross, 1846; The Bible not of Man, 1847; The Power of the Pulpit, 1848; The Mercy-Seat, 1850; First Things, 1851, 2 vols.; The Glory of Christ, 1852, 2 vols.; The Contrast between Good and Bad Men, 1853, 2 vols.; Pulpit Ministration, 1864, 2 vols.; and Personal Reminiscences of the Life and Times of Gardiner Spring, 1866, 2 vols. (his autobiography). See the Memorial Discourse by Rev. Dr. J. O. MURRAY, New York, [1873].

SPRING, Samuel, D.D., b. in Northbridge, Mass., Feb. 27, 1716; d. in Newburyport, Mass., March 4, 1819, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. A graduate of Princeton College in 1771; a classmate and room-mate there with President James Madison. The friendship between these two men remained uninterrupted through life; although Spring was an ardent Federalist, and a determined opposer of Madison's administration.

He began the study of theology with his particular friend, Dr. John Witherspoon, president of Nassau Hall. He continued the study with Dr. Joseph Bellamy, Dr. Samuel Hopkins, and Dr. Stephen West. With the three divines last named he became very intimate, as likewise with Dr. Jonathan Edwards, who had been Spring's tutor at Nassau Hall. He coincided, however, in his theological opinions, with his brother-in-law, Nathanael Emmons, more nearly than with any other man.

In 1775 he connected himself, as a chaplain of the Continental army, with a volunteer corps of eleven hundred men under the command of Benedict Arnold. With this corps he marched through the wilderness to Quebec. He stood with Col. Burr on the Plains of Abram when Gen. Montgomery fell. At Nassau Hall he had become interested in his college-mate, Aaron Burr. This interest was deepened as he became more intimate with Burr during the disastrous expedition to Canada. After the death of Hamilton, in 1804, Dr. Spring, although a distant relative of Burr, published a terrific sermon against duelling, and did not spare either the murderer or the murdered.

Dr. Spring was pastor of the Second Congregational Church in Newburyport, Mass., forty-one years and seven months. He was ordained Aug. 6, 1777; was a distinguished patriot during the war of the Revolution and that of 1812. He was eminently a doctrinal preacher, vigorous, dignified, commanding, subduing. He deserves the gratitude of the churches for the impulse which he gave to the cause of theological education between the years 1777 and 1819. To him, as much as to any one man, may be traced the origin of at least four important institutions of learning. To him and Eliphalet Pearson may be ascribed the founding of Andover Theological Seminary. To him, more than to any one man, is due the formation of the Massachusetts Missionary Society, — a society which trained the principal men by whom the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions was first conducted. To Dr. Spring or Dr. Worcester, or both united, is due the honor of having first suggested the idea of forming the American Board.

Twenty-six of Dr. Spring's published sermons are, some doctrinal, some political, some addressed to charitable societies, some to children. His most memorable theological treatises are his Dialogue on the Nature of Duty, 1784; his Moral Disquisitions and Strictures on the Rev. [Professor] David Tappan's Letters [in reply to the Dialogue], 2d ed., 1815. He also published The Youth's Assistant, or a Series of Theological Questions and Answers, 1818, and a large number of essays in The Massachusetts Missionary Magazine, of which he was an editor. EDWARDS A. PARK.

STABAT MATER are the first words of the famous hymn of Jacopone da Todi (d. 1306), and mean "The mother was standing." It is the most pathetic hymn of the middle ages, and, in spite of its adoration of the Virgin, is one of the softest, sweetest, and chastest lyrics in Christian literature. Suggested by the scene depicted in John xix. 25, it describes with tender feeling the piercing agony of Mary at the cross. It has furnished a theme for musical composition to Nanini (about 1620), Palestrina (whose music is the best, and is sung at Rome on Palm-Sunday), Astorga (about 1700), Pergolese (about 1736), Haydn, and Rossini (whose composition, according to Palmer, may be compared to a mater dolorosa painted standing under the cross, and clad in a Parisian court-dress). The original is in ten stanzas (WACKERNAGEL, i. 136, 162; MONE, ii. 147-154; DANIEL, ii. 133). Lisco (Stabat Mater, Berlin, 1843) gives fifty-three German and several Dutch translations. It has been translated into English by Lord Lindsay, Caswall, Mant, Coles, Benedict, etc. One of the best translations, "At the cross her station keeping," is found in SCHAFF's Christ in Song, p. 169. Dr. COLES's translation, beginning "Stood the afflicted mother weeping," is also very excellent. See JACOPONE DA TODI and the literature there given.

Another Stabat Mater celebrates the joy of the Virgin Mary at the birth of Christ, as the former celebrates her grief at the cross, and may be called the "Mater speciosa" as distinct from the "Mater dolorosa." It was published in the edition of the Italian poems of Jacopone at Brescia, 1495, but attracted no attention till Ozanam published a French translation in his work on the Franciscan poets (Paris, 1852), and John Mason Neale, an English translation shortly before his death (1866). It is not equal to the Mater dolorosa, and seems to be an imitation by another hand. It was discussed by P. Schaff in Hours at Home (a monthly magazine), New York, May, 1867, and translated again by Erastus C. Benedict, Hymn of Hildebert, etc., New York, 1869, p. 20.

STACKHOUSE, Thomas, (Church of England, b. 1680; became vicar of Beenhall, Berkshire, where he died, Oct. 11, 1752. He is remembered for his New History of the Holy Bible, from the beginning of the world to the establishment of Christianity (London, 1732, 2 vols. folio; frequently republished and reprinted; best ed. by G. Gleig and Dewar, 1836), and his Complete body of divinity (1729; 3d ed., 1755).

STAHL, Friedrich Julius, b. at Munich, Jan. 16, 1802; d. at Brückenau, Aug. 10, 1861. He was of Jewish parentage, but embraced Christianity in his seventeenth year; four years afterwards, his whole family followed his example. He studied jurisprudence at Würzburg, Heidelberg, and Erlangen; and was appointed professor at Erlangen in 1832, and in Berlin in 1840. In Berlin he gathered crowded audiences, not only of juridical students, but at times, also, of educated people in general: as, for instance, in 1850, when he lectured on The Present Party-Position in Church and State; which lectures were published after his death by W. Hertz, Berlin, 1863. He also held the highest positions in the state-government of the church, and took a very active part in Prussian politics. His brilliant parliamentary talent soon made him one of the most prominent leaders of the conservative party, both in political and ecclesiastical affairs. Democracy and free-thinking he understood, and was not afraid of; but he hated liberalism and rationalism. The former is revolution, he said; but the latter is dissolution. His ideas are clearly defined in his Die Philosophie des Rechts, 1830, thoroughly revised in 1847, vol. i., under the title, Geschichte der Rechtsphilosophie, vol. ii., Rechts- und Staatslehre. Of the fundamental problems of human life, he considered two solutions as possible, both philosophically and juridically,—one on the basis of pantheism, and one on the basis of faith in a personal God who has revealed himself to man; one giving the absolute power to the mass of the people, the majority, and one organizing the State after the idea of the highest personality, as a sphere of ethical action. What lay between those two extremes he despised as destitute of character. But he did not consider the two possible solutions as equally good: on the contrary, from the depths of his conviction he cried out, "No majority, but authority!" Nowhere, perhaps, has he set forth his ideas more forcibly and more pointedly than in the two Sendschriften he published in the Hengstenberg controversy in 1845. In 1840 appeared his Die Kirchenverfassung nach Lehre und Recht der Protestanten, in which he subjects the three systems prevailing in the Lutheran Church—the episcopal, the territorial, and the collegial system—to a searching examination, recommending the first. The constitution of the Reformed Church has not found an equal treatment. He was an able advocate of high Lutheran orthodoxy, and an intimate friend of Hengstenberg. In his Die lutherische Kirche und die Union (1860) he went so far in his opposition to the union of the two Protestant churches as to declare that Luther at Marburg, refusing to join hands with Zwingli, was as great as Luther at Worms. Among his other works are Der christliche Staat und sein Verhältniss zu Deismus und Judenthum, 1847; Der Protestantismus als politisches Princip, 1856, etc.

RUDOLPH KÖGEL.

STANCARO, Francesco, b. at Mantua, 1501; d. at Stobnitz, Poland, Nov. 12, 1574. As a friend of the Reformation, he was in 1543 compelled to leave Italy. In 1546 he published a Hebrew grammar at Basel, and in 1550 he was appointed professor of Hebrew at Cracow. His relation, however, to the Reformation, was soon discovered, and he was arrested; but he escaped, and was in 1551 appointed professor of Hebrew at Königsberg, and the next year at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder. There he immediately entered into the Osiandrian controversy, and published his Apologia contra Osiandrum, in which he set forth his peculiar ideas of Christ as being the mediator between God and man, only on account of his human nature. The ideas caused great scandal; and Stancaro went first to Poland, then to Hungary, where he took active part in the controversy between the Lutherans and the Reformed. Having returned to Poland in 1558, he settled at Pinczow, and came naturally in contact with the Italian Antitrinitarians active in Poland,—Blandrata, Lismanini, and others. In the correspondence between the Polish Protestant and the German and Swiss Reformers concerning the Italian Unitarianism, which was spreading in the country, some regard was also paid to Stancaro and his anti-Osiandrian ideas; and he published in 1561 De Trinitate. But though he gathered some pupils, called "Stancarists," he soon fell into oblivion.

STANHOPE, Lady Hester Lucy, daughter of Earl Stanhope, and niece of William Pitt, the great Earl of Chatham; b. in London, March 12, 1776; d. at Jun in the Lebanon, June 23, 1839. She was the private secretary and confidante of her distinguished uncle, and a member of his family from her twentieth year until his death, 1806, when, unable to live in her accustomed style upon the twelve hundred pounds yearly stipend granted her as the ward of the nation, she retired to a solitude in Wales, and in 1810 to Syria; and in 1813 she established herself at the deserted convent of Mar Elias, near Jun, and eight miles from Sidon, where she lived until her death, exerting a remarkable influence upon the Arabs around. Her servants were Albanians; her house, a fortress which afforded shelter to the persecuted. She dressed like an emir, ruled despotically, practised astrology, and preached a creed compounded of Bible and Koran. She was eccentric to the verge of insanity. See her Memoirs, London, 1845, 3 vols., 2d ed., 1846; The Seven Years' Travels of Lady Hester Stanhope, 1816, 3 vols.

STANISLAUS, Bishop of Cracow, the patron-saint of Poland; was b. near Cracow, July 26, 1030, and, after studying canonical law at Gnesen and Paris, entered the clerical profession. He was a stern ascetic, distributed his patrimony amongst the poor, and boldly denounced the cruelty and licentiousness of Boleslas II., king of Poland, whom he finally excommunicated. In revenge, the king had Stanislaus murdered while he was celebrating mass near Cracow, May 8, 1079. Miracles are ascribed to the bishop, both alive and dead. In 1251 Innocent IV. placed him among the saints. Many altars and churches were built to his memory in Poland. His day is May 7. See

STANISLAUS, St., was b. Oct. 20, 1550, at Kosteou, Poland; d. in Rome, Aug. 15, 1568. In his fourteenth year he went to Vienna; had a vision of two angels and the Virgin Mary, who urged him to become a Jesuit; sought admission to the order at Vienna, which was refused on account of his father's aversion to the step; and finally went to Rome, where he was admitted Oct. 28, 1567. He predicted the day of his death, and on account of his severe ascetic practices was beatified by Clement VIII. in 1604. NEUDECKER.

STANLEY, Arthur Penrhyn, b. Dec. 13, 1815, was son of Edward Stanley, at that time rector of Alderley, in Cheshire; d. in London, July 18, 1881. In the village made memorable from being his birthplace, he spent his childhood under the fostering care of his father and mother, whose admirable characters he has embalmed in a volume of family memoirs. Their influence on him for good was very great, and to this is to be added the effect of intercourse with the Lecesters, amiable and interesting relatives on the mother's side. The scenery of Alderley Edge, its pine-trees and beacon-tower, also the rectory-garden, with bird-cages hung among the roses, no doubt served to stimulate the child's active imagination. When eight years old he was remarkable for retentiveness of memory, — a faculty which was singularly powerful in after-life. But this was associated with an incapacity for mathematical studies, and even a sum in arithmetic puzzled him to the end of his days. In January, 1829, he was entered as a schoolboy at Rugby; and there he exhibited the amiableness and decision so well described in "Tom Brown," and came under the formative power of Dr. Thomas Arnold, prince of schoolmasters, to whom he owed much of the mental and moral strength which distinguished him in the whole of his subsequent career. He early showed a fondness for history, and, as he records, "got through all Mitford and all Gibbon, and several smaller" authors. Rugby became to Stanley a second home; and, when he had received the last of five prizes, his master said to him, "Thank you, Stanley: we have nothing more to give."

He was elected a scholar of Balliol at Oxford in 1833, and signalized his undergraduateship by a prize-poem entitled The Gipsies. His father was made Bishop of Norwich in 1837; and there, of course, he was wont to spend his vacations: in no other way did he become connected with the old East-Anglian city. He undertook a tour in Greece in 1840-41, and there, as was his wont, studied nature on its poetical side and in its historical relations, and returned to the university full of knowledge and inspiration derived from the acquaintance he formed with the classic scenery amidst which he wandered. He soon commenced as college-tutor, and the attachment he inspired in the hearts of his pupils foretold what was to be the result of his social intercourse in after-years. His lectures on history and divinity awakened much attention, and gave promise of what he subsequently accomplished as a popular lecturer and author. Sermons and Essays on the Apostolic Age, in which he broke up new ground by dwelling on the individual peculiarities of the apostles, were published in 1846; but before that, in 1844, he made a mark on biographical literature by his Life of Arnold, a book said at the time to set everybody talking about the hero, rather than the author, — a sign of the wonderful success he had achieved. He was appointed secretary to the first Oxford Commission, which resulted in considerable improvements of university education; and, watching the progress of theological controversy, he wrote in 1850 an article on the Gorham Judgment, the harbinger of several successive criticisms on ecclesiastical questions, which he afterwards published.

In 1851 he became a canon of Canterbury, and then entered on the second stage of his public life. There he wrote his Commentary on the Epistles to the Corinthians and his Memorials of Canterbury; and, having already travelled in the East, he added to these his Sinai and Palestine. A tour in Russia was taken by him whilst he was a Canterbury canon, and this awakened in him a deep interest respecting the Eastern Church. Of this he availed himself in lectures on its history, after he entered upon the Regius professorship of ecclesiastical history at Oxford, in 1858. These lectures were published in 1861. It should further be recorded of his work at Canterbury, that there his influence was deeply felt by both clergy and laity; for he succeeded in breaking down walls of partition surrounding the intercourse of cathedral dignitaries, and brought together persons who had before stood aloof from each other.

In 1862 he accompanied the Prince of Wales during his tour in the East, and, after his return to England, published a volume of sermons preached to the royal party, from time to time, as they travelled over never-to-be-forgotten Bible lands. The death of Stanley's mother, to whom he was tenderly attached, occurred while he was absent from England. In 1863, soon after his return, he was appointed Dean of Westminster. That appointment was speedily followed by his marriage with Lady Augusta Bruce, who was "the light of his dwelling" to the day of her death. The fascination of her society, and the perfect sympathy she manifested in all his literary, religious, and social enterprises, contributed to the popularity of those gatherings in the deanery which will ever live in the recollection of those who were privileged to enjoy them; and she also strengthened her husband to perform those illustrious labors which rendered him most distinguished among all the Westminster deans of ancient or modern times. This brings us to the third and last stage of Stanley's public life.

His residence in Westminster, which opened up to him a new and wide sphere of exertion, he employed for the purpose of improving and popularizing the abbey, of promoting objects connected with the welfare of the neighborhood, and of advancing the interests of literature, charity, and religion in general. He really loved that ancient edifice, so grand and picturesque in itself, and so rich in its historical associations; and, when he had familiarized himself with its details, it was no common treat to wander through its aisles and chapels with him for a cicerone. This office he condescended to fill for the gratification of the poor as well as the rich. The hospital at Westminster and other local institutions found in him a warm supporter; whilst his garden-parties, in connection with the encouragement of floral cultivation amongst the humbler classes, were attractive, not only to the gentry and nobility around, but to many living at a distance. As a lecturer, an advocate at public meetings, and especially as an abbey-preacher, he commanded large audiences, and delighted those who listened to his original remarks. A Broad-Churchman, and too often throwing into the background truths which evangelical Christians love to hear, he interested all classes by his earnest devoutness, his catholic spirit, and his abstinence from all factious combinations. He was a zealous son of the Church of England; and, making no secret of his strong attachment to the principle of an Establishment, he nevertheless conciliated Nonconformists, and delighted to cultivate among them some intimate friendships. He was busy with his pen throughout the whole period of his residence in the deanery. His Lectures on the Jewish Church appeared in three successive volumes under the dates of 1863, 1865, and 1879. Historical Memorials of Westminster Abbey was published in 1868; Essays on Church and State followed in 1870. The History of the Church of Scotland, delivered as lectures in Edinburgh, issued from the press in 1872. A number of minor works, including controversial letters, sermons, and lectures, were the product of his pen in this last and most important period of his life; and the publication of his final volume, a rather large one, on Christian Institutes, occurred in 1881. The death of his beloved wife in 1875 was a bereavement from the effect of which he never fully recovered. For a short time he could accomplish but little; but, gradually recovering his energy, he devoted himself anew to works of faith, and labors of love, and in 1880 found some relief by preparing for the press Memoirs of Edward and Catherine Stanley, his father and mother. It was a solace to go back to early days; and he also contemplated writing memorials of Lady Augusta, a work he did not accomplish.

He visited the United States in 1878, and returned home greatly refreshed, when his friends in England were gladdened by accounts he gave of his cordial reception by friends in America. His addresses and sermons delivered there were published in New York in 1879, and have since been republished in England. Always rather delicate, the state of his health in latter years often awakened anxiety; but, as he rallied from attacks, hopes were entertained of his life being prolonged for some years to come. However, in the summer of 1881, he felt ill after delivering a short lecture on one of the beatitudes, and then, after being confined to his bed a few days, died on Monday, the 18th of July. As in the case of his wife, so at his own funeral, all ranks of society, from the royal family down to the inmates of almshouses, and all denominations, Established and Nonconforming, united in paying honors to the deceased, not only as a public man, but as a lamented personal friend.

STAPFER, the name of a gifted and erudite family of Bernese theologians. — I. Johann Friedrich was b. at Brugg in 1708; d. in 1775 at Diessbach, near Thun, where he settled in 1750. He studied at Bern and Marburg, and became a devoted Wolfian. He was a zealous and successful pastor. He wrote, amongst other works, Institutiones theologicae, polemicae, universae, Zürich, 1743, 5 vols. (4th ed. of vol. i., 1757); Grundlegung zur wahren Religion, 1746-53, 12 vols.; Sittenlehre, 1757-66, 6 vols. The first-named work is widely known as a most reliable compend. It is characterized by learning, insight, and a kindly spirit. Stapfer is careful always to state the opponent's views correctly. — II. Johannes, brother of the preceding, was b. 1719; d. 1801: is more especially remembered by his version of the Psalms. Of the seventy-one psalms introduced into the Bern Hymn-Book of 1853, forty-one are his. He published Theolog. Analytica (Bern, 1763), seven volumes of sermons, etc. — Philipp Albert, one of the most distinguished ornaments of French Protestantism, was b. at Bern, Sept. 23, 1766; d. in Paris, March 27, 1840. In 1792 he was appointed professor of the fine arts, and subsequently professor of philosophy and theology. In 1798 he was appointed minister of education of Switzerland. His generosity enabled Pestalozzi to give his method a fair trial in the castle at Burgdorf. After conspicuous services for his country, he retired to private life in 1804, and soon after went to Paris to reside. In a time of religious indifference he retained his evangelical fervor, and occupied a conspicuous position in religious circles in France. His salon was the meeting-place of great men, as Guizot, Cousin, and others. He also endeavored to introduce Kant to the knowledge of the French. He was president of a number of religious societies. Among his works, most of which were written in French, are De vite immortalis spe, etc., Bern, 1787; La mission divine et la nature sublime de Jésus Christ, déductes de son caractère, Lausanne, 1799. A volume containing some of his writings, and introduced by a biography from the pen of Vinet, appeared in 1841 under the title Mélanges philosophiques, littéraires, historiques et religieux.

STAPHYLUS, Friedrich, b. at Osnabrück, Aug. 17, 1512; d. at Ingolstadt, March 5, 1564. He studied theology at Wittenberg; became an intimate friend of Melancthon, and was, on his recommendation, appointed professor at Königsberg, in 1546. As he felt unable to carry through the controversy which he had begun with Osiannder, he resigned his position, went to Breslau, embraced Romanism, and entered the service of the Duke of Bavaria. The duke gave him a fief; the emperor, the title of nobility; the pope, a purse with one hundred gold crowns; and he was very active for the restoration of Romanism in Bavaria and Austria. Among his many polemical writings, the most noticeable are Epitome Martini Lutheri theologiae trimembris: Defensio pro trimembris M. L. theologia, etc. He also wrote a life of Charles V., and published a Latin translation of Diodorus Siculus. G. H. KLIPPEL.

STARK, Johann August, a well known Crypto-Catholic; was b. at Schwerin in 1741; studied at Göttingen; became an enthusiastic Freemason; was made professor of Oriental languages (1769) and theology (1776) at Königsberg; and died as court-preacher and councillor, in Darmstadt, in 1816. Among his works are Hephastion (1775) and Gesch. d. Arianismus (1783-81). Accused of being a Crypto-Catholic, he defended himself in a work, Ueber Kryptokatholicismus, etc. (Frankfort and Leipzig, 1787), and was protected and honored by the court. His anonymous book, Theoduls Gastmahl, 1809 (7th ed., 1828), was the occasion for renewed attacks, which the discovery, after his death, of a room in his house arranged for the celebration of the mass, and his order to be buried in cowl and in the Catholic churchyard, proved to be justified.

STAUDENMAIER, Franz Anton, a distinguished Roman-Catholic theologian: was b. at Donzdorf, Württemberg, Sept. 11, 1800; d. in Freiburg, Breisgau, Jan. 19, 1856. He studied at the Wilhelmsstift, Tübingen, under Möhler; in 1827 was ordained priest; and in 1830 published, at Möhler's suggestion, a History of Episcopal Elections (Gesch. d. Bischofs-wahlen, Tübingen), and accepted a call to Giessen, as professor of theology in the Roman-Catholic faculty. In 1837 he exchanged this position for a similar one at the university of Freiburg-im-Breisgau, where he had Hug for a colleague. Staudenmaier was not the equal of his teacher, Möhler, in originality and profundity, but not behind him in the extent of his learning. Among his works, several of which remained unfinished, are Johannes Scotus Eriugena u. d. Wissenschaft seiner Zeit, Frankfurt, 1831 (2d part never written); Die christl. Dogmatik, Freiburg-im-Br., 1841-52, 4 vols. (not complete); D. Geist d. Christenthums, dargestellt in d. heil. Zeiten, etc., Mainz, 1831, 2 vols. [7th ed., 1866]; D. Wesen d. kath. Kirche, Freiburg, 1845. [He was a frequent contributor to the Kirchenlexikon of Wetzer and Welte. See MICHELIS: Staudenmaier's wissenschaftl. Leistungen, Freiburg-im-Br., 1877.]

HAMBERGER.

STÄUDLIN, Karl Friedrich, a fertile German theological author; was b. July 25, 1764, at Stuttgart; was educated at Tübingen; called to Göttingen University, 1790; d. at Göttingen, July 5, 1826. He was a believing theologian. Among his many works are Grundriss d. Tugend- und Religions-lehre, Götting., 1798-1800, 2 vols.; Grundsätze d. Moral, 1800; Philos. u. biblische Moral, 1805; Lehrbuch d. Moral für Theologen, 1815, 3d ed., 1825; Gesch. d. Sittenlehre Jesu, 1799-1822, 4 vols.; Kirchengesch. von Grossbritannien, Göttingen, 1819, 2 vols.; Theolog. Encyclopädie u. Methodologie, Hanover, 1821; Geschichte und Lit. der Kirchengeschichte, Hanover, 1827. His autobiography was edited by HEMSEN, Göttingen, 1826.

STAUPITZ, Johann von, the noble friend of Luther; d. at Salzburg, Dec. 28, 1524. The time and place of his birth are unknown. Entering the Augustinian order, he studied at several universities, at last in Tübingen, where in 1500, as prior of the Augustinian convent, he was made doctor of theology. Rejecting the scholastic theology, he had recourse to the Scriptures and the mystics, and was indeed a theologian not only of the school, but of the heart. His culture, practical ability, and courteous and manly bearing, won for him the favor of the Elector of Saxony, by whom he was invited to take part in the foundation of the new university at Wittenberg. In its interests he went to Rome to secure the Papal permission, and in 1502 was settled in Wittenberg as professor and dean of the theological faculty. In 1503 he was chosen vicar-general of the Augustinians in Germany. In 1512 he substituted in the convents under his supervision the Scriptures for Augustine's writings, to be read during meals. The same year he acted as the substitute of the Archbishop of Salzburg at the Lateran Council. That which gives Staupitz a place in history is his relation to Luther. He became acquainted with the young monk at Erfurt in 1505, secured a higher position for him in the convent, and sought to turn his attention from ascetic thoughts and metaphysical speculations to the cross and the atoning love of God. "Your thoughts are not Christ," said he to Luther on one occasion, as the latter looked with a shudder at the elements which Staupitz was carrying in a funeral-procession; "for Christ does not terrify, but console." In 1508, at his recommendation, Luther was called to Wittenberg, and at his advice Luther entered the pulpit. In 1516, while absent on a mission in the Netherlands, Staupitz showed his confidence in Luther by making him temporary inspector of forty convents in Saxony and Thuringia. As late as October, 1518, he sympathized with his young friend, and was at his side in the discussion with Cajetan in Augsburg. On that occasion he said, "Remember, my brother, that thou hast begun this work in the name of Christ." He soon afterwards drew back from the Reformation; but he did not oppose it, like Erasmus. He was "a pious Christian mystic," who deplored the abuses of the church, but had not the heroism to be a Reformer. In 1519 he went to Salzburg (not because he had fallen into disfavor with the Elector of Saxony, as D'Aubigné supposes), became court-preacher in 1522, abbot of the Benedictine convent of St. Peter at Salzburg, having changed his order previously, and, later, vicar of the archbishop. In 1519 he wrote to Luther, offering him a refuge at Salzburg. But Luther was displeased with the course of his old friend, and wrote, Feb. 9, 1521 (De Wette, i. 556), "Your submission has saddened me very much, and shown me another Staupitz than the preacher of grace and the cross." In another letter, of Sept. 17, 1523 (De Wette, ii. 407), he writes to him as the one "through whom the light of the gospel was first made to shine from the darkness in our hearts" (per quem primum coepit Evangelii lux de tenebris splendescere in cordibus nostris). Some of Luther's writings which he took with him to Salzburg, and gave to the monks to read, were burned by one of his successors. Staupitz exercised a deep influence upon Luther; so that the latter, in his dedication of the first collection of his writings to Staupitz, in 1518, could call himself his disciple. In his letter of May 30, 1518, to accompany his Theses to Leo X., he says he heard from Staupitz, as "a voice from heaven," an explanation that true penance starts from love, and ends in righteousness. This truth, he said, acted like a sharp arrow in his heart until the word "repentance" became to him the sweetest word in the Bible.

Besides ten letters which Grimm edited, only one of which is to Luther, he left behind him some tracts, Von d. Nachfolge d. willigen Sterbens Christi (1516), Von der holdseligen Liebe Gottes (1518), etc. See ULLMANN: Reformers before the Reformation, [a new edition of his works by KNAAKE, Gotha, 1807; KOLBE: D. deutsche Augustinerorden und Johann von Staupitz, Gotha, 1879].

H. MALLET.

STEDINGERS, The, a heroic German family living on the banks of the Weser, near its mouth, which offered a bold resistance to the presumption of the clergy in the latter part of the twelfth, and the beginning of the thirteenth, century. The conflict originated with the indignity of a priest to the wife of a nobleman, who, at the communion, instead of the host, put into her mouth the groschen which she had given him at the confessional. Her husband, taking up the case, and only receiving denunciation from the priest, murdered him. The deed stirred up the priesthood; and Hartwig II., archbishop of Bremen, demanded not only the delivery of the murderer, but a large indemnity. Being refused both, he put the district under the ban, and in 1207 led an army against the refractory Stedingers, who were supported by the powerful Duke Otto of Lüneburg, the bitter enemy of Bremen. The war lasted for a number of years, until, the Stedingers being victorious, the case was brought before Pope Gregory IX. The Stedingers were accused of being not only heretics, but in league with Satan, whom they worshipped under the image of an idol of Ammon, to whom they offered their children. When a candidate for admission to their mysteries appeared before them, a large frog entered the room, which the members kissed, a shudder passing through their system with the kiss; and with the shudder the memory of the Christian faith completely disappeared. These and other calumnies were taken up by the Papal inquisitor-general, Konrad of Marburg, who persuaded the Pope in 1233 to issue the ban against the Stedingers as cursed heretics. A crusade was preached against them. They raised an army of eleven thousand, and successfully resisted the Archbishop of Bremen and his allies till May 27, 1234, when the battle of Altenesch completely broke their resistance. Half the army was destroyed, and many of the survivors fled to Friesland. The territory of the Stedingers was divided between the Archbishop of Bremen and the Counts of Oldenburg. The defeat was celebrated in the archiepiscopal church of Bremen by a yearly festival on the fifth Sunday after Easter. All the writers of the middle ages speak disparagingly of the Stedingers as heretics. It remained for the impartial historian since the Reformation to honor their resistance as a just opposition to the oppression of a presumptuous priesthood. See SCHMICK: De expeditione cruciata in Stedingos, Marburg, 1722; RITTER: De pago Steding et Stedingis sac. XIII. hereticis, Viteb., 1751; LAPENBERG: Vom Kreuzzuge gegen d. Stedinger, Stadt, 1755, etc.

G. H. KLIPPEL.

STEELE, Anne, author of many popular and useful hymns; was the daughter of a Baptist minister at Broughton in Hampshire, where she was b. 1716, and d. November, 1778. She was always an invalid; and her fiancé was drowned on or just before the wedding-day. Her Poems on Subjects chiefly Devotional, by Theodosia, appeared in two volumes in 1760, and were reprinted, 1780, with a third volume of Miscellaneous Pieces in Verse and Prose; the profits in each case being devoted to benevolent uses. The whole were re-issued at Boston in two volumes, 1808, and most of them in one volume by D. Sedgwick, 1863. Her hymns, to the number of sixty-five, were included in Ash and Evans's Collection, 1769, and were found to be accordant with the best taste of that period, and remarkably adapted to public worship. Dr. Rippon (1787) used fifty-six of them, and Dobell (1806), forty-five. To probably a majority of the hymn-books published in England and America she is the largest contributor after Watts, Doddridge, and C. Wesley, often preceding the latter, and sometimes standing next to Watts, though occasionally outnumbered by Newton. This implies an amount of influence in leading devotion, in moulding thought and character, and in assuaging sorrow, which any one might be proud to gain, and which can be attained by very few. On the other hand, James Montgomery, a discerning critic, relegated her to the tenth rank in his Christian Psalmist (1825), and said nothing about her in the Introductory Essay. She certainly had more elegance than force, and was less adapted to stand the test of time than her masculine rivals. Her hymns are a transcript of a deeply sensitive, humane, and pious mind, with little intellectual variety or strength; but they have a free and graceful lyrical flow, and no positive faults beyond a tendency to repetition and too many endearing epithets. A fragment of one of them, "Father, whatever of earthly bliss," may last as long as any thing of Watts or Doddridge.

STEINHOFER, Maximilian Friedrich Christoph, b. at Owen in Wurtemberg, Jan. 16, 1706; d. at Weinsberg, Feb. 11, 1761. He studied theology at Tübingen; entered into connection with the congregation of Herrnhut; became court-preacher at Ebersdorf early in 1731; joined the Moravian Brethren in 1746, but returned in 1749 to Wurtemberg, and held various minor pastoral charges, finally that of Weinsberg. He wrote a number of sermons and devotional books,—Tägliche Nahrung des Glaubens, 1743 (last edition, Ludwigsburg, 1859, with his autobiography); a commentary on 1 John; a collection of sermons on the life of Jesus, Frankfurt, 1764.

STEITZ, Georg Eduard, D.D., b. at Frankfort-on-the-Main, July 25, 1810; was pastor and d. there Jan. 1, 1879. He wrote Die Privatbichte u. Privatabsolution d. luther. Kirche aus den Quellen des 16ten Jahrhunderts, Frankfurt, 1854; Das römische Bußsacrament, 1851; and forty-one articles for the first edition of Herzog, most of which have been re-issued in the second edition, besides numerous contributions to the Studien u. Kritiken and elsewhere. He was a man of rare and accurate learning, and sound judgment. His articles in Herzog are very elaborate and valuable. See JUNG u. DECHENT: Zur Erinnerung an Herrn Senior Dr. theol. G. E. Steitz, Frankfort-on-the-Main, 1879.

STENNETT, Joseph, an English hymn-writer; was b. at Abingdon, Berks, 1663; d. at Knaphill, Bucks, July 11, 1713. In 1690 he was ordained pastor of a Baptist congregation in Devonshire Square, London, which he served till his death. He was the author of a reply to Russen's Fundamentals without a Foundation, or a True Picture of the Anabaptists. His Hymns for the Lord's Supper appeared in 1697, and were increased from thirty-seven to fifty in the third edition, 1709. He also published a Version of Solomon's Song with the Forty-Seventh Psalm, 1700 (2d ed., 1709), and twelve hymns on the Believers' Baptism, 1712. A complete edition of his hymns, poems, sermons, and letters, was published, with a memoir, in 4 vols., 1732. Stennett is the author of the familiar hymn, "Another six days' work is done," which in the original had fourteen stanzas.

STENNETT, Samuel, an English hymnist, and grandson of the preceding; was b. 1727, in Exeter, where his father was pastor of the Baptist Church; d. in London, Aug. 24, 1795. He assisted his father as pastor of the Baptist Church in Little Wild Street, London, and in 1758 became his successor, remaining with the church till his death. He was a fine scholar, and was made D.D. by Aberdeen University, 1763. He was a man of influence among the dissenters, enjoyed the confidence of George III., and had John Howard for a frequent hearer. Writing from Smyrna under date of Aug. 11, 1786, the great prison-reformer speaks of the pleasure he experienced in reviewing his notes of Stennett's sermons. Stennett's works (On Personal Religion, 1769, 2 vols., 4th ed., 1801, being the most extensive) were published with a memoir in 1824, 3 vols. Thirty-four of his hymns are given at the end. Five others have been found in Rippon's Selection. His best hymns are "On Jordan's stormy banks I stand," "Majestic sweetness sits enthroned," "'Tis finished! so the Saviour cried."

STEPHAN, Martin, and the Stephanists. Martin Stephan (b. at Stranberg, Moravia, Aug. 13, 1777; d. in Randolph County in the State of Illinois, Feb. 21, 1816) was of humble parentage, and early apprenticed to a weaver. In 1798 he went to Breslau, where he soon became intimate with the pietist circles, and finally contrived to enter the gymnasium. From 1804 to 1809 he studied theology at Halle and Leipzig in a peculiarly narrow way, but not without energy; and in 1810 he was appointed pastor of the congregation of Bohemian exiles in Dresden. He was a Lutheran of the strictest type of orthodoxy. His success as a preacher and an organizer was very extraordinary. Though he severed his connection with the Moravian Brethren, and though the revival movement he started bore a decidedly separatistic character, his congregation grew rapidly, and gifted and serious men became exceedingly devoted to him. He maintained stations all through the valley of the Mulde; he sent out young missionaries whom he had educated; and he found followers, even in Wurtemberg and Baden. The separatistic tendency, however, of his work, and perhaps, also, the very success of his labor, brought him in manifold conflicts with the regular clergy of Dresden; and certain peculiarities in his personal habits and in his arrangements finally brought him into collision with the police. In the spring of 1838 the congregation for which he originally had been appointed pastor formally accused him of unchastity and fraud, and in the fall he secretly left the city for Bremen. In Bremen he was joined by no less than seven hundred followers; and at the head of this congregation, "the Stephanists," he sailed for America on Nov. 18. But, if there previously had been something wrong in his conduct, it now became apparent that the root of the evil lay deep in his character. Before the vessel arrived at New Orleans, he had himself elected bishop, and made master of the emigration-fund; and at St. Louis, where the colony stopped for two months, he gave himself up entirely to a life of pleasure. A tract of land was finally bought at Wittenberg, Perry County, Mo.; and in April, 1839, the larger portion of the congregation, and the bishop, removed thither. Hardly one month elapsed, however, before the accusations from Dresden were renewed, but by other members of his congregation, and referring to later times; and, as the statements made were found to be correct, he was deprived of his dignity, and excommunicated. But the congregation, after passing through various vicissitudes and troubles, prospered, and became the nucleus of the "Missouri" type of High-Church Lutheranism, which adheres most closely to the symbolical books, and has its headquarters in the Concordia College at St. Louis. Among the writings of Martin Stephan the most important are Der christliche Glaube (a collection of sermons, Dresden, 1825) and Gaben für unsere Zeit (Nuremberg, 1834). See VON POLENZ: Die öffentliche Meinung und der Pastor Stephan, Dresden, 1840; VEHSE: Die Stephan'sche Auswanderung nach America, Dresden, 1840; and the elaborate art. by KUMMER, in HERZOG: Real-Encyclopädie, 1st ed. vol. xv. pp. 41-61.

STEPHEN, deacon of the congregation at Jerusalem, and first martyr of the Christian Church. It is only in our day that his influence upon the development of Christianity has been adequately brought out. All that we know of him is found in Acts vi., vii. He was chosen in an emergency deacon of the church; and no one doubts any more that he was a Hellenist, although this is not definitely stated. He did not confine himself to the duties of the diaconate, but devoted himself to preaching, and was especially successful in those synagogues of Jerusalem where the Greek language was used. In connection with him, we for the first time hear of discussions in the synagogues (Acts vi. 10). He was accused of blaspheming Moses and God, and was brought up for trial, false witnesses being suborned to testify against him. The people finally exercised lynch-law upon the accused. Stephen preached, as the apostles up to that time had not preached. He was accused of speaking against the Jewish religion, fathers, and temple. He had entered most deeply into the meaning of many of Christ's sayings about the difference between the law and the gospel, and especially the saying recorded in John ii. 19. Can there be any doubt that he had become convinced that the Mosaic institutions could not be combined with the spiritual contents of the gospel as a basis for the church and the kingdom of God? This is made certain, not only by the form of the accusation, but by the address of Stephen. At first sight the latter seems to be disconnected and irrelevant. Closer inspection, however, reveals that this is not the case. The speaker proves that God had revealed himself independently of the forms of the law, and that the history of revelation was progressive, and closes by showing the temporary nature of the temple, and the other forms of the law. Nothing of the kind had ever been brought out by the apostles before. Stephen was not merely the protomartyr of the church. He was the first Christian preacher who fully understood the distinction which Christ taught between Judaism and Christianity, a forerunner of Paul; yea, perhaps, in the deepest sense the one who prepared the way for Paul's conversion. At any rate the extension of the gospel beyond the limits of the synagogue was, according to the statement of the Acts, the immediate consequence of his death, and not the planned work of the elder apostles. [Augustine said, "If Stephen had not prayed, the church would not have had Paul" (Si Steph. non orasset, ecclesia Paulum non haberet). Archdeacon Farrar calls him the "undeveloped St. Paul."] Tradition did not forget Stephen. The Fathers put him among the seventy disciples. The Apocalypse of Stephen will be found in FABRICIUS: Cod. Apoc.

STEPHEN, the name of ten popes. — Stephen I. (253-257), a Roman by birth, is of importance on account of his relation to the controversy concerning heretical baptism. The majority of the churches in Asia Minor and Africa had declared in favor of the view that heretics baptized by heretics should be rebaptized on their entrance into the orthodox church. The Roman practice, however, had been to admit them without the repetition of the rite, and with a simple exhortation to repentance. The Eastern Church, and especially Cyprian, strongly opposed this practice; and the councils of Carthage (255, 256) again sanctioned the opposite view. A synodal letter informed Stephen of this action, and a heated epistolary controversy was opened between him and Cyprian. He finally broke off communion with the African Church. Tradition relates that Stephen suffered a martyr's death for refusing to sacrifice to the heathen gods. His day is Aug. 2. — Stephen II. ascended the Papal chair March 27, 752, but died a few days later; for which reason he is usually omitted from the list of popes. — Stephen III. (II.) was Pope from 752 to 757. Pushed by Astolph, king of the Longobards, he called in the aid of Pepin the Little, who defeated the enemy in two campaigns (754, 755), and raised the Pope to the dignity of patricius, and possessor of the exarchate of Ravenna. Stephen anointed Pepin king. — Stephen IV. (III.), Pope from 768 to 772; had been made cardinal by Zacharias; condemned the Antipope Constantine, who was only a layman when chosen pope, and held a council in the Lateran in 769, which forbade, upon penalty of the ban, the election of a layman to the Papal dignity. — Stephen V. (IV.), Pope for a few months between 816 and 817, was a Roman by birth; had been made cardinal-deacon by Leo III., and crowned Louis the Pious emperor. — Stephen VI. (V.), Pope from 855 to 859; conducted negotiations with the Byzantine emperors, Basil and Leo, to restore peaceful relations between the Greek and Latin churches, which had been disturbed by Photius, and demanded that all the clergy consecrated by Photius should be deposed, and those deposed by him recalled. Leo satisfied the Pope. He crowned Duke Guido of Spoleto emperor before his death. — Stephen VII. (VI.), Pope for a few months (896-897); was completely under the influence of the Tuscan and Roman nobles; had the body of his predecessor and enemy exhumed, and thrown into the Tiber, and declared the episcopal and priestly consecration of Formosus invalid. Stephen was thrown into prison by his enemies, and strangled. John IX. condemned his conduct through a synod in Rome (898). — Stephen VIII. (VII.), Pope from 929 to 931; was under the control of the notorious women, Theodora and Marozia. — Stephen IX. (VIII.), Pope from 939 to 942; a German by birth and a relative of Otto the Great; was a creature and plaything of the contending parties. [See WATTENBORFF: Papst Stephan IX., Paderborn, 1883, 60 pp.] — Stephen X. (IX.), Pope for eight months (1057-58), was under Hildebrand's influence. As cardinal-deacon, appointed by Leo IX., he went with Cardinal Humbert to Constantinople in the interests of peace between that city and Rome. The mission was unsuccessful; and, returning to Rome, Stephen became monk, and later, abbot of Monte Casino. He opposed the licentiousness, especially the simony and concubinage, of the clergy.

NEUDECKER.

STEPHEN DE VELLAVILLA, Dominican at Lyons; d. 1261. His greatest work, De septem donis Spiritus Sancti, of which manuscripts are found in France, England, and Spain, has been printed only so far as it relates to the Cathari and Waldenses. (See QUÉRIF and ECHARD: Scriptores ordinis prædicatorum, i. pp. 190 sq.) In his youth he preached against the Cathari at Valence, and later became inquisitor. His account is one of the most reliable authorities on the heretics mentioned.

C. SCHMIDT.

STEPHEN OF HUNGARY. See HUNGARY.

STEPHEN OF TOURNAY, b. 1135, at Orleans; d. as Bishop of Tournay, in 1203; sought to secure a decree from Rome requiring greater uniformity of doctrinal teaching. His principal work is said to have been the Summa de decretis, of which only the preface remains. Two addresses and a number of letters are preserved. Best edition by Molinet, Paris, 1674.

STEPHENS (French, Estienne; Lat., Stephanus) is the name of a distinguished Parisian family of printers, which did most brilliant service in the interest of literature, and by their publications promoted the cause of the Reformation. They have a place here on account of their distinguished efforts in publishing theological works. — I. Henry, the first printer of this name, had an establishment of his own in Paris from 1503 to 1520. He was on friendly terms with some of the most learned men of the day, — Budé, Briçonnet, Le Fèvre d'Étaples, etc., — and had among his proof-readers Beatus Rhenanus. Among his publications were Le Fèvre's editions of Aristotle, the Psalterium quincuplex, and his Commentary on the Pauline Epistles. Henry left behind him three sons, — François, Robert, and Charles. François published a number of works between 1537 and 1548, which had no bearing upon theology. Charles studied medicine; wrote some works on natural history; in 1551 assumed control of the Paris printing-establishment, on Robert's departure to Geneva, and printed a number of works till 1561, using the title "royal typographer" (typographus regius). He published a number of smaller editions of Hebrew texts and targums, which were edited by J. Mercier.

II Robert, the second son of Henry, and the founder of the splendid reputation which the name of Stephens still enjoys, was born, according to the usual opinion, in 1503; died in Geneva, Sept. 7, 1559. He early became acquainted with the ancient languages, and entered the printing-establishment of Simon de Colines, who married his mother upon his father's death. He corrected the edition of the Latin New Testament of 1523. This work was the first occasion of the endless charges and criminations of the clerical party, especially the theological faculty of the Sorbonne, against him. In 1526 he began to print on his own account. In 1550 he emigrated to Geneva to escape the ceaseless opposition of the clergy. In 1539 he assumed the title of "royal typographer," and adopted as his devices an olive-branch around which a serpent was twined, and a man standing underneath an olive-tree, with grafts from which wild branches are falling to the ground, with the words of Rom. xi. 20, Noli altum sapere ("Be not high-minded"). The latter was called the Olivea Stephanorum ("the olive of the Stephens family"). The Paris establishment was made famous by its numerous editions of grammatical works and other school-books (among them many of Melancthon's), and old authors, as Dio Cassius, Eusebius, Cicero, Sallust, Cæsar, Justin, etc. Many of these, especially the Greek editions, were famous for their typographical elegance. Twice he published the Hebrew Bible entire, — in 1539 in four volumes, and 1543 sqq. in seventeen parts. Both of these editions are rare. Of more importance are his four editions of the Greek New Testament (1546, 1549, 1550, and 1551), the last in Geneva. The first two are among the neatest Greek texts known, and are called O mirificam: the third is a splendid masterpiece of typographical skill, and is known as the editio regia. The edition of 1551 contains the Latin translation of Erasmus and the Vulgate, is not nearly as fine as the other three, and is exceedingly rare. It was in this edition that the versicular division of the New Testament was for the first time introduced. Stephens is said to have made it on horseback, on his journey to Geneva. [See facsimile specimens of the last two editions, in Schaff's Companion to the Greek Testament, pp. 536-539.] A number of editions of the Vulgate also appeared from his presses, of which the principal are those of 1528, 1532, 1540 (one of the ornaments of his press), 1546. The text of the Vulgate was in a wretched condition, and Stephens's editions, especially that of 1545, containing a new translation at the side of the Vulgate, was the subject of sharp and acrimonious criticism from the clergy. On his arrival at Geneva, he published a defence against the attacks of the Sorbonne. He issued the French Bible in 1553, and many of Calvin's writings; the finest edition of the Institutio being that of 1553. His fine edition of the Latin Bible with glosses (1556) contained the translation of the Old Testament by Santes Pagninus, and the first edition of Beza's translation of Beza.

Three of Henry's sons — Henry, Robert, and François — became celebrated as printers. François (b. in 1510) printed on his own account in Geneva from 1562 to 1582, issuing a number of editions of the Bible in Latin and French. French writers identify him with a printer by the name of Estienne in Normandy, whither he is supposed to have emigrated in 1582. Robert (b. in 1530; d. in 1571) began to print in Paris on his own account in 1556, and in 1561 received the title of Imprimeur du Roy; and his presses were busily employed in issuing civil documents. His edition of the New Testament of 1568-69 (copies with both dates being in existence) was a reprint of his father's first edition, is equal to it in elegance of execution, and is now exceedingly rare.

III. Henry, the eldest son of the great Robert, and without doubt the most distinguished member of the family, was b. in Paris, 1528; d. at Lyons, March, 1598. He displayed in his youth a genuine enthusiasm for the study of Greek, which he learned before Latin. In his nineteenth year he undertook a protracted journey to Italy, England, and Flanders. In 1554 he published at Paris his first independent work, the Anacreon. Then he went again to Italy, helping the Aldens at Venice, discovered a copy of Diodorus Siculus at Rome, and returned to Geneva in 1555. In 1557 he seems to have had a printing-establishment of his own, and, in the spirit of our own day, advertised himself as the "Parisian printer" (typographus parisiensis). The following year he assumed the title, illustris viri Huldrici Fuggeri typographus, from his patron, Fugger of Augsburg. In 1559 Henry assumed charge of his father's presses, and distinguished himself as the publisher, and also as the editor and collator, of manuscripts. Many of his editions were the first. Athenagoras, Maximus Tyrius, Æschylus, appeared in 1557; Diodorus Siculus, 1559; Xenophon, 1561, 1581; Thucydides, 1564, 1588; Sophocles, 1568; Herodotus, 1570, 1592, etc. He improved old translations, or made new Latin translations, of many Greek authors. According to the writer of the article "Estienne," in La France Protestante, Henry took a personal part in editing fifty-four publications. His most celebrated work, the Thesaurus lingue græcæ, which has served in our own century as the basis of Greek lexicography, appeared in 1572, 5 vols. Of the Greek editions of the New Testament that went forth from his presses, there deserve mention those of Beza, with his commentary, 1565, 1582, 1589, and the smaller editions of 1565, 1567, 1580. A triglot containing the Peshito appeared in 1569, of which some copies are in existence, bearing the date "Lyons, 1571." In 1565 a large French Bible was printed. Henry's own editions of the Greek New Testament of 1576 and 1587 deserve mention; the former containing the first scientific treatise of the language of the apostolic writers; the latter, a discussion of the ancient divisions of the text. In 1594 he published a concordance of the New Testament, the preparatory studies of which his father had made. Much earlier he translated Calvin's Catechism into Greek. It was printed in 1554 in his father's printing-room.

Henry was married three times, and had fourteen children, of whom three survived him. His son Paul (b. 1567), of whose life little is known, assumed control of the presses, which in 1626 were sold to the Chouet brothers. Two of Paul's sons were printers, — Joseph at La Rochelle, and Antoine (d. 1674), who became Imprimeur du Roy in Paris in 1613. Frouton Le Duc's Chrysostom, and Jean Morin's Greek Bible (1628, 3 vols.) were issued from his presses. At his death the history of the family stops.

STERCORANISTS (from the Latin stercora, "excrements"), a term first used in 1054, by Cardinal Humbert against Nicetas Petoratus, and referring to a grossly sensualistic conception of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to which the body of our Lord is eaten, digested, and evacuated, like any other food. The conception has been falsely ascribed to Origen, and also to Rhabanus Maurus; but it no doubt existed in the time of the latter. ZÖCKLER.

STERNHOLD, Thomas, b. probably at Hayfield, near Blakeney, Gloucestershire (or, according to another account, in Hampshire), about 1500; d. August, 1549; was groom of the chambers to Henry VIII. and Edward VI. He is said to have versified fifty-one psalms, of which nineteen appeared 1548, and thirty-seven the next year, immediately after his death. The work was continued by John Hopkins of the Woodend, Aure, Gloucestershire (B. A., Oxford, 1544; said to have held a living in Suffolk). The Whole Booke of Psalms Collected into English Metre appeared 1562, and was bound up with innumerable editions of the Prayer-Book; making for two centuries or more the only or chief metrical provision of the Church of England. Since 1700 or so, it has been called the "Old Version," in distinction from its rival, Tate and Brady. Of its contents about forty-one psalms bear the initials of Sternhold (the only notable sample of his skill being a few stanzas of Ps. xviii.), and sixty four, those of Hopkins. The rest are by Thomas Norton, a lawyer who translated Calvin's Institutes, etc., and d. about 1600; William Whittingham, b. at Chester, 1524; d. 1589; educated at Oxford; married Calvin's sister, and was from 1563 dean of Durham; and William Kethe, who was an exile with Knox at Geneva 1555, chaplain to the English forces at Havre 1563, and afterwards rector or vicar of Oxford in Dorsetshire. Some mention also Wisdome, archdeacon of Ely. Kethe is memorable as the author of the only rendering now much used of all these, "All people that on earth do dwell" (Ps. c.): it has a venerable solidity and quaintness. The Old Version as a whole has long been brayed with ridicule from many quarters, and is, of course, unsuited to modern use. Fuller (1662) said that its authors' "piety was better than their poetry, and they had drunk more of Jordan than of Helicon;" and Campbell, that they, "with the best intentions and the worst taste, degraded the spirit of Hebrew psalmody by flat and homely phraseology, and, mistaking vulgarity for simplicity, turned into bathos what they found sublime." But Keble and others have valued their work for its fidelity to the original, and it continued to be used in very many English parishes far into the present century. F. M. BIRD.

STERRY, Peter, B.D., Puritan; b. in Surrey; d. Nov. 19, 1672. In 1636 he was chosen fellow of Emmanuel's College, Cambridge, where he had been educated. He was one of Cronwell's chaplains, one of the fourteen divines proposed by the Lords in May, 1642, and sat as an Independent in the Westminster Assembly almost from the first. His works are of great rarity. He was called in his day a "high-flown mystical divine," and suffered abuse; but Dr. Stoughton finds his mysticism "pertaining more to his imaginative forms of conception and modes of expression than to any thing else. His doctrines of conversion and of religious life, of Christian experience, duty, and hope, are of the usual evangelical type; but his ideas are ever dressed in mystical phraseology. He quotes texts of Scripture in abundance, and then commonly runs out into some strain of allegorical interpretation." Among his works may be mentioned The clouds in which Christ comes, London, 1643; three Parliament sermons, — The Spirit's conviction of sin (Fast-Day sermon), 1645, The coming forth of Christ in the power of his death (delivered Thursday, Nov. 1, 1649), 1650, The Way of God with his people in these nations (Thursday, Nov. 5, 1656), 1657, — Englands deliverance from the Northern Presbytery, compared with its deliverance from the Roman Papacy; or a Thanksgiving sermon on Jer. xvi. 14, 5, 1652; Discourse on the freedom of the will, 1675; The rise, race, and royalty of the kingdom of God in the soul of man (sermons), together with an account of the state of a saint's soul and body in death, 1683; The appearance of God to man in the gospel and the gospel change (sermons), to which is added an explication of the Trinity, and a short catechism, 1710. See J. STOUGHTON: Religion in England, iv. pp. 348-350; DEXTER: Congregationalism in Literature, pp. 648 and 652.

STEUDEL, Johann Christian Friedrich, professor of theology at Tübingen, and the last representative of the elder Tübingen school of theology; was b. at Esslingen in Württemberg, Oct. 25, 1779; d. in Tübingen, Oct. 24, 1857. He studied at the Tübingen seminary; became vicar at Oberesslingen; in 1806 reputant at Tübingen; in 1808 went to Paris, where he spent eighteen months in the study of Persian; returning to Germany, was pastor in Canstatt and Tübingen, and became professor of theology at Tübingen in 1815. His department was the Old Testament till 1826, when he began to lecture upon systematic theology and apologetics. His Lectures on the Theology of the Old Testament were edited by Oehler after his death (Berlin, 1840). He wrote a number of articles for periodicals. He was an independent man, and thoroughly evangelical. "I will serve no other master than Christ," he said, "and I wish to belong to him more and more exclusively and fully." His style was involved and heavy, and obscured the matter.<sup>1</sup> He attacked Strauss's Life of Christ, a few weeks after the appearance of vol. i., in a little tract (1835), which stirred up the wrath of Strauss to appear in the polemic, Herr Dr. Steudel oder d. Selbsttäuschungen des verständigen Supernaturalismus unserer Tage. See the full article on Steudel by Oehler (his son-in-law), in HERZOG'S Encyclopädie, first edition, vol. xv. pp. 75-81.

STEWART, church-officer among the Methodists, whose duties are similar to those of deacons in the Presbyterian and Reformed churches, relating, generally speaking, to the care of the sick and of the moneys of the church. See the appropriate sections in The Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the art. "Steward," in McClintock and Strong.

STEWART, Dugald, Professor of moral philosophy in the University of Edinburgh; was b. in Edinburgh, Nov. 22, 1753. He was the son of the professor of mathematics in the University of Edinburgh. The boy spent his winters in Edinburgh, his summers in Catrine, Ayrshire, where his father had a house. Dugald Stewart was educated at the high school of Edinburgh and at the universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow. From 1765 to 1769 he was a student in Edinburgh University, and was greatly influenced by Adam Ferguson, professor of moral philosophy, whose successor he became. He was a student in Glasgow University in 1771-72, and there came under the influence of Thomas Reid, professor of moral philosophy, whose teaching completely swayed his philosophic thought throughout his after-career. When Dugald Stewart returned to Edinburgh, he began immediately his course as a public teacher in the university, on account of his father requiring his assistance with the duties of the chair of mathematics. He continued assistant from 1772, and was elected professor, in succession to his father, in 1775. In 1778 he lectured for Adam Ferguson while the latter was acting as secretary to the commission sent to America to negotiate as to pending disputes. The chair of moral philosophy was the one for which Dugald Stewart was eminently qualified; and to that chair he was elected on the resignation of Ferguson, in 1785, holding it till 1820, though during the last ten years of this period the duties of the chair were performed by Thomas Brown, who had been appointed his colleague in 1810, and who died before Stewart. After Brown's death, Stewart resigned the chair, and John Wilson ("Christopher North") was elected. Dugald Stewart was the strenuous supporter, and elegant expounder, of Reid's philosophy, known as the "Scotch philosophy" and "the philosophy of common sense;" being a defence of the certainty of human knowledge and belief against the scepticism of Hume. For an exposition of the philosophy of common sense, see article on Thomas Reid. Stewart's contributions to philosophic literature are numerous. His collected works, edited by Hamilton, were published in Edinburgh and Boston, in eleven octavo volumes. His Outlines of Moral Philosophy, first published in 1793, containing a sketch of psychology and ethics, was long in circulation as a handbook for beginners in ethical science. An edition of it was prepared by Dr. McCosh of Princeton. Besides this, his works are the following: Dissertation on the Progress of Metaphysical, Ethical, and Political Philosophy (first published in Encyclopædia Britannica); Elements of the Philosophy of the Human Mind, of which an edition was published in Boston; Philosophical Essays; Philosophy of the Active and Moral Powers; and Lectures on Political Economy. As a professor he was very highly esteemed by his students. Lord Cockburn, who writes enthusiastically of him as a teacher, describes his lecturing as "gentlemanlike, calm, and expository." On account of his careful treatment of political science, along with moral philosophy, he attracted from England many who were destined for political life, including Lord Brougham, Lord Palmerston, and Earl Russell. Many who afterwards rose to eminence in public life acknowledged special indebtedness to him. The shrewd, sagacious, but somewhat cumbrous argumentation of Reid was thrown into a pleasing and attractive form by Stewart, through whose clearness of logic, literary taste, and power of eloquence, it secured a greatly extended influence. These two were the representatives of a philosophy which has largely governed the philosophic thought of Scotland since, and for a time exercised considerable influence in France through the teaching of Cousin and Jouffroy. Stewart, like Reid, was hesitating and unsatisfactory in his mode of stating the evidence for personal existence, making it matter of belief, rather than of direct knowledge. Thus he says, "We cannot properly be said to be conscious of our own existence; our knowledge of this fact being necessarily posterior, in the order of time, to the consciousness of those sensations by which it is suggested." In this way, he spoke of the knowledge of self rather as an acquired notion than as a fact of present consciousness. Stewart treated, with special fulness, of "conception" as a power of mind by which we are able to represent past sensations and perceptions. In his treatment of this subject his analysis was so careful as to recognize dependence on physical organism for this mental representation, in strict harmony with more recent physiological teaching. As the follower and expounder of Reid, Stewart was the resolute opponent of the theory that all knowledge comes from experience; maintaining, on the contrary, that intelligence itself is the source of all that is fundamental to intelligent procedure in dealing with the confused mass of our sensations and perceptions. Like Reid, he devoted special attention to the doctrine of external perception; making it his special aim to ascertain the amount of direct and certain knowledge we have of existence external to self. On account of growing infirmity, and in the midst of general regret, Dugald Stewart withdrew from active professional duty in 1810, and thereafter lived in comparative retirement at Kiuneil House, Linlithgowshire, a residence placed at his command by the Duke of Hamilton. He died in Edinburgh, when visiting a friend, on the 11th of June, 1829. His body lies in a covered and completely enclosed massive tomb in the lower portion of the Canongate Burying-ground, Edinburgh, the same cemetery in which is the grave of Adam Smith, professor of moral philosophy in Glasgow, and author of the Wealth of Nations. So profound and widespread was the admiration of Dugald Stewart, that, shortly after his death, a meeting was held in Edinburgh at which it was resolved to erect a monument to his memory. The result was the classic monument now standing on the Calton hill in the Scotch metropolis.

STICHOMETRY. The data of stichometry consist chiefly of subscriptions at the close of manuscripts, expressing the number of lines which are contained in the book that has been copied; of marginal annotations from point to point, expressing the extent of the previous text; or of quotations and allusions which are found in various writers, which indicate either the locality of some passage in a quoted work, or the compass of the whole or part of the works of a given author. For example, at the close of Isocrates, Busiris, in Codex Urbinas, we have in the Archaic character the number 390; while on the margin of the same work, in the more recent character, we have on fol. 22<sup>v</sup>, 10 (§ 25), before τούτων οἷτις, the number 2 (B); and on 25<sup>v</sup>, 12 (§ 39), before γεγονότας ἡ τους, the number 3 (Γ); and these numbers represent the second and third hundreds of lines measured on some exemplar, either actual or ideal; Diogenes Laërtius quotes a passage from Chrysippus, κατὰ τοὺς χιλίους στίχους; and Galen estimates the extent of a certain portion of the works of Hippocrates at two hundred and forty verses; τοῖ του τοῦ βιβλίου τὸ μὲν κατὰ τὸ ἐν γράμμα μέρος τὸ πρῶτον εἰς σμ' στίχους ἐξήκει (Galen, in Hippokratem de nat. hom., xv. p. 9).

Full collections of such data may be found in Ritschl: Opusc. Philol., vol. i. pp. 74 sqq.; and Birt: Das Antike Buchwesen, c. 4.

Every thing in these data suggests that the numeration has reference to standard lines or copies; and since the actual number of lines in the manuscripts never tallies with the stichometric record, and we are unable to point to any copies which do furnish an agreement, it is evident that there is somewhere a common unit of measurement upon which these subscriptions and quotations are based: in other words, the στίχος must have an element of fixity in it, even if it be not absolutely fixed.

It is important, therefore, to determine in what direction the meaning of στίχος deflects from its normal indefinite sense of line, row, and verse.

The term στίχος is of itself extremely vague. It may be nothing more than row or line; as, e.g., the LXX. use it for the rows of stones in the high priest's breastplate; or, in a military sense, it may represent the number of men in a rank or file of soldiers, especially the latter; and so in other cases. But in literature it is easy to demonstrate that the στίχος is deflected in meaning in the direction of a hexameter line. In the first place, such a unit is convenient for the comparison of prose-works with poetry; in the next place, we have actual instances of prose-passages reduced to their equivalent verse-lengths; in the third place, we may actually find the term στίχος used of hexameter poetry, in distinction from any other; and, finally, we may actually divide any given work into hexameter rhythms, and compare our results with the transmitted numerical data. If we take these points in order, we may say that the prose-unit is more likely to be taken from poetry than the unit of measurement for poetry is likely to be adopted from prose; for the line of poetry is already measured in a sensibly constant unit, and no reason exists for a change of that unit. The only question that would arise here is whether we ought not to expect a variety of units of measurement; as, for instance, an iambic unit in distinction from a hexameter unit. It is sufficient to observe at this point, that such varieties of measurement, if they exist, are extremely rare.

In regard to the actual reduction of a prose-passage to its equivalent verse-length, we have an important case in Galen (v. 655, ed. Kühn), where, having quoted a sentence from Hippocrates, he continues:—

εἰς μὲν οὗτος ὁ λόγος ἐννέα καὶ τριάκοντα συλλαβῶν ὅπερ ἐστὶ δυοῖν καὶ ἡμισίως ἐπὶν εξαμέτρων κτέ.

If Galen then reckons thirty-nine syllables as being equivalent to two hexameters and a half, or, as he continues, eighty-two syllables to five hexameters, the hexameter can hardly be different from a sixteen-syllabled rhythm. We are invited, therefore, to the assumption that stichometric measurement is made by preference in syllables of which sixteen go to the hexameter, or unit-verse. The number 16 invites attention as being the number of syllables in the first line of the Iliad, and as being a square number, a peculiarity which always had a certain attractiveness for early calculators.

That the term στίχος deflects in the direction of hexameter verse as against any other line of poetry which might have been chosen for a proper unit of measurement, will appear from Montfaucon (Bibl. Coislin, p. 597), where there is quoted from a tenth-century manuscript the following catalogue of poets:—

This broad division of poets into writers by στίχοι and writers of iambics can only have resulted from a specialization of the meaning of the term στίχος by constant use in a particular sense.

In the demonstration of the same point by actual measurement, the most important researches are those published by the late Ch. Graux, in the Revue de Philologie, April, 1878, in which he demonstrated, by an actual estimation of the number of letters in certain works, that the στίχος represented not a clause, nor a number of words, but a fixed quantity of writing. The average number of letters to the verse he found to vary between narrow limits, generally thirty-four to thirty-eight letters; and an enumeration of the letters in fifty lines of the Iliad opened at random supplied him with an average of 37.7 letters to the verse. This very important identification of the στίχος with the hexameter is the starting-point for a great many new critical investigations as to the integrity of transmitted texts, their early form, etc. Whether the unit of measurement is a certain number of syllables, or a certain number of letters, is not easy to decide. We may be tolerably certain that the measured line is, as above stated, a space-line, and not a sense-line; but to discriminate between a letter-line and a syllable-line is a more delicate matter. If we adopt the former, we must probably fix the unit at thirty-six letters, because this is the nearest symmetrical number to the average hexameter. We have very few instances, however, in which the actual letters of a line are found to be numbered; while we can readily trace the custom of limiting a line by the division of the syllables, in the earliest manuscripts. Moreover, we have the actual measurement in the passage quoted from Galen; and Pliny seems to allude to the custom of syllable-counting, when, in one of his epis-ties, he demands an equally long reply from his correspondent, and threatens to count, not only the pages, but the verses on the page, and the syllables of each verse ("Ego non paginas tantum, sed versus etiam syllabasque numerabo."—Pliny, iv. 11). The preference must, therefore, be given to the syllable-line, though, perhaps, not entirely to the exclusion of the other. It is comparatively easy to count the compass of a book in sixteen-syllable rhythm, but a toilsome enough process to estimate with equal accuracy the number of thirty-six-letter lines.

It is interesting to compare the relative sizes of the two line-units. M. Graux deduces 37.7 as the average hexameter in letters, and Diels (Hermes, xvii. Bd.) makes the average of the first fifty lines in Homer to be 15.6 syllables. A verse of sixteen syllables is then equivalent to about 1.071 verses of thirty-six letters each. In precisely the same way as M. Graux determined the average number of letters to the verse from the total stichometry, in the manuscripts of Herodotus, Demosthenes, Eusebius, Gregory of Nazianzus, etc., we may proceed to examine the partial stichometry. This has been done for Isocrates by Fuhr (Rhein. Mus., Bd. 37, p. 168); for the Plato manuscripts, by Schanz (Hermes, xvi. p. 309); and for the Demosthenes manuscripts, by W. v. Christ, in a very able discussion entitled Die Atticusausgabe des Demosthenes, München, 1882. The partial stichometry is of the highest value for the study of texts; and in every case the data which it supplies are found to accord very closely with our fundamental statements as to the paleographical meaning of the word στίχοι.

Some degree of confusion is introduced by the existence, apparently, in early times, of an alternative iambic verse of twelve syllables, as well as by the introduction of writing by Cola and Commata. The latter of these points has been an especial ground of combat, in consequence of the countenance which the custom seemed to lend to the theory of sense-lines in opposition to space-lines. The explanation of the matter seems to be as follows: when the earlier uncial form of writing was deserted for one more convenient for purposes of reading and recitation, the text was broken up into short sentences, named, according to their lengths, Cola and Commata; and in some instances an attempt was made, not only to number these Cola, so as to form a colometry similar to stichometry, and sharing the advantages which it offered for reference and book-measuring, but even to accommodate the arrangement of these Cola so as to reproduce the original number of verses. Thus we find the rhetorician Castor (Waltz. Rhet. Gr., iii. 721) discussing the pseudo-oration of Demosthenes against Philip as follows: τοῦτον τὸν λόγον στίξομεν κατὰ κῶλον καταντήσαντες εἰς τὴν ποσότητα τῶν κῶλων κατὰ τὸν ἄριθμόν τῶν ἐγκείμενων ἐν τοῖς ὑπάρχουσιν βιβλίοις, ὡς ἐμέτρησεν αὐτὸς ὁ Δημοσθένης τὸν ἰδὼν λόγον. It seems also that this change of form took place first for those books which were publicly recited, or which had a semi-poetical structure; so that the oldest Bible manuscripts desert the continuous uncial writing in the Psalms, in Job, the Proverbs, Canticles, etc.; and St. Jerome proposed to imitate this peculiarly divided text in the prophets: "Sed quod in Demosthene et Tullio solet fieri, ut per cola scribantur et commata, qui utique prosa et non versibus conscripserunt, nos quoque utilitati legentium providentes, interpretationem novam novo scribendi genere distinximus" (preface to Isaiah).

We shall now turn to the stichometry of the New Testament, and in particular to the Epistles: here we shall show that the theory already advanced is completely confirmed, and that we have a very powerful critical implement for the restoration of early New-Testament texts in the traditional data. As before, we have both total and partial stichometry. There is, however, a good deal of variation between the transmitted data, arising from various causes, such as variation in the text, variation in the unit employed in the measurement, difference in versions measured, and difference in the abbreviations employed. The greatest authority, however, for New-Testament stichometry, is found in the work of Euthalius, edited by Zacagni, Collect. Mon. Antiq. Eccles. Græc., Rome, 1698; Migne, Patrol., Græc., tom. 85. Euthalius was a deacon of the Church of Alexandria, and afterwards bishop of Sulca, supposed to be a small city in Upper Egypt. He has frequently but erroneously been credited with the introduction of stichometry to the New Testament, and these verses which he measured have been by many persons identified with the colon-writing previously described. There is very little ground for any such ideas; and we shall find that the στίχοι mentioned by Euthalius are hexameters of sixteen syllables, a very slight allowance being made for certain common abbreviations. The work of Euthalius consisted in editing the Acts and Catholic Epistles, with a complete system of prologues, prefaces, and quotations: every book was divided into lections, and to every lection, as well as to the greater part of the prefaces, was appended its numerical extent. The verses were also marked on the margin from fifty to fifty. We have thus a mine of stichometric information sufficient to test any theory in the closest manner. Moreover, the work has this importance, that Euthalius professes to have measured his verses accurately, and to have employed the best manuscripts; viz., those preserved in the Pamphilian Library at Cæsarea. It thus appears that we have the right to set a high value on the measurements made, on the ground of antiquity as well as of accuracy.

We shall now test these results given by Euthalius for the lections of the Acts of the Apostles; and, taking no account of the abbreviations which might have been found in the text, we shall divide the text of the Acts in Westcott and Hort's New Testament into sixteen-syllabled rhythms. If we had allowed for abbreviation, the results would have been somewhat less, as we might subtract a syllable at every occurrence of the words θεὸς and χριστός, and two syllables for each occurrence of ἰησοῦς and κύριος, with perhaps a few other rarely recurring words, as πατήρ, οὐρανός. Our data for Euthalius are taken from Cod. Escorial, ψ. iii. 6, as there are some errors in Zacagni's figures.

Allowing for one or two obvious corruptions, such as the dropping of the figure ρ in lection 6, the agreement is very complete.

The lines of the following table are nearly hexameters, so that the table affords a picture of the arrangement of an early bicolumnar Codex:—

Lection.	Begin.	Cod. Esc.	Westcott and Hort.
2	1.15	30	30
3	2.1	109	111
4	3.1	136	143
5	4.32	100	121
6	6.1	88	190
7	8.1 (ἐγένετο)	92	94
8	9.1	75	77
9	9.23	216	210
10	11.27	283	272
11	15.1	193	201
12	17.1	164	161
13	19.1	239	242
14	21.15	293	307
15	24.27	168	160
16	27.1	198	192

Still more remarkable is the harmony between the measured text of Westcott and Hort and the Euthalian figures, when we allow for the abbreviations previously mentioned. We give the results for the Epistles in a form suitable for comparison. The first column represents the stichometric number supplied by Euthalius and the best manuscripts; the second gives the result of the actual subdivision of the text of Westcott and Hort into sixteen-syllabled verses; and the third expresses the same result with the proper deduction made for four leading abbreviations.

James	237 or 242	240	237
1 Peter	236 or 242	245	240
2 Peter	154	162	158
1 John	274	268	262
2 John	30	31	30
3 John	32	31	31
Jude	68	70	68
Romans	920	942	919
1 Corinthians	870	897	874
2 Corinthians	590	610	596
Galatians	293	304	296
Ephesians	312	325	314
Philippians	218	218	209
Colossians	208	215	209
1 Thessalonians	193	202	194
2 Thessalonians	106	112	106
Hebrews	703	714	705
1 Timothy	230	239	231
2 Timothy	172	177	170
Titus	97	98	97
Philemon	38	42	40

The agreement between the first and third columns is very complete and decisive as a test of the hypothesis proposed with regard to the nature of the Euthalian στίχοι.

In the Gospels the data may be handled in a similar manner; but the difficulties arising from variety of text, etc., are great: moreover, many manuscripts transmit not only the number of verses, but also another number corresponding to the ῥήματα of the separate books. We have from a large group of cursive manuscripts the following numbers for the four Gospels:—

	Matthew.	Mark.	Luke.	John.
ῥήματα	2524	1675	3803	1938
στίχοι	2500	1616	2740	2024

From this it appears that the number of ῥήματα is sometimes in excess, and sometimes in defect, of the number of verses. What these ῥήματα are is a hard question. Some persons have identified them with the στίχοι,—a supposition that will scarcely bear scrutiny. It is doubtful, moreover, whether the verses of the Gospels are measured by the same unit as we found employed in the Acts and Epistles. A fifteen-syllabled hexameter seems to agree best with the traditional figure. The Gospel of John, in the text of Westcott and Hort, is 2,025 abbreviated fifteen-syllabled hexameters, an almost absolute agreement with the result given above (2,024). For the other Gospels the matter must be left for more extended investigation.

STIEFEL (STIFEL), Michael, a distinguished arithmetician of the Reformation; was b. at Esslingen, April 19, 1486; entered the Augustinian convent there, left it for Wittenberg in 1520; stood on friendly terms with Luther; after holding several pastorates, was appointed in 1558 professor of mathematics at Jena, with a salary of forty florins (afterwards increased to sixty florins); d. in Jena, April 19, 1567. In 1532 he published Ein Rechenbüchlein vom End Christi, in which, upon the basis of the figures in Daniel, he set the day of judgment at eight o'clock in the morning of Oct. 19, 1533. His arithmetical studies and works (Rechenbuch von d. weischen und deutschen Pracktick, 1546, etc.) did much to promote the study of mathematics in Germany. Luther called Stiefel a "pious, learned, moral, and industrious man." C. SCHWARZ.

STIEKNA (or DE STEKEN), Conrad, also called Conradus ab Austria, one of the forerunners of John Hus; d. at Prague, 1369. Balbinus speaks of him as preacher in the Tein church, Prague. He zealously condemned the hypocrisy, simony, and licentiousness of the priests, which he described in dark colors. In his larger work, Accusationes Mendicantium, he attacked with great heat the orders of begging friars, and did not spare the bishops. STIER, Rudolf Ewald, a distinguished German exegete; was b. at Fraustadt, March 17, 1800; d. at Eisleben, Dec. 16, 1862. Set apart for the study of law, he entered the university of Jena in 1815, but the year following enrolled himself among the students of theology. His ideals at that time were Jahn and Jean Paul, with the latter of whom he carried on a correspondence. In 1818 he went to Halle, where he was chosen president of the Halle Burschenschaft. It was not till 1819 that he truly gave himself up to Christ, and began the study of theology from the proper motive. The occasion of this change was the death of a young lady whom he loved. He then went to Berlin, and after completing his studies, successively held the position of teacher at Wittenberg, Karalene, and in the missionary institute of Basel. In 1829 he became pastor at Frankleben. The writer of this, at an inn, got the following answer to a question about Stier: "He is a mystic." On asking what that meant, he received the reply, "They are the preachers who live as they preach." In 1838 Stier was called to Wichlinghausen in the Wupperthal, from which he retired in 1846, and passed three years in literary activity at Wittenberg. He was then appointed superintendent at Schkeuditz, and in 1859 at Eisleben. If any theologian has had to learn the "theology of the cross" by bodily pains, it was Stier. He was married to the sister of the distinguished theologian Nitzsch. Stier's principal works are in the department of biblical exegesis. He was interested in the German translation of the Bible; wrote Altes u. Neues in deutscher Bibel, Basel, 1828, and Darf Luther's Bibel unberichtigt bleiben?, Halle, 1836; was associated with Von Meyer in the last edition of his translation, 1842, and prepared an edition of his own in 1856 (Bielefeld), in which many changes were introduced. His principal work was the Words of the Lord Jesus (Reden d. Herrn), 1st ed., 1843, 3 vols.; [3d ed. 1870-74, 7 vols.; Eng. trans. by Pope, Edinb., 9 vols.; revised by Drs. Strong and H. B. Smith, N. Y., 1869, 3 vols.]. It is a storehouse of information and practical suggestion for ministers, among whom it has had a wide circulation. Stier bases his exegesis upon a firm faith in inspiration, and is dogmatic and mystical rather than historic and critical. I wrote to him, "You are a Christian cabalist;" to which he replied, "You are a pietistic rationalist." The Words of the Lord Jesus, like all his works, lacks in conciseness and point. Among his other exegetical writings are, Auslegung von 70 ausgewählten Psalmen, 1834-36; [Jesaias nicht Pseudo-Isaias, 1851; D. Reden d. Apostel, trans. by Venables (The Words of the Apostles), Edinb., 1869; D. Reden d. Engel, 1860, Eng. trans., The Words of Angels, Lond., 1862]. Among Stier's other writings are a treatise on homiletics, Grundriss d. Keryktik, 1830, 2d ed., 1844; Formenlehre d. hebräischen Sprache, 1833, Berlin, 1849; Luther's Katechismus, etc., 6th ed., 1855. [See his Life, by his sons, Wittenberg, 1868, 2d ed., 1871.] THOLUCK.

STIGMATIZATION (from the Greek στίγμα "a mark") denotes a spontaneous formation of wounds closely resembling those our Lord received by being crowned with thorns, crucified, and pierced with a spear. The first instance of such stigmatization is that of St. Francis of Assisi, who in 1224, two years before his death, saw the crucified Saviour in a vision, and, when he awakened from the trance, found himself marked on hands and feet with the marks of crucifixion. Thomas of Celano, Bonaventura, Alexander IV., and many others testified as eye-witnesses to the truth of the statement. Only the Dominicans would not believe it. In Castile and Leon they openly denied the fact; a bishop of Olmütz forbade to sell in his diocese representations of St. Francis with the stigmata; and a Dominican monk, Evehard of Oppau in Moravia, protested that the whole story was a product of the egotism and deceitfulness of the Franciscans. Later on, stigmatization became not so very rare in the Roman-Catholic Church. The last who was canonized on that account was the Capuchin nun Veronica Giuliani (d. at Citta di Castello in 1727): the canonization took place in 1831. But several pretended instances have occurred in the present century. Maria of Mörl, living at Kaltern, in the southern part of Tyrol, received the stigmata on her hands and feet in 1833, when she was twenty-two years old. She was visited by more than forty thousand people before she retired into the Franciscan nunnery at Kaltern. [Even the Protestant Church can boast of instances of stigmatization. In 1820 a pious maiden in Saxony received the stigmata under great sufferings, fell into a deathlike state on Good Friday, but began to recover on Easter morning. The most recent case in the Roman-Catholic Church is the Belgian Louise Lateau, who in 1873 attracted great attention by her flowing wounds. Thousands came to see her, but suspicion was aroused by the air of secrecy which surrounded her. She was closely watched, and the priests refused to allow her to be examined by surgeons. The excitement soon passed away; and she died (æt. 32), scarcely noticed, in August, 1883. It is noteworthy that stigmatization occurred on a man in only one case, and that the women thus signalized were sickly and hysterical. Leaving out of account the element of fraud, it may be said that "stigmatic neuropathy" is a pathological condition of occasional occurrence, explicable by physical and mental conditions. Therefore, while freely admitting the fact, one must not lay any stress upon it. It is no more a sign of divine favor than the shattered constitution and disordered brain which produce it.] See MALAN: *Histoire de S. STILES, Ezra, D.D., LL.D., Congregational; b. at North Haven, Conn., Dec. 15, 1727; d. in New Haven, May 12, 1795. He was graduated at Yale College, 1746; tutor there, 1749 to 1755; studied theology, then called to the bar, 1753, but began preaching in 1755; was pastor in Newport, R.I., from 1755 to May, 1777, when the place was occupied by the British, and the congregation dispersed. In September, 1777, he was elected president of Yale College, and shortly after professor of ecclesiastical history, and in 1780 professor of divinity. He published An Account of the Settlement of Bristol, R.I., Providence, 1785; History of three of the Judges of King Charles I., Major-Gen. Whalley, Major-Gen. Goffi, and Col. Dixwell . . . with an Account of Mr. Theophilus Wale of Narragansett, supposed to have been one of the Judges, Hartford, 1791. He left an unfinished Church History of New England, and more than forty volumes of manuscripts. See his life by ABIEL HOLMES, Boston, 1798, and by JAMES L. STILLING, a famous German writer, whose proper name was Johann Heinrich Jung; b. at Grund in Nassau-Siegen, Sept. 12, 1710; d. at Carlsruhe, April 2, 1817; a mystic and a theosophist, but childlike and pure-minded, with a ready and energetic sympathy for the actual sufferings around him, which, more than his apocalyptic visions, made him one of the most popular devotional writers of Germany. His parents were exceedingly poor; and while a young man he taught school two days a week, and tailored four, harassed by the anguish of poverty, and fired by the enthusiasm for studies. He learned mathematics, Latin, Greek, and even Hebrew. A Roman-Catholic priest confided to him a secret means by which to cure certain eye diseases, and this circumstance changed his destiny. An audacious but successful cure made him acquainted with a well-to-do gentleman, whose daughter he afterwards married; and in 1771 he went to Strassburg to study medicine. He there obtained something of a scientific training, and became doctor medicus; but it was of still greater consequence to him, that he there became acquainted with Goethe and Herder, and elevated above the level of a somewhat narrow and barren pietism. He settled first at Elberfeld as an eye-physician; and there he published, by the aid of Goethe, his H. Stilling's Jugend, which by its wonderful blending of poetry and fact, of fiction and truth, at once established him as a writer of rank. But he had a genius for getting into debt; and for many years his time and labor were divided between managing creditors, curing poor people's eyes, and writing devotional books which were the consolation and admiration of the German people. In 1778 he was made professor of political economy in the academy of Kaiserslautern, whence he removed, in the same quality, to Heidelberg in 1782, and to Marburg in 1787. But it was not until 1805 that he, by being appointed privy-councillor to the grand duke of Baden, was liberated from drudgery and pecuniary troubles, and allowed to follow his genius as an eye-physician and a devotional writer. He was three times married, and every time happily. When he grew older, his house, though ever so singularly managed, became a centre towards which every thing grand, or noble, or suffering, tended, while every thing base or hard crept skulking away. The most successful of his writings were his mystical tales, a kind of romances at which both Lavater and Jacobi tried their powers, and which had a peculiar charm for that time: Geschichte des Herrn von Morgenstau (The Life of Sir Morningdew), Theodore von den Linden, Florentin von Fahlendorn, etc. The greatest literary value have his autobiographical writings: Jugend, Jünglingsjahre, Wanderschaft, and Lehrjahre. His chief theological works are,

Siegesgeschichte, an exposition of the Revelation, and Geisterkunde, partially based on Swedenborg. MATTER.

STILLINGFLEET, Edward, b. at Cranborne in Dorsetshire, April 17, 1635; d. at Westminster, March 27, 1699. He was educated at Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship in 1653. Just after the Restoration, he published his Irenicum, a weapon salve for the Churches wounds (1661), a moderate and healing treatise, very appropriate in that age of fierce ecclesiastical strife, and reflecting honor on the courage and catholicity of the author at that particular crisis. The following year appeared his Origines Sacre, or Rational Account of the Christian Faith as to the Truth and Divine Authority of the Scriptures. In this work he criticised the history and chronology of heathen writers, undermining their credibility, and contrasting them with the authors of the Bible records. He dwelt upon the knowledge, fidelity, and integrity of Moses, and the inspiration of the prophets, as inferred from the fulfilment of their prophecies. Afterwards he treated of the being of God, the origin of the universe, the nations of mankind, and Pagan mythology; and it is interesting to find that he appears in harmony with modern geologists, by maintaining, not the universality, but the partial extent, of the Deluge. Of course, in many points, the work is superseded by later productions; yet it remains a storehouse of learning, and displays much logical ability and lawyer-like habits of thought. This volume was followed, in 1665, by A Rational account of the grounds of the Protestant Religion, a timely publication, when Popery was favored by the court and by personages in the upper circles. Other attacks upon Romanism, from the same pen, were made in publications we have not room to specify: it is sufficient to say that Stillingfleet was perhaps the most learned and effective champion of Protestantism just before the Revolution. The Miscchiefs of Separation, a sermon which he preached in 1680, and which was immediately published, gave unmistakable proof that he had abandoned the moderate opinions, and dropped the conciliatory temper, expressed in his Irenicum. This brought on him answers in the way of defence, written by Owen, Baxter, and other nonconformists. But he candidly acknowledged his mistake, being perfectly subdued by what John Howe wrote on the subject, "more like a gentleman," he said, "than a divine, without any mixture of rancor." In 1695 a violent dispute went on amongst certain nonconformists, respecting Antinomianism; and some of the disputants appealed to Stillingfleet as a sort of arbitrator, a circumstance which showed that by this time he had recovered his reputation as a healer of strife. An active mind like his would meddle in all sorts of questions, and he could not refrain from taking part in the great doctrinal controversy of the age. A Discourse in Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity, by Stillingfleet, was published in 1697. He was a metaphysician, as well as a divine, and criticised Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding the same year, following that up soon afterwards by a rejoinder to Locke's reply. He wrote also on other subjects, and gave "the best account," says Bishop Nicolson, "of the present state of our tithes." A collected edition of this author's works, with his life and character, was published after his death in 1699.

As bishop of Worcester, which he became in 1689, he took part in the commission for revising the Prayer-Book; and in his episcopal capacity he procured a stall in Worcester Cathedral for Bentley, the great classical scholar, who was the prelate's chaplain. JOHN STOUGHTON.

STOCKER, John, of Honiton, Devonshire, published in the Gospel Magazine (1776-77) nine hymns, which were reprinted by Daniel Sedgwick, London, 1861. Two of them, "Gracious Spirit, Dove divine," and "Thy, mercy, my God," have been widely used. F. M. BIRD.

STOCKTON, Thomas Hewlings, D.D., Methodist-Protestant; b. at Mount Holly, N.J., June 4, 1808; d. in Philadelphia, Oct. 9, 1868. Converted in the Methodist-Episcopal Church, he joined the Methodist-Protestant Church on its organization, and in 1829 was placed upon a circuit. He was stationed in Baltimore, 1830; chaplain to the House of Representatives, 1833-35, 1859-61, and of the Senate, 1862. He preached in Philadelphia, 1838-47, in Cincinnati until 1850, in Baltimore until 1856, in Philadelphia, over an independent church, until his death. He was one of the most eloquent preachers of his day. He compiled a hymn-book for his denomination (1837), and published some original poetry, and several volumes in prose. See his biography by A. CLARK, New York, 1869, and by J. G. WILSON, Philadelphia, 1869.

STODDARD, David Tappan, Congregational missionary; b. at Northampton, Mass., Dec. 2, 1818; d. at Tabriz, Persia, Jan. 22, 1857. He was graduated at Yale, 1838, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1841; sailed as missionary to the Nestorians, 1843, among whom he labored successfully for the rest of his days. From 1848 to 1851 he was in America on a visit. He was particularly interested in the Nestorian youths whom he gathered in the seminary established in 1844 at Oroomiah. He was a model missionary. His Grammar of the Modern Syriac Language was published in the journal of the American Oriental Society, New Haven, Conn., 1853. See J. P. THOMPSON: Memoir of D. T. Stoddard, New York, 1858.

STODDARD, Solomon, Congregationalist; b. in Boston, Mass., 1643; d. at Northampton, Mass., Feb. 11, 1729. He was graduated at Harvard College, 1662; was chaplain in the Barbadoes for two years; preached at Northampton from 1669 until his death, when he was succeeded by his grandson, and colleague from 1727, Jonathan Edwards. From 1667 to 1674 he was first librarian to Cambridge. He is remembered for his theory that "the Lord's Supper is instituted to be a means of regeneration," and that persons may and ought to come to it, though they know themselves to be in a "natural condition." He wrote The safety of appearing at the day of Judgement in the righteousness of Christ, Boston, 1687 (2d ed., 1729; republished, Edinburgh, 1792, with Preface by Dr. John Erskine); The doctrine of instituted churches explained and proved from the Word of God, Boston, 1700, 34 pp., 4to; a reply to Increase Mather's The order of the Gospel, professed and practised by the churches of Christ in New England, justified, etc., Boston and London, 1700; An Appeal to the learned, being a vindication of the right of visible saints to the Lord's Supper, though they be destitute of a saving work of God's Spirit in their hearts, 1709; A guide to Christ, or the way of directing souls that are under the work of conversion, 1714; An answer to some cases of conscience, 1722 ("among other things, it discusses whether men have the right to live at an inconvenient distance from church; when the Lord's Day begins; whether the Indians were wronged in the purchase of their land"). See art. CONGREGATIONALISM, p. 538; and DEXTER: Congregationalism as seen in its Literature.

STOICISM, the noblest system of morals developed within the pale of Greek philosophy, received its name from the place in Athens in which its founder, Zeno of Citium (about 308 B.C.) assembled his pupils, the Stoa, or colonnade. The metaphysical foundation of the system involves a final identification of God and nature, submerging both those ideas in that of an inevitable destiny. In its more austere forms, stoicism defines moral perfection as complete indifference to destiny. Man shall do that which is good, independently of surrounding influences and circumstances; and, having done that which is good, he shall feel happy, independently of the sufferings and misery which may result from his acts. In its later and somewhat mitigated forms, stoicism defined that which is good, virtue, as conformity to the all-controlling laws of nature, or even as agreement between the human and the divine will. Always, however, it placed action far above contemplation or enjoyment; and, by so doing, it exercised a great influence on the Roman mind. In Rome it found its most eloquent expounder, Seneca, and its noblest representatives, Marcus Aurelius the emperor, and Epictetus the slave; and by inculcating the duty of absolute obedience to the commandments of duty, of absolute self-sacrifice for the sake of virtue, it actually prepared the way for Christianity. The best representation of the whole subject is found in ZELLER: Philosophie d. Griechen, iii., Eng. trans., The Stoics, Epicureans, and Skeptics, London, 1869. See also RAVAISSON: Essai sur le Stoicisme, Paris, 1856; DOURIF: Du Stoicisme et du Christianisme, Paris, 1863; H. A. WINCKLER: Der Stoicismus eine Wurzel des Christenthums, Leipzig, 1878; W. STOLBERG, Friedrich Leopold, Count von, b. at Bramstedt in Holstein, Nov. 7, 1750; d. at Sondermuhlen in Hanover, Dec. 5, 1819. He was educated in Copenhagen, but, under the influence of Cramer and Klopstock, studied at Halle and Göttingen, where he became one of the most prominent members of the Hainbund, and travelled (1775-76) through Germany and Switzerland with Goethe and Lavater. In 1777 he went to Copenhagen as the representative of the prince-bishop of Lübeck to the Danish court, in 1789 he went to Berlin as Danish ambassador, and in 1793 he settled as president of the government of the principality of Eutin. But the literary and political enthusiasm of his youth, the fruits of which were lyrical poems, translations of Homer, Æschylus, and Ossian, dramas, etc., gradually became concentrated on religion; and by the influence of the Princess Gallitzin he was converted to Romanism in 1800. He resigned his position at Eutin, retired into private life, and occupied himself mostly with religious authorship. His principal work is Geschichte der Religion Jesu Christi, Hamburg, 1806-18, 14 vols. Among his other works are Betrachtungen und Bekehrigungen (1819-21), 2 vols.; a life of Vincent of Paula, Münster, 1818; Buchlein von der Liebe, 1820, etc. His collected works appeared in Hamburg, 1825, 20 vols. His life was written by A. NICOLIVUS, Mavence, 1846.

STONING AMONG THE HEBREWS. This capital punishment was ordained by the Mosaic law for the following classes of criminals: [(1) All who trench upon the honor of Jehovah, i.e., idolaters (Lev. xx. 2; Deut. xvii. 2 sq.) and enemies to idolatry (Deut. xiii. 6 sq.), all blasphemers (Lev. xxiv. 10 sq.; comp. 1 Kings xxi. 10 sq.; Acts vi. 13, vii. 56 sq.), sabbath-breakers (Num. xv. 32 sq.), fortune-tellers and soothsayers (Lev. xx. 27), also false prophets (Deut. xiii. 6, 11: in fine, those who had shared in any accursed thing (Josh. vii. 25); (2) Notoriously and incorrigibly disobedient sons (Deut. xxi. 18 sq.); (3) Brides whose tokens of virginity were wanting (Deut. xxii. 20 sq.), and so an affianced woman who had complied with a seducer, together with the seducer himself (ver. 23 sq.)] According to Jewish criminal procedure, the same penalty was incurred by those who cursed their parents, or had sexual connection with their mother, step-mother, daughter-in-law, or with a beast. Adultery also was punished with stoning (Ezek. xvi. 40, xxiii. 47; John viii. 5). An ox that had destroyed human life was also stoned (Exod. xxi. 25 sq.). The mode of stoning seems to be indicated in the expressions sakal, i.e., to hit with a heavy stone, and ragam, i.e., to overload one with stones. The place of execution appears to have been outside of the city (Lev. xxiv. 14; Num. xv. 36; 1 Kings xxi. 10, 13; Acts vii. 58); and that the witnesses threw the first stone upon the culprit, we see from Deut. xvii. 7; Acts vii. 57 sq. Stoning was a frequent resort of a mob (a very old practice, Exod. viii. 26, xvii. 1) in order to avenge itself on the spot upon such as had excited popular ill will (1 Sam. xxx. 6; Luke xx. 6; John x. 31 sq., xi. 8; Acts v. 26, xiv. 5-19; 2 Cor. xi. 25; Josephus, Ant. XIV. 2, 1, XVI. 10, 5; War, II. 1, 3; Life, 13, 58). It was resorted to, not only by the Jews, but also by Syrians (2 Macc. i. 16), Greeks (Herod., ix. 5; Thucyd., v. 60; Paus., viii. 5, 8; Ælian, Var. Hist. v. 19; Curtius, vii. 21), and other nations.

STORR, Gottlob Christian. See TÜBINGEN SCHOOL.

STOWELL, Hugh, an eminent evangelical clergyman; rector of Christ Church, Salford; canon of Chester, etc.; was b. at Douglas, Isle of Man, Dec. 3, 1799; and d. at Salford, Oct. 8, 1865. A memoir by Rev. J. B. Marsden appeared 1868. He wrote The Pleasures of Religion, with other Poems (1832), Tractarianism tested (1845, 2 vols.), and A Model for Men of Business; and edited A Selection of Psalms and Hymns (1831), containing the very popular "From every stormy wind that blows." His forty-six hymns were published by his son and successor, 1868. F. M. BIRD.

STRABO, Walafrid (Walafridus Strabus, "the squinter"), d. July 17, 849; was, according to some writers, a Suabian by birth, according to others an Anglo-Saxon; studied at St. Gall, Reichenau, and finally at Fulda, under Rhabanus Maurus, and was in 842 made abbot of Reichenau. He was a very prolific writer. His principal work is the so-called Glossa ordinaria, a huge exegetical compilation, the oldest printed edition, — without date or place, comprising four volumes in folio, — which for several centuries formed the principal source and the highest authority of biblical science in the Latin Church, and was used down to the seventeenth century. Another work of his, De exordiis et incrementis rerum ecclesiasticarum, printed in Hittorp's Scriptores des officii divinis, Cologne, 1568, is also of interest. It is a kind of handbook in ecclesiastical archæology, treating in thirty-one chapters various ceremonies, altars, bells, images, etc. He also wrote poems and historical works. ED. REUSS.

STRAPHAN, Joseph, was author of three hymns in Rippon's Selection, 1787. They have been more or less copied, and one, on Sunday-school work, extensively. F. M. BIRD.

STRAUSS, David Friedrich, b. at Ludwigsburg near Stuttgart, in the kingdom of Württemberg, Jan. 27, 1808; d. there Feb. 8, 1874. He studied theology (1825-30) at the university of Tübingen, where he came under the influence of Baur, who had formerly been his teacher in the seminary at Blaubeuren. He took up first with the ideas of Schelling, and then with those of the mystic Jacob Boehme. He became profoundly interested in natural magic in its different forms. But the study of Schleiermacher dissipated his mysticism. Theology had, however, less attractions for him than Hegel's philosophy, which, indeed, combined the two. He passed his final examinations with distinction, and became assistant minister in a little village near Ludwigsburg. His simple discourses were enjoyed by his parishioners, and his pastoral duties were well performed; but after nine months he resigned (1831), since he found himself too much distracted by religious doubts to stay, and was for six months temporary professor in the seminary at Maulbronn; then went to Berlin to hear Schleiermacher and Hegel. The latter died of cholera shortly after his arrival. In 1832 he was called to Tübingen as repetent in the seminary. He also lectured upon Hegel's philosophy in the university. His lectures were a brilliant success; but he soon found his position uncomfortable, owing to his opinions. He had planned a life of Jesus upon critical principles, and attacked with such ardor his great task, that in a year he wrote the book which has made him immortal, — Das Leben Jesu, kritisch bearbeitet, (Tübingen, 1835, 1836, 2 vols., 4th ed., 1840; French trans. by Littre, Paris, 1839, 2 vols.; Eng. trans. by George Eliot, London, 1846, 3 vols.). He was removed from his position at Tübingen after the appearance of the first volume (see Wiezsäcker, in Jahrb. für deutsche Theologie, 1875, 4th part), and transferred as provisional professor at Ludwigsburg. In 1836 he retired to private life. The action of the authorities was wise, for his book raised a storm of opposition. He applied the mythical theory which had made such havoc with Greek and Roman history, and which De Wette had applied to the Old Testament, to the Gospels, with the result that all miracles were turned into myths (see MYTHICAL THEORY): all that remained was a Christ idea. There was no such thing as prophecy, an incarnation, or a miracle; for nothing which is supernatural can be historical. There was no God-man as a person. The Incarnate God is the human race. Humanity is the child of a visible mother, but invisible father. It is the race which works miracles by its use of natural forces. It dies, and lives again, and mounts to heaven, because, raised above personal existence, it is united with the heavenly and eternal spirit. In this work Strauss ignored critical study of the text. He considered the four Gospels as the altered oral tradition. He accepted, however, the synoptical discourses. His theory was confronted by the dilemma so masterfully put by Ullmann in his Historisch oder Mythisch? (Hamburg, 1838) that either the Christ was the invention of the apostolic church, or the apostolic church was founded by Christ. Neander, Tholuck, Lücke, Lange, and others successfully refuted his theory; and his book is of value only for its purely negative criticism. In the second and third editions, and in his Streitschriften (Tübingen, 1837-38, 3 vols.), he endeavored to reply to the attacks made upon him, and conceded spiritual authority to the Founder of Christianity. It was his desire to make his peace with the theologians, which led him in 1838 to write the Zwei friedliche Blätter, Altona, 1839. In 1839 the radical party at Zurich nominated him professor of theology in the university there; but a popular outbreak prevented his acceptance, although for the rest of his life he continued to draw a thousand francs yearly (half the salary). In 1839 he published at Leipzig Charakteristiken u. Kritiken, 2d ed., 1844, embracing essays upon Schleiermacher, Daub, Kerner, animal magnetism, and modern possessions, etc. In the fourth edition of his Leben Jesu (1840), the first one printed in German characters, Strauss withdrew all the concessions of the second and third, and boldly threw down the glove to the theologians. His second chief work was Die christliche Glaubenslehre in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung und im Kampf mit der modernen Wissenschaft dargestellt (Tübingen, 1840, 1841, 2 vols.), which has been characterized as resembling a theology in the same way that a cemetery resembles a city. Strauss maintains that the opposition between science and religion is hopeless. The latter is indeed an inferior form of thought, which no longer satisfies cultivated spirits. He establishes his thesis by picking to pieces the different doctrines successively, and showing their worthlessness. The work made little impression. Strauss was now definitely relegated to private life, and wandered about through Germany, finding no permanent home. While living at Stuttgart he met the popular opera-singer Agnes Schebest, and married her in 1842. Two children, a son and a daughter, were born of this union; but it proved unhappy, and in 1847 they separated by mutual consent. His wife died Dec. 22, 1870.

His next work was Der Romantiker auf dem Thron der Cäsaren, oder Julian der Abtrünnige (Mannheim, 1847), an ironical parallel between the restoration of heathenism attempted by the Emperor Julian and the restoration of Protestant orthodoxy by Frederick William IV. of Prussia. He was elected as a liberal to the Württemberg diet in 1848, by the citizens of Ludwigsburg, but disappointed their expectations by advocating anti-liberal sentiments, and resigned soon after, to their great satisfaction. In this connection, see his Sechs theologisch-politische Volksreden, Stuttgart, 1848. In the last portion of his life he produced a number of literary works by which his reputation as a critic was enhanced, and four theological works, large and small, in all of which he plainly showed how widely he had departed, not only from tradition, but from the Christian religion. His literary works were Schubarts Leben in seinen Briefen, Berlin, 1849, 2 vols.; Christian Märklin, ein Lebens- und Character-bild aus der Gegenwart, Mannheim, 1851; Leben und Schriften Nikodemus Frischlins, Frankfurt, 1855; Ulrich von Hutten, Leipzig, 1857, 4th ed., 1878 (English condensed trans., London, 1874); Gespräche Hutten's, übers. u. erl., Leipzig, 1860; Hermann Samuel Reimarus, Leipzig, 1862; Voltaire, sechs Vorträge, Leipzig, 1870, 5th ed., 1878. The theological works were (1) Das Leben Jesu für das deutsche Volk bearbeitet, Leipzig, 1864, 4th ed., 1877 (Eng. trans., London, 1865, 2 vols.); (2) Die Halben und die Ganzen, Berlin, 1865; (3) Der Christus des Glaubens und der Jesus der Geschichte, Berlin, 1865; and (4) Der alte und der neue Glaube, ein Bekenntniss, Leipzig, 1872, 11th ed., Bonn, 1881 (Eng. trans. by Mathilde Blind, London and New York, 1873), with appendix, 1874. In the first of these four books, Strauss supplied the grave defect of his first Leben Jesu by prefacing the history with a critical study of the Gospels, particularly Matthew, to whose discourses he assigned historical importance. He granted that Jesus "stands foremost among those who have given a higher ideal to humanity," and that it was impossible to refrain from admiring and loving him. He also says we cannot do without Christianity, and it cannot be lost. In the second work, Strauss ridiculed Schenkel's liberalism as contrasted with Hengstenberg's whole-souled orthodoxy. In the third, he reviews Schleiermacher's life of Christ, then first published. In his fourth work he sets himself to answer four questions: Are we yet Christians? Have we still a religion? How do we look at the universe? How shall we regulate our life? The first question he answers negatively. He repudiates his former veneration for Christianity, and calls Christ's resurrection "a world-historical humbug." To the second query he replies, that "we can only believe in an absolute dependence upon the universe; an absolute being cannot be conscious or personal." To the third, he says, the universe is "only a development from a blind force or law, without any foreseen end." The fourth question is answered by saying, that we must live for "the good we find here, for science and art." There is no hereafter.

Strauss died of cancer of the stomach, after great sufferings borne with stoical patience. The deaconess who nursed him in his last illness relates (according to good authority), that during his agony he repeatedly called out, "Lord, have mercy upon me!" But he was buried, by his own request, without religious rites of any kind.

LIT.—STRAUSS's Gesammelte Schriften, with an Introduction by Eduard Zeller, appeared at Bonn, 1876-78, 12 vols. In this edition the first Leben Jesu, Die Christliche Glaubenslehre, and *Charakteristiken u. STRIGEL, Victorinus, a pupil of Melancthon, and an advocate of synergism; was b. at Kaufbeuren, Dec. 26, 1514; d. at Heidelberg, June 26, 1569. He studied at Wittenberg, under Melancthon; was professor at Erfurt, and in 1548 became the first professor and rector of the new school at Jena. Here he came into conflict with Flacius, whom he recommended for a professorship in 1557. It was a conflict between the Melancthonian theology and strict Lutheranism. A public controversy, lasting fifteen days, between these two men, was held in 1560 at the castle of Weimar. The only point discussed was the relation of the human will to divine grace in the work of conversion. In 1563 Strigel became professor at Leipzig; but in 1567 the lecture-room was closed to him on account of his moderate Lutheranism, and he became professor at Heidelberg. His principal work was Hypomnemata in omnes libros N. T., etc., Leipzig, 1565. See ERDMANN: De Strigelianismo, Jena, 1658, Hanover, 1675; MERZ: *Hist. vite et contrors. V. STRONG, Nathan, D.D., b. in Coventry, Conn., Oct. 16, 1748; d. in Hartford, Conn., Dec. 25, 1816, in the sixty-ninth year of his age. Having been graduated at Yale College in 1769, he pursued the study of law for a time; was a tutor in Yale College in 1772, 1773; and, after a brief course of theological reading, was ordained pastor of the First Congregational Church in Hartford, Conn., Jan. 5, 1774. He found the church weak: he left it the strongest in the State. Some of the ablest men in the country belonged to it. He remained in this pastorate nearly forty-two years.

During the first part of it, amid our colonial troubles with Great Britain, he published many political papers which exerted a wide and deep influence. He possessed one faculty which gave him great power in political discussions. His wit was woven "into the very texture of his mind." "Notwithstanding all his struggles against it," he could not entirely repress it; and he often let it fly like a javelin against the opponents of the Revolution. He never yielded to it in the pulpit: there he was uniformly and eminently solemn and impressive. In his controversies, however, with the infidels of his day, he did not restrain his instinctive tendency to sarcasm. Their safety lay in letting him alone. Like many other pastors, he suffered in his finances from the influence of the Revolutionary war. His salary became insufficient and uncertain. In order to relieve his failing exchequer, he invested a part of his patrimonial estate in a mercantile establishment, which afterward became bankrupt. Several circumstances connected with this loss, followed as they were by two severe bereavements, had a decisive influence on his ministerial character. During the last twenty years of his pastorate he became eminent as a "revival preacher." In the best sense of the term he was a pulpit orator. His person was attractive and imposing, his elocution was earnest and emphatic, his thoughts were clear, his sympathies ardent, his religious feelings profound. He had a wonderful memory, and a command of appropriate language. He was sometimes thought to be preaching extempore when in fact he was reading his manuscript, and sometimes he was thought to be reading his manuscript when in fact he was preaching extempore. His knowledge of human nature was remarkable. This gave him an exceptional degree of authority among the churches, and a rare degree of skill in conducting religious revivals. He was an indefatigable student; but his learning was developed in his intellectual character, and not in his references to books. His talents were versatile: his attainments were multifarious, and not concentrated on a few points. His method of writing was rapid: he did not stop to perfect his style; and accordingly, among the many works which he performed, he left no single one which will endure as a visible monument of his real greatness. He published two volumes of sermons,—one in 1798, and one in 1800. Both of them were designed and adapted to guard the purity of religious revivals. He was a pioneer in the cause of Christian missions. He has been considered the father of the Connecticut Missionary Society, the oldest of the permanent missionary societies in the land. He was the projector of the Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, the principal editor of it for fifteen years, and the sole editor of it for five of these years. His numerous contributions to it had a memorable influence on the religious welfare of what were then our "new settlements." He was also the projector of the Hartford Selection of Hymns. Several of these he composed himself, and was the chief editor of the volume published in 1799. The most elaborate of his productions is entitled The Doctrine of Eternal Misery reconcileable with the Infinite Benevolence of God (1796). The history of this volume is remarkable. In addition to these writings he published fourteen sermons in pamphlet form, the first in 1777, the last in 1810.

EDWARDS A. PARK.

STRYPE, John, a distinguished historiographer of the English Reformation; was b. at Stepney, Nov. 1, 1643; d. at Hackney, Dec. 11, 1737. After passing through St. Paul's school, he entered Jesus College, Cambridge (1662), from which he was transferred to Catherine Hall, where he took his degree. He was made curate of Theydon-Boys, Essex, in 1669, and of Low Leyton, Essex, the same year. Archbishop Tenison afterwards conferred upon him the sinecure of Tarring, Sussex, and he received the lectureship of Hackney, which he resigned in 1724. His principal writings are an edition of Lightfoot's Works, London, 1684, 2 vols.; Memorials of Archbishop Cranmer, 1694, new ed., Oxford, 1848, 3 vols.; Life of Sir Thomas Smith, 1698; Life of Dr. John Aylmer, Bishop of London, 1701; Life of Sir John Cheke, 1705; Annals of the Reformation, 1709-31, 4 vols.; Life and Actions of Archbishop Grindal, 1710; Life and Letters of Archbishop Parker, 1711; Life and Acts of Archbishop Whitgift, 1718; Ecclesiastical Memorials, 1721, 3 vols. The most important of these works, which have been a storehouse for modern historians of the Elizabethan period, is the Annals of the Reformation, which, as the author says in his dedication to the king, "commences at the happy accession of Queen Elizabeth to the throne, when the great and divine work was taken in hand again of removing the gross superstitions and errors of Rome which had been restored by Queen Mary." Strype was a diligent collector of materials, faithful and minute, but lacked skill of arrangement. The complete works of Strype were issued at Oxford, 1820-40, in 27 vols.

STUART, Moses, b. in Wilton, Conn., March 26, 1780; d. in Andover, Mass., Jan. 4, 1852, aged seventy-one years, nine months, and nine days. When a lad of but twelve years, he became absorbed in the perusal of Edwards on the Will. In his fifteenth year, entering an academy in Norwalk, Conn., he learned the whole Latin grammar in three days, and then joined a class who had devoted several months to Latin studies. In May, 1797, having been under the careful tuition of Roger Minot Sherman, he was admitted as a sophomore to Yale College. Here his tastes were pre-eminently for the mathematics. At his graduation, in 1799, he delivered the salutatory oration, at that time the highest appointment awarded to the class. One year after leaving Yale he taught an academy in North Fairfield, Conn., and in the following year was principal of a high school at Danbury, Conn. Having pursued the study of the law, he was admitted to the bar in 1802, at Danbury. His fertile and versatile mind, his enthusiasm and prodigious memory, gave promise of eminent success in the legal profession. From his legal study at this time he derived signal advantages through life. A few weeks before his admission to the bar, he was called to a tutorship in Yale College. Here he distinguished himself as an inspiring teacher. At this time he publicly devoted himself to the service of God.

Having pursued the study of theology with President Dwight, he was ordained, March 5, 1806, pastor of the First Congregational Church in New Haven, Conn. During his pastorate of three years and ten months, two hundred persons were admitted, all but twenty-eight by profession, into his church. His deep, solemn, sonorous voice, his commanding and impassioned manner, his translucent style, his vivacity of thought, his energy of feeling, contributed to make him one of the most eloquent of preachers. Many supposed that he mistook his calling when he left the pulpit for the professor's chair.

On the 28th of February, 1810, he was inaugurated professor of sacred literature in Andover Theological Seminary. In about two years he composed a Hebrew grammar for the immediate use of his pupils. They copied it day by day from his written sheets. When he printed it, he was compelled to set up the types for about half the paradigms of verbs with his own hands. He was a pioneer in the introduction of German literature into our country. Thus he opened a new era in our theological literature. By his fresh, easy, enthusiastic, and open-hearted way of teaching, by his multifarious acquisitions in the sciences and arts, he won the admiration of his pupils, and in an altogether unusual degree quickened their literary zeal. From the fact that he awakened the enthusiasm of many eminent men in his department, and gave to his department a new fascination as well as dignity and importance, he has been called "the father of biblical literature" in our land. He was the inspiring teacher of more than fifteen hundred ministers, of more than seventy presidents or professors in our highest literary institutions, of more than a hundred missionaries to the heathen, of about thirty translators of the Bible into foreign languages. He retained his professorship thirty-eight years. During these years his health was so feeble that, as he was wont to remark, he "never really studied more than three hours a day." The catalogue of his published writings is a proof that during these daily study-hours the invalid accomplished a good work. Several of the following books and essays have been republished in Europe, and several have been republished in this country since his decease: Grammar of the Hebrew Language, without Points, 1813; Letters to Rev. William E. Channing, D.D., on the Divinity of Christ, 1819 (republished in five successive editions); Grammar of the Hebrew Language, with points, 1821 (6th ed. in 1838); Letters to Rev. Samuel Miller, D.D., on the Eternal Generation of the Son of God, 1822; Winer's Greek Grammar of the New Testament, translated by professors Stuart and Robinson, 1825; Practical Rules for Greek Accents, 1829; Elementary Principles of Interpretation, from the Latin of Ernesti, 4th ed. in 1842; Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, 1827-28, 2 vols. (2d ed., 1833, in 1 vol.); Hebrew Chrestomathy, 1829 (2d ed., 1832); Grammar of the New-Testament Dialect, 2d ed., improved, 1831; Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, 1832, 2 vols. (2d ed., 1835, in 1 vol.); Notes to Hug's Introduction to the New Testament, 1836; Hints on the Prophecies, 2d ed., 1842; Commentary on the Apocalypse, 1845, 2 vols., pp. 1008; Critical History and Defence of the Old-Testament Canon, 1845; Translation of Roediger's Gesenius, 1846; Commentary on Daniel, 1850; Conscience and the Constitution, 1850; Commentary on Eccle- siastes, 1-51; Commentary on the Book of Proverbs, 1852.

In addition to the preceding works, he published fourteen pamphlets; thirty-four articles, containing fifteen hundred pages, in the American Biblical Repository; fourteen articles, containing four hundred and ninety pages, in the Bibliotheca Sacra; thirty-three important articles for other periodicals, — in all more than three thousand printed octavo pages. STUDITES, Simeon, is mentioned as a monk in the famous monastery of Studium in Constantinople, and as author of a number of noticeable religious hymns. See MÜLLER (Studium conc. Const., Leipzig, 1721) and LEO ALLATIUS (De Synonymis scriptis, Paris, 1664), where another Simeon Studites, a theologian, and writer of homilies and hymns, is also mentioned.

STUDITES, Theodore, b. in Constantinople in 759; d. in the Island of Chalcis, Nov. 11, 826. He became a monk in the monastery of Studium in 781, and in 794 its abbot. He was an ardent champion of image-worship, wrote tracts, letters, poems, etc., in its defence, and was four times sent into exile by iconoclastic emperors. See JACOB SIMOND: Opera varia, Venice, 1728, especially part v. NEUDECKER.

STURM, the first abbot of Fulda; b. in Bavaria in 710; d. at Fulda, Dec. 17, 779. He descended from a rich and distinguished family; joined Boniface on his second missionary tour through Central Germany; studied in the cloistral school of Fritzlar, and was ordained a priest there in 733. As he took a prominent part in the foundation of the monastery of Fulda, he was by Boniface made its first abbot, and under his rule the institution became very prosperous. But after the death of Boniface, in 755, conflicts arose between his successor, Lullus, and the abbot of Fulda, first concerning the possession of the remains of St. Boniface, and then concerning the administration of the property of the institution. As internal troubles were added, Sturm was summoned before King Pepin, and banished to the monastery of Jumedica; but the sympathy for the abbot was so strong throughout the whole Frankish Empire, that Pepin not only restored him, but also presented him with the great estates of Thininga and Umbstadt. He also enjoyed the favor of Charlemagne, acted as mediator between him and Duke Thassilo of Bavaria, followed him as missionary on his campaigns against the Saxons, and received from him the great estate of Hamelburg. His life has been written by EIGIL, abbot of Fulda, 818-822 (found in MABILLON: Acta Sanctorum O. B., ii. pp. 242-259; and in PERTZ: Monum. Script., ii. pp. 365-377), STRUMUS BRUNS, Fulda, 1779 and K. SCHWARTZ, Fulda, 1855. G. H. KLIPPEL.

STURM, Jakob, b. at Strassburg in 1489; d. there Oct. 30, 1553. He studied at Heidelberg and Freiburg, — first theology, together with Capito and Eck, afterwards jurisprudence; and, belonging to a family which for more than two centuries had given Strassburg its ablest magistrates, he entered upon a political career, became a member of the city council about 1522, and stood for the rest of his life at the head of the city government. From 1525 to 1552 he took part, as the representative of Strassburg, in ninety-one political and religious colloquies and negotiations. In 1521 he openly declared in favor of Luther; and freedom of conscience, without any interference either by emperor or pope, was the great idea for which he labored throughout his life. But he was always very zealous for a union between the Swiss and the Saxon Reformers; and, though he failed in that point, he exercised great influence in the course of the Reformation. C. SCHMIDT.

STURM, Johann, b. at Sleida, in 1507; d. at Strassburg, in 1539. He was educated at Liège, and studied at Louvain. He then visited Paris, where he lectured on dialectics, after the method of Rudolph Agricola, and was in 1537 called to Strassburg, where he founded the celebrated gymnasium on humanist principles, completely discarding the scholastic methods. In Paris he had adopted the Reformation; and, as he was a man of tact and eloquence, he was often employed in the negotiations between Protestants and Romanists, and maintained to the end of his life a hope of their final reconciliation. Personally acquainted with Calvin and the French Reformers, he inclined towards the Reformed conception of the Lord's Supper; and after the death of Jakob Sturm, in 1553, he was vehemently attacked by the Lutherans in Strassburg. After ten years' controversy, a consensus was brought about in 1563; but the disagreement broke forth again, and in 1581 Sturm was deposed from his office as rector of the gymnasium. See C. SCHMIDT: La vie et les travaux de Jean Sturm, Strassburg, 1855. C. SCHMIDT.

STYLITES (from στυλος, "a pillar"), or PILLAR-SAINTS, denote one of the most extreme forms of Christian asceticism; a class of anchorites who spent their life on the top of a pillar, never descending, always standing (protected from falling only by a frail railing), exposed to the open air day and night, summer and winter. The inventor of this monstrosity was Simeon, generally called the "Syrian," or the "Older," to distinguish him from other Simeons, also Stylites; b. at Sesan, in Northern Syria, in 390 or 391; d. at Telanessa, near Antioch, in 459. His parents were Christians, and he grew up as a shepherd; but when, in his thirteenth year, he for the first time attended service in a church, he was so completely overwhelmed, that he decided to leave his herds, and become a monk. He entered first a monastery in the vicinity of his home, where he spent two years, and then the monastery of St. Eusebonas, near Teleda, where he spent ten years. But the asceticism of the monastery was not severe enough for him. He settled as anchorite at Telanessa, and one of the feats to which he trained himself was fasting for forty days in imitation of Moses and Elijah. He first lived in a hut; but the crowds of admirers which thronged around him disturbed him; and, in order to escape them, he ascended a column seventy-two feet high and four feet in diameter. On the top of that column he spent thirty years. From sundown to sunrise he meditated, generally bending forwards and backwards, in regular alternation, without intermission: from sunrise to sundown he preached to the people assembled at the foot of the pillar, advised them, and gave them what spiritual aid he could. He wrote sharp letters to Theodosius II., Leo I., and the Empress Eudoxia, and his admonitions were followed; and when he died he was buried with all possible ecclesiastical and military pomp at Antioch. There was, indeed, something in his life, which, though it seems almost monstrous to the eyes of our time, impressed his own time as truly great, and he found many imitators. Stylites are mentioned as far down as the twelfth century. Simeon Fulminatus, who was hurled from his pillar by a thunderbolt, lived from 1143 to 1180. The champion of the whole class was Alypius, who spent seventy years on his pillars. At one time it was almost a fashion among rich people to maintain a stylite on a magnificent pillar: at others, the religious life of the congregations was, no doubt, invigorated and purged by the example of the pillar-saint.

LIT.—The life of Simeon was told by THEODORET: Hist. Eccl., c. 26; by his pupil ANTONIUS, in Act. Sanct., January, tom. i. p. 261; and by another contemporary, COSMAS, in ASSEMANI: Act. Mart., p. 268. See also LEO ALLATIUS: De Simeonum scriptis, Paris, 1664; SIEBER: De sanctis columnaribus, Leipzig, 1714. H. MALLETT.

SUAREZ, Francis, a learned and authoritative teacher of the order of the Jesuits; was b. at Grenada, Spain, Jan. 5, 1548; d. in Lisbon, Sept. 25, 1617. Following the desire of his parents, he began the study of law. Deeply impressed in his seventeenth year by a sermon of the Jesuit John Ramirez, he determined to enter the order of the Jesuits, and began the study of philosophy and theology at Salamanca. At the close of his studies he discoursed upon Aristotle at Segovia, taught theology at Valladolid, and acted as professor for eight years in Rome. Obligated by sickness to return to Spain, he taught for eight years at Alcalá, and one year at Salamanca, when Philip II. appointed him principal professor of the theology at Coimbra. His lectures must have produced an immense sensation, if the half of the reports is to be believed. Some attributed his wisdom to divine inspiration (infusam ei divinitus esse sapientiam), and called him "the second Augustine," "the prodigy and oracle of the age," etc. In spite of this adulation, Suarez remained humble, flagellated himself daily, fasted three times a week, and never ate more than one pound of food a day. He was on a visit to Lisbon to compose a difficulty between the Papal legate and the royal councillors, when he died. His epitaph ran, "The teacher of Europe, as also of the whole world, an Aristotle in the natural sciences, an angelic Thomas in divinity, a Jerome in style, an Ambrose in the pulpit, an Augustine in polemics, an Athanasius in the explication of the faith, a Bernard in mellifluous piety, a Gregory in the exposition of the Scriptures, and, in a word, the eye of the Christian world, but in his own judgment, nothing (ut verbo oculis populi Christiani sed suo solius judicio, nihil)."

The literary activity of Suarez was for the most part concerned with the treatment of the Aristotelian philosophy and the scholastic theology. His works appeared in twenty-three volumes, at Lyons and Mainz, 1630; a reprint of this edition, in twenty-four volumes, Venice, 1740. The Jesuit Noël made an excerpt from his works in two volumes, Geneva, 1730. The rich invention and casuistry with which Suarez spins out the discussion of scholastic questions suited the taste of his time and his order. Especially famous was his Defence of the Catholic and Apostolic Faith against the Errors of the Anglican Sect (Defens. fidei Cath. et Apost. adversus Angl. Sectæ errores), Coimbra, 1613. He wrote the work against James I. of England, and at the suggestion of Paul V. Its main burden is, that the Pope has the right to depose and set up kings in virtue of his authority received from Peter. Applauded by Paul V. in a letter to its author, dated Sept. 9, 1613, it was burnt by the public hangman in front of St. Paul's, London; and by a decree of Parliament it received a like treatment in Paris, June 26, 1614. See DESCHAMPS' Latin Life of Suarez, Perpignan, 1671; ALEGAMBE: Bibl. Script. S. J., Antw., 1643; WERNER: Suarez u. d. Scholastik d. letzten Jahrhunderte, Regensb., 1861. STEITZ.

SUBDEACON. The primitive church knew only two classes of officers,—leaders (προϊστάμενοι, ποιμένες, ἡγούμενοι, ἐπίσκοποι, πρεσβύτεροι) and servants (διάκονοι); the former for the functions of worship, the latter for the administration of charities. But as the episcopate on one side developed from the presbyterate, so, on the other, the subdeaconate from the deaconate. The Roman-Catholic Church, however, while vindicating for the episcopate immediate establishment by Christ himself, has never hesitated to concede that the subdeaconate is a merely human institution (utilitatis causa). Its existence in the middle of the third century in the churches of Italy and Africa is proved by the letter of Pope Cornelius to Bishop Fabius of Antioch (Eusebius: Hist. Eccl. VI. 43) and by the letters of Cyprian (2, 3, 29, 30, etc.). In Spain it is first mentioned by the synod of Elvira 305 (can. 30); in the Orient, by the synod of Laodicea, 361 (can. 21-23). From Amalarius (De divin. offic. 1, 11) it appears, however, that in the middle of the ninth century it was not yet universally established. With respect to dignity it was reckoned among ordines majores; though all its offices were of a subordinate character,—guarding the tombs of the martyrs, watching doors during the celebration of the Lord's Supper, etc. It became more elevated, however, when Gregory the Great extended the law of celibacy to its members, and when Urban II., in 1091, admitted them to competition for the episcopal chair. See MORINUS: De sacris ordinationibus, iii. 12. E. FRIEDBERG.

SUBINTRODUCTÆ is a term of canon law applied to women living in the houses of clerical persons for purposes of unchastity. When the unmarried state became identified with chastity, relations to subintroductæ very soon sprang up, and gradually developed into actual concubinage. They were noticed by the councils of Eliberis (305), Ancyra (314), Nicea (325), etc., down to the Council of Trent (Sess. 25, cap. 14).

SUBLAPSARIANISM, a theory held by moderate Calvinists, according to which the fall of man was not decreed, though it was foreseen, by God; the purpose of that distinction being to avoid ascribing the origin of sin to God. See INFRA-LAPSARIANISM and SUPRALAPSARIANISM.

SUBORDINATIONISM. See TRINITY.

SUCCESSION, Apostolical, means an unbroken series of ordination from the days of the apostles to our time. It is claimed, in the most absolute sense of the words, by the Roman-Catholic Church, which for that reason declares all other churches schismatic or heretic. But it is also claimed, though in a less dogmatic way, by the Greek, the Syrian, the Coptic, and the Armenian churches, and by various Protestant churches, especially the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States.

SUCCOTH-BENOTH (booth of daughters) occurs (2 Kings xvii. 30) as the name of some deity, whose worship the Babylonian settlers in Samaria are said to have set up on their arrival in that country. Opinions vary as to its meaning. (1) According to the connection and according to the ancient versions (Septuagint, Vulgate, Arabic, Syriac, Targum), it is the name of an idol. According to the rabbins it was a goddess under the form of a hen and chickens; others regard it as an astronomical emblem of the Babylonians. A third opinion is this, that it denotes the Mylitta. Hengstenberg's view is, that it means "the daughters of Bel and Mylitta, whose images were contained in small tabernacles, where they were worshipped with others." With this view he approaches (2) the more general one, that it denotes "the booths in which the daughters of the Babylonians prostituted themselves in honor of their idol (i.e., Mylitta). Thenius, who mediates between these two main views, says that the original meaning of Succoth-Benoth was booth, in which the daughters or the servants of Mylitta prostituted themselves in her honor; but the word was later pronounced as one, and was used to denote the name of the deity which was worshipped in the booths. Thus, according to the connection, and according to the Septuagint, some special idol was meant.

LEYRER.

SUDAILI, Stephanus Bar, a monophysite monk, who lived about 500, first at Edessa, and afterwards at Jerusalem; was, according to the Candelabrum Sanctorum, the author of a book, which, on the basis of a pantheistic interpretation of 1 Cor. xv. 28, taught that the punishment in hell was not eternal; which book afterwards circulated under the name of Hierotheus, the famous predecessor of Pseudo-Dionysius. As there is some resemblance between the theology of Bar Sudaili and Hierotheus, it is by no means improbable that the former may have borrowed the celebrated name of the latter for the purpose of introducing heterodox views into the church. See ASSEMANI: Bibl. Orient., ii. 291.

ZÖCKLER.

SUFFRACAN (suffraganeus) was, according to the explanation of the word given by Alcuin in a letter to Charlemagne, any ecclesiastical person whose duty it was to assist (suffragari) his superior. But the term was more especially applied to bishops, and that in a double sense, both to bishops in partibus infidelium, who assisted as vicars some regular diocesan bishop, and to the latter when they were not exempt in their relation to the metropolitan.

H. F. JACOBSON.

SUGER, Abbot of St. Denis; b. probably in 1081, and in the neighborhood of St. Omer; d. at St. Denis, Jan. 12, 1151; the contemporary of St. Bernard and Abelard, and one of the greatest statesmen France produced during the middle ages. He was educated in the monastery of St. Denis, together with Louis VI.; and when the latter ascended the throne, in 1108, he immediately called the monk to his court, and made him his principal councillor. In 1122 Suger was elected abbot of St. Denis; but he remained at the court, and continued to live as a man of the world, until, in 1127, he suddenly was seized by the reformatory movement of his time. He at once discarded all worldly pomp and vanity, and assumed the habits and practices of severe asceticism. But he continued to be a politician rather than an ecclesiastic. After the death of Louis VI., in 1137, he was appointed regent during the minority of Louis VII., and again when the latter, in 1149, made a crusade to the Holy Land; and during his lifetime hardly any thing of consequence took place in French politics without his immediate intervention. His leading idea was the consolidation of the monarchy as a divinely established institution; and he strove to realize that idea, not only in spite of the resistance of the feudal lords, but sometimes, also, in spite of the opposition of the hierarchy. His life was written by NETTEMET (1842), HUGUENIN (1857), COMBES (1858), and by a contemporary monk, in GUIZOT: Coll. des mémoires, vol. viii.

H. PETER.

SUICERUS (SCHWEIZER), Johann Caspar, the author of the Thesaurus Ecclesiasticus; b. at Zürich, June 26, 1620; d. there Dec. 29, 1681. After studying at Zürich, he finished his education at Montauban and Saumur. In 1644 he was made teacher in the schools of his native town, and was promoted to a professorship of Hebrew, and later (1660) of Greek. His philological works are valuable. They are, Sylloge eorum N. T., Tig., 1648, 1659, edited by Hagenbach in 1744, under the title, N. T. Glossarium Græco-Latinum, etc.; and especially Thesaurus eccles. e patribus Græcis ordine alphabetico exhibens quæcumque phrases, ritus, dogmata, hæreses et hujusmodi alia spectant, insertis infinitis pæne vocibus, loquendi generibus Græcis hæc nus a lexicographis nondum vel obiter saltem tractatis, opus viginti annorum indefesso labore adornatum, Amst., 1682, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1728; Symbol. Nicæno-Constant. expositum et ex antiquitate eccles. illustratum, Utrecht, 1718.

SUIDBERT, an Anglo-Saxon monk who in 690 accompanied Willibrord to Friesland as a missionary, and was ordained bishop of the Frisian congregation when Willibrord went to Rome. On the return of the latter, however, Suidbert went into the land of the Bructerians, between the Ems and the Lower Rhine; and, when the congregation which he formed there was disturbed by the invasion of the Saxons, he founded a monastery and missionary school at the present Kaiserswerth, under the protection of Pepin. See BEDA: Hist. Eccl., v. 19. The Vita in Act. Sanct. Boll., March 1, is a later and fully unreliable fabrication.

SULZER, Simon, b. at Interlaken, Sept. 22, 1508; d. at Basel, June 22, 1585. He grew up under very humble circumstances, but was enabled by the support of the government of Bern to study at Basel and Strassburg. After he finished his studies, he spent ten years in reconstructing the schools in the canton of Bern, and was in 1549 appointed preacher at Basel, and professor of theology. In the controversy between the Swiss and the German Reformers concerning the Lord's Supper, he occupied a peculiar position, as he held the views of Luther, and openly labored for their introduction in Switzerland. See HUNDES-

HAGEN: Conflikte des Zwinglianismus, Lutherthums, und Calvinismus, Bern, 1842. HAGENBACH.

SUMMERFIELD, John, Methodist-Episcopal; b. in Preston, Eng., Jan. 31, 1798; d. in New-York City, June 13, 1825. He was the son of a Wesleyan local preacher, but educated at the Moravian Academy at Fairfield, near Manchester; was sent into business at Liverpool; removed to Dublin, 1813; was converted in 1817, and next year became a local Wesleyan minister. In 1819 he was received on trial in the Methodist Conference of Ireland, and in March, 1821, having emigrated to America, in the New-York Conference. He leaped into astonishing popularity by reason of his eloquence. In 1822 he preached in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, everywhere listened to by great crowds; but in June of that year his health gave way. He spent the winter of 1822-23 in France; returned to New York, April 19, 1824, but was not able again to do full work. He was a founder of the American Tract Society. He published only one sermon; but in 1812, at New York, many of his Sermons and Sketches of Sermons were published. His life was written by JOHN HOLLAND, New York, 1829, 2d ed., 1830, and WILLIAM M. WILLETTE, Philadelphia, 1857.

SUMMERS, Thomas Osmond, D.D., LL.D., an eminent Methodist minister, professor of systematic theology in Vanderbilt University, and general book editor of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South; b. near Corfe Castle, Isle of Purbeck, Dorsetshire, Eng., Oct. 11, 1812; d. at Nashville, Tenn., May 5, 1882. His parents, James and Sarah Summers, died when he was quite young, leaving him to the foster care of a grand-aunt. While yet a youth he came to America, and settled in Baltimore. His parents being independents, his early religious training and reading were Calvinistic. Not being satisfied with the teachings of that system, and knowing no other, he was fast drifting, as he writes, into scepticism and infidelity, when some one to whom he communicated his state of mind gave him a copy of Adam Clarke's Commentary on Romans. This he read with eagerness and intense interest, and became from that time strongly Arminian in his religious belief. Visiting about this time, out of curiosity, a Methodist camp-meeting near the city of Baltimore, he was happily and soundly converted to God, experiencing most sensibly a change of heart. Ever after that, he was a strong believer in and advocate for experimental religion. He began at once to prepare for the ministry, and was "admitted on trial" into the Baltimore Conference in March, 1835; was ordained deacon by Bishop Hedding in 1837, and elder by Bishop Andrew in 1839. In 1840 he was sent as a missionary to Texas, where he remained three years. He was then transferred to the Alabama Conference, of which he continued to be a member until his death, though he remained in that State only three years: during these three years he was stationed, in turn, at Tuscaloosa, Livingstone, and Mobile. He was secretary of the Louisville Convention in 1845, at which the Methodist-Episcopal Church South was organized. In 1846 he was appointed by the General Conference to assist the late Bi-hop (then Dr.) Wightman as editor of the Southern Christian Advocate, published at Charleston, S.C. While here, he started, and edited for four years, the Sunday-School Visitor. At the organization of the Southern Church he was elected general book editor, which office he continued to fill with eminent ability and with great acceptability till his death. In this capacity he edited over three hundred volumes. In 1855 he moved to Nashville, Tenn., where the publishing-house was located, and where he continued to reside until he died. He was chairman of the committee that compiled the hymn-book, which he edited. He was considered an authority in hymnology, having devoted much time to its study. He was for many years editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate, and of the Quarterly Review of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South. At the organization of Vanderbilt University he was elected professor of systematic theology; which position he retained until he died, being also dean of the theological faculty. He died, after only two days' illness, during the quadrennial session, in Nashville, of the General Conference, where for the tenth consecutive time he had been elected and was acting as secretary. Surrounded by his brethren and colleagues, he died, as he had wished, at the post of duty, in the midst of his labors, ceasing at once to work and live. Possessed of encyclopedic knowledge, always abreast of the times, thoroughly Wesleyan and Arminian in his creed, but in hearty sympathy with all evangelical denominations of Christians, simple as a child in faith, consecrated, earnest, outspoken, an uncompromising enemy of sin and error in whatever form, he was an ornament to Christianity and an honor to the church of his choice.

Dr. Summers is the author of the following works: Commentary on the Gospels, Acts, and Romans, in 6 vols.; Commentary on the Ritual of the Methodist-Episcopal Church South; Christian Holiness; Baptism; Golden Censer; The Sunday-School Teacher, or the Catechetical Office of the Church; Seasons, Months, and Days; Talks Pleasant and Profitable; Refutation of the Theological Works of Paine; Way of Salvation; and some twenty other books and pamphlets on various doctrinal and practical subjects. SUMNER, John Bird, D.D., b. at Kenilworth, Warwickshire, 1780; educated at Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship; assistant master at Eaton, rector of Maple Durham, 1820-28; canon of Durham, 1820; bishop of Chester, 1828; archbishop of Canterbury, 1848; d. in London, Sept. 6, 1862. He was the leader of the "evangelical party" in the Church of England, and earnestly opposed to Romanism and the Oxford movement. His primacy covered the restoration of "Catholic hierarchy" to England, the "Essays and Reviews" controversy, and the revival of the synodical power of the convocations. His publications include Apostolic Preaching, considered in an Examination of St. Paul's Epistles, London, 1815, 9th ed., 1850; Records of the Creation, 1816, 2 vols., 7th ed., 1850; Evidence of Christianity, 1824, 9th ed., 1861; Practical Exposition [of the New Testament], 1833-51, 9 vols.

SUN, Worship of the. The common Hebrew name for sun is shemesh; but in poetry chammah and cheres are used. In Gen. i. 16 the sun is called the greater light, and is to serve, in conjunction with the moon, "to rule the day" (Gen. i. 14; Ps. cxxxvi. 8; Jer. xxxi. 35) and the year; i.e., the solar year. The sun has not only been once created by God (Ps. lxxiv. 16; Gen. i.), but is always under his command. In the end of the earth he hath set a tabernacle for the sun (Ps. xix. 4; Hab. iii. 11); from thence he appoints his way (Ps. civ. 19), or "commandeth, and it riseth not" (Job ix. 7), and at his command the sun stands still (Josh. x. 12; 2 Kings xx. 11). He, and not the sun, is the God Sabaoth: before his glory the sun is no more light (Isa. lx. 19; Job xxv. 5). This is especially the case before the judgment of God (Job ii. 10, 31, iii. 15; Isa. xliii. 10, xxiv. 23). As the sun was called into existence, there will also be once a time when it shall shine no more (Matt. xxiv. 29; Luke xxiii. 45; Rev. vi. 12, viii. 12, ix. 2, xxi. 23, xxii. 5). But the same God will make the light of the sun sevenfold (Isa. xxx. 26). The sun is also spoken of in scripture in a figurative sense. Thus the sun is used to express the image of the ruler (2 Sam. xxiii. 4), especially of his lasting government (Ps. lxxxix. 36, 37). The glory of the righteous is compared to the sun (Judg. v. 31), also the divine protection (Ps. lxxxiv. 11; Isa. lx. 20). The benefit, glory, and purity of righteousness is called the "Sun of righteousness" (Mal. iv. 2). Like brightness, the salvation of Zion and Jerusalem goes forth (Isa. lxii. 1). The sun is also the image of moral purity (Cant. vi. 10). Thus we read (Matt. xiii. 43) that "the righteous shall shine forth as the sun." But the sun is also the image of destruction (Ps. cxxi. 6; Job xxx. 2, xlix. 10; Rev. vii. 16). Even poetical personifications are found in the Bible. Thus, when the sun praises God (Ps. civ. 19, cxlviii. 3; Job xv. 15, xxv. 5, xxxviii. 7), or when the sun comes out of his chamber like a bridegroom, "and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race" (Ps. xix. 5). But there will be a time when the sun shall be "ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously" (Isa. xxiv. 23).

Worship of the Sun among the Israelites. — To worship the sun was expressly forbidden (Deut. xvii. 3). This worship, which commenced during the Assyrian period, was abolished by Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 5, 11; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 4). It consisted in burning incense on the house-tops, in dedication of chariots and horses to the sun (Jer. xix. 13; Zeph. i. 5), in adorations directed towards the rising sun (Ezek. viii. 16), in lamentations of the women for Tammuz (Ezek. viii. 14).

Worship of the Sun among the Adjacent Heathen Nations. — The worship of the sun as the most prominent and powerful agent in the kingdom of nature was widely diffused throughout the countries adjacent to Palestine. This worship was either direct, without the intervention of any statue or symbol, or indirect. Among the Egyptians the sun was worshipped under the title of Ra. The chief seat was On (sun, light), the Greek, Heliopolis, and Hebrew, Beth-sheanesh, [i.e., the house of the sun] (Jer. xliii. 13). To the temple at On belonged very many learned priests, one of whom became the father-in-law of Joseph (Gen. xli. 45). In an indirect manner the sun was worshipped as Amun-ra, "the king of all the gods," and which belonged to the first order of gods. To the second belonged Khunsu-Hercules, the god of the pillars of the sun. The sun-god of the third order was Osiris. Among the Phonicians the sun was worshipped under the title of Baal. At Tyre, Gaza, and Carthage, human sacrifices were offered to him. Among the Chaldeans the sun was worshipped under the title of Tammuz; and that the Arabians worshipped the sun we know from Theophrastus (De plant., 9, 4, 5) and Strabo (16, 784). Still more propagated was the worship of the sun among the Syrians (Arameans). Famous temples were at Heliopolis, Emesa, Palmyra, Hierapolis. Sun-worship there was very old, and direct from the beginning; and even in later times, sun and moon were worshipped at Hierapolis without the intervention of any image (Lucian: De Dea Syria, cap. 34, p. 904). Among the pure Semites, or Argans, direct worship to the sun was paid from the beginning, and still later. Thus among the Assyrians, and afterwards among the Persians, whose sun-worship is one and the same. The idolatrous sun-worship of the Israelites, which since the time of Ahaz is mentioned in connection with the worship of the moon and stars, first originated from the Assyrians. The dedication of chariots and horses to the sun (2 Kings xxiii. 11) we also find among the Persians (Herod., i. 189; Xenoph., Cyrop., 8, 3, 6; Quint. Curtius, 3, 3). Besides that the Persians offered to the sun (Herod., i. 31), they also directed their adoration towards the rising sun with branches in their hands (Zend Avesta, ii. 204; Herod., iv. 15, 1; HYDE: De relig. Persarum, 350). Up to this day the Parsees worship the sun. The Manichæans also adopted the sun-worship from the Persians, referring it, however, to Christ (DUPUIS: Orig. de cultes, v. 244, vi. 267). In later times the sun was worshipped among the Persians under the form of Mithras, which finally became the Sol Deus invictus throughout the West, especially through the Romans.

The Sun in the Christian Church and Art. — The Mithras-worship even exercised its influence upon the fixing of the Christian Christmas-festival in December. As the new birth of the sun-god was celebrated at the end of December, so, likewise, in Christ the new sun in the field of spiritual life was adored. Many Christian writers of older times speak of Christ as the sun of eternal salvation, to which the visible sun, with moon and stars, form the chorus (CREUZER: Symbolik, ii. 221, iv. 456 [1st ed.]). SUNDAY (Dies solis, of the Roman calendar, "day of the sun," because dedicated to the sun), the first day of the week, was adopted by the early Christians as a day of worship. The "sun" of Latin adoration they interpreted as the "Sun of righteousness." Sunday was emphatically the weekly feast of the resurrection of Christ, as the Jewish sabbath was the feast of the creation. It was called the "Lord's Day," and upon it the primitive church assembled to break bread (Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2). No regulations for its observance are laid down in the New Testament, nor, indeed, is its observance even enjoined; yet Christian feeling led to the universal adoption of the day, in imitation of apostolic precedent. In the second century its observance was universal. See Barnabas, c. 15; Ignatius, Epistola ad Magnes, c. 8, 9; Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 67; Irenæus, Adv. Har. iv. 16; also Pliny, Ep. x. 97. The Lord's Day was not a continuation of the Jewish sabbath, which was also at first observed, but a substitute for it. So long as the Christians were oppressed, they could not keep the day as one of rest from labor as they desired, and as they did after the union of Church and State. (The Jewish Christians ceased to observe the sabbath after the destruction of Jerusalem.) The Ebionites and Nazarenes kept up the habit even longer; and even to this day the Eastern Church shows traces of its observance by omitting fasting on Saturday, and enjoining standing in prayer. In the Latin Church, Saturday was a fast day, but Sunday was not; and the primitive habit of standing in prayer upon that day was abandoned. The Lord's Day was a time of public worship, with its attendant administration of the Eucharist. Experience abundantly demonstrates the wisdom of such weekly rest, and the blessedness of such a day of worship.

SUNDAY LEGISLATION. The institution of a weekly religious rest-day has existed, and its observance has been the subject of legislation, from very early times. Traces of such laws are found among the remains of Chaldaean antiquity. The Assyrians had laws for the observance of their sabbath similar to those by which the sabbath was maintained among the Jews. Civil legislation in behalf of the observance of Sunday, as distinguished from ecclesiastical or purely religious ordinances, commenced with the famous statute of Constantine (321): "On the venerable day of the sun let all magistrates and people residing in the cities rest, and let all workshops be closed. In the country, however, persons engaged in agriculture may freely and lawfully continue their labor, because it often happens that another day is not so suitable for grain-sowing or for vine-planting, lest, by neglecting the proper moment for such operations, the bounty of Heaven be lost." Constantine subsequently prohibited lawsuits on Sunday, while expressly permitting such legal acts as the manumission of slaves and the visitation of prisoners. Theodosius the Great (386) prohibited the transaction of business on Sunday, as well as the shows or spectacles which had become customary on that day among the heathen Romans; to which succeeding emperors soon added the various other games and entertainments of the theatre and circus. The laws of Leo and Anthemius (469) provide that "the Lord's Day be exempt from all compulsory process; let no summons urge any man; let no one be required to give security for the payment of a fund held by him in trust; let the sergeants of the courts be silent; let the pleader cease his labors; let that day be a stranger to trials; be the crier's voice unheard; let the litigants have breathing-time and an interval of truce; let the rival disputants have an opportunity of meeting without fear, of comparing the arrangements made in their names, and arranging the terms of a compromise. If any officer of the courts, under pretence of public or private business, dares to despise these enactments, let his patrimony be forfeited."

These Roman laws are important as forming the basis of the English legislation on this subject, and consequently of the American Sunday laws.

The Lord's Day was embodied in the capitularies, or general statutes, of the Frank emperors; and its observance, as prescribed by canonical authority, was enforced by severe penalties. During the French Revolution of the last century, when the Christian calendar was abolished, and the decade substituted for the week, each tenth day was made a rest-day, and its observance enforced by laws (17 Thermidor, An. vi.) which required the public offices, schools, workshops, stores, etc., to be closed, and prohibited sales except of food and medicine, and public labor except in the country during seed-time and harvest. On the restoration of the Gregorian calendar, Sunday was recognized in the Code Napoleon. A law of 1814 prohibited traffic, ordinary labor, etc., on Sundays and certain church festivals. In 1880 this law was repealed; a provision for the suspension of certain civil and judicial functions on Sunday, and in regard to the employment on that day of young children and minor girls in factories, alone remaining.

In England, Sunday laws have existed from a very early date. Ina, king of the West Saxons (about 693), forbade servile work on Sunday. Alfred (876) prohibited work, traffic, and legal proceedings. His example was followed in subsequent reigns. Edgar (958) prohibited "heathenish songs and diabolical sports," and markets and county courts, and made Sunday to begin at three o'clock on Saturday afternoon, and to last "till Monday morning light." The laws of Canute (1028-35) strongly insisted on the observance of the Lord's Day; prohibiting marketing, hunting, and the holding of the local courts, except in case of great necessity. After the Conquest, the tendency to greater strictness in the Sunday laws continued. The statute of 28 Edward III. (1354) forbade the showing of wools at the market-town. The 12 Richard II. (1388) forbade servants and laborers to play at tennis and other games, yet ordered them to have bows and arrows, and use the same on Sundays. The statute of 4 Edward IV. (1464) forbade cordwainers and cobblers to sell shoes on Sunday. Under Henry VI. the holding of fairs and markets on Sunday was prohibited. The laws of 5 and 6 Edward VI., prohibiting "lawful bodily labor" on Sundays, allowed husbandmen, fishermen, and others to work in harvest, or at any other times when necessity required. This act was repealed under Queen Mary, but was formally revived under James I. Subsequently (1614) James I. issued The Book of Sports, allowing after divine service on Sundays certain games and recreations, but expressly refusing this liberty to "Papists and Puritans." The issuing of The Book of Sports created intense dissatisfaction, and it soon became a dead letter. Parliament, in the first year of Charles I., passed an act "for the strict observance of Sunday;" and another law of Parliament in 1627 (3 Car. i.) enacted that no carriers, or wagon-men, or drovers should travel on Sunday. In 1633 Charles I., under the supposed influence of Laud, re-issued his father's Book of Sports.

The statute of 29 Charles II. (1676) is the most important of the English laws on this subject, as that which, with some modifications, is still the law of the land, and which, as being in force at the time of the American Revolution, gave more or less color to the laws of the American Colonies and States. It prohibits on Sunday all worldly labor or business except works of necessity or charity, the public sale of goods, the travelling of drovers, wagoners, etc., the service of any legal process except in case of treason, felony, or breach of peace; but it permits the dressing of meats in families, and its sale in inns and eating-shops, and the crying of milk before nine A.M., and after four P.M.

The early American colonists brought with them the observance of Sunday both as a religious and as a civil institution, and enforced this observance by law. The early laws of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Georgia, South Carolina, and Virginia, required attendance at church. The Massachusetts law (1782) provided that such attendance was not required where there was no place of worship which the person could conscientiously attend. But, as the separation between Church and State became better understood, the Sunday laws were modified in conformity with this principle. The legislatures and courts have carefully distinguished between Sunday observance as a religious and as a civil institution, and enforce only the latter. The laws of the several States differ in minor details, but are alike in their main features. They forbid on Sunday common labor and traffic, except in cases of necessity and mercy, public and noisy amusements, and whatever is likely to disturb the quiet and good order of the day. They make Sunday a non-legal day, when legal processes may not be served, nor the courts and legislatures sit. In many of the States some exception is made in favor of those who observe the seventh day of the week. In Louisiana — which before its admission was under the Code Napoleon, and where alone, of all the States, the common law is not in force — Sunday is merely recognized by law as a public holiday. In many of the States there are also laws, with special penalties, against the selling of intoxicating drinks on Sundays and election-days. The Federal Constitution provides that Sunday shall not be reckoned in the ten days within which the President may return a bill; and the Federal laws relieve the cadets of the military and naval academies from their studies on Sunday; and in the excise statutes distilling on Sunday is prohibited under a fine of one thousand dollars.

The constitutionality of the Sunday laws has been frequently affirmed by the highest courts of the several States, upon such grounds as the following: the right of all classes, so far as practicable, to rest one day in seven; the right to undisturbed worship, on the day set apart for this purpose, by the great majority of the people; the decent respect which should be paid to the religious institutions of the people; the value to the State itself of the Sunday observance, as a means of that public intelligence and morality on which free institutions are conditioned.

The spirit of modern Sunday laws is protection, not coercion. The need of civil intervention, especially to secure to the working-classes the seventh-day rest, becomes more and more imperative with the growth of industries and of the desire for rapid wealth. In evidence of this may be mentioned the petition, hitherto ineffectual, of working-men in Germany, for the help of legislation in obtaining a weekly rest-day. The Social-labor party of Germany, at their meeting at Gotha in 1875, announced as one of their demands in the present exigencies of society the prohibition of Sunday work.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS. A Sunday school is an assembly of persons on the Lord's Day for the study of the Bible, moral and religious instruction, and the worship of the true God. It is a method of training the young and the ignorant in the duties we owe to God and to our neighbor. As the family and the church are institutions of divine appointment, so the Sunday school has been approved by divine blessings.

1. BIBLICAL AUTHORITY AND FORM. — Godly instruction of the young and the ignorant has been in harmony with the divine government from the earliest history of the race. Although the word "school" does not occur in the Bible previous to the Babylonian captivity, instruction after the school methods was clearly known and practised from very early times; and not long after the captivity, no less than eleven different expressions for "school" were current in the Hebrew speech. Glimpses of the essential features of the school method appear in the early eras of biblical history. In patriarchal times the school, like the church, was in the family: the father was the teacher and the priest. Omitting a notice of the faithful religious instruction of the young by Abraham, Job, Jacob, Moses, and other patriarchs, and passing over the public training of children indicated by the passover service, by the reading of the law from Gerizim and Ebal in Joshua's time, and by the so-called schools of the prophets in the days from Samuel to Elijah, as well as the royal commission sent out by Jehoshaphat to re-establish religious instruction, and a similar movement in the time of Josiah, it will be sufficient here to notice simply the Bible school into which Ezra gathered the people with the children, requiring the priests as teachers to explain the meaning of the law of God, not unlike the instruction in the modern Sunday school (Neh. viii. 7, 8). See EDUCATION AMONG THE HEBREWS.

In the New-Testament period, religious schools connected with the synagogue were found in every city and considerable village in the land. These schools were one branch of an extended system of religious instruction. Lightfoot finds four kinds of schools and teaching among the Jews: (1) The elementary school; (2) The teaching of the synagogue; (3) The higher schools, as of Hillel and Shammai; and (4) The Sanhedrin, or great school, as well as great judicatory, of the nation. Some have questioned the prevalence of the elementary schools in the time of Christ's childhood; but, according to the Talmud, synagogue schools were of earlier origin, and had become common. They used the Hebrew scriptures, and, later, little parchment rolls prepared for children. The Mishna says, "At five years of age let children begin the Scripture, at ten the Mishna, and at thirteen let them be subjects of the law." In this period a synagogue presupposed a school, as with us a church implies a Sunday school. Hence the church and Sunday school, not the church and the district school, is a parallel to the Jewish system. The methods in these schools were not unlike those of the modern Sunday school. Questions were freely asked and answered, and opinions stated and discussed; any one entering them might ask or answer questions. Such a Jewish Bible school, no doubt, Jesus entered in the temple when twelve years old. Paul was "brought up at the feet of Gamaliel," a phrase which implies the customary posture of Jewish students at a school. The apostolic age was remarkable for the growth of these schools. Every town having ten men giving themselves to divine things was to have a synagogue; and every place having twenty-five boys, or according to Maimonides one hundred and twenty-five families, was compelled to appoint a teacher, and for forty or fifty boys two teachers. In the apostolic period teachers were a recognized body of workers quite distinct from pastors, prophets, and evangelists (see 1 Cor. xii. 28, 29; Eph. iv. 11; Heb. v. 12, etc.). The best commentators hold that the peculiar work of teachers in the primitive church was to instruct the young and ignorant in religious truth, which is precisely the object of the Sunday school. See SYNAGOGUES.

2. EARLY CHRISTIAN CATECHETICAL SCHOOLS. — These schools were a continuation and improvement of the Jewish synagogue schools. Mosheim and others place their wide prevalence as early as in the first century, Neander at a later date. These catechetical classes and schools were intended to prepare neophytes, or new converts, for church-membership, and were also used to instruct the young and the ignorant in the knowledge of God and salvation. They were effective, aggressive missionary agencies in the early Christian churches, and have aptly been termed the "Sunday schools of the first ages of Christianity." The pupils were divided into two or three (some say four) classes, according to their proficiency. They memorized passages of Scripture, learned the doctrines of God, creation, providence, sacred history, the fall, the incarnation, resurrection, and future rewards and punishments. Their books comprised parts of the Bible in verse, Jewish antiquities, sacred poems, and dialogues. The Sixth General Council at Constantinople (A.D. 680) required presbyters in country towns and villages to hold schools to teach all such children as were sent to them, taking no reward nor any thing therefor, except the parents made them a voluntary present. The Second Council at Chalons likewise required bishops to set up schools giving instruction in the Scriptures. In view of the missionary aim, and the graded and comprehensive instruction of these schools, it might be an interesting problem for a modern scholar to define important features of the present system not to be found in these primitive Bible schools. See CATECHETICS.

3. SUNDAY SCHOOLS OF THE REFORMATION PERIOD. — Luther founded regular catechetical instruction on Sundays as early as 1529, and this custom spread wherever the Reformation gained a foothold. Charles Borromeo, Archbishop of Milan, had a system of schools 1560-84, almost identical in form with the present Sunday school. Children were gathered in two grand divisions, — boys and girls, subdivided into smaller groups or classes, with a minister for each class, aided by a layman for boys and a matron for girls. These schools were introduced into all the churches of his diocese, and are continued on much the same plan now, but without the Bible. The labors of Spener, Francke, Zinzendorf, and the English Reformers, further prepared the way for the modern Sunday-school system. Legions of persons and places claim to have had Sunday schools previous to those in Gloucester. Among the many worthy of recognition, only the few following can be noted. Sunday schools were founded in Scotland about 1560, by John Knox; in Bath, Eng., 1650-68, by Joseph Alleine, author of "Alleine's Alarm;" in Roxbury, Mass., 1674; Plymouth, Mass., 1680; in England, by Bishop Frampton, about 1693; in Glasgow, Scotland, about 1707; in Bethlehem, Conn., 1740, by Dr. Joseph Bellamy; in Ephrata, Penn., 1739-40, by Ludwig Häcker, a school continuing for thirty years with gratuitous instruction, children's meetings, and having many revivals; at Brechin, Scotland, 1760, by Mr. Blair; at Catterick, 1763, by Rev. Theophilus Lindsey; at Bedale, Eng., 1765, by Miss Harrison; at Waldbach, 1767, by Oberlin; at High Wycombe, 1769, by Hannah Ball; at Bright Parish, County Down, Ireland, 1770-78, by Dr. Kennedy; in Bohemia, 1773, by Kindermann; at Bolton, Eng., 1775, by James Heyes; at Macclesfield, Eng., by Rev. David Simpson, 1778.

4. MODERN SUNDAY SCHOOLS. — Sunday schools like those just noted were sporadic; there was need for a popular and general movement, bringing them into affiliation with each other, if not into an organized system. Of this great movement, Robert Raikes is justly regarded as the founder. He was a citizen of Gloucester, Eng., and proprietor of the Gloucester Journal. Business calling him into the suburbs of that city in 1780, where many youth were employed in the pin and other factories, his heart was touched by the groups of ragged, wretched, and cursing children. He engaged four female teachers to receive and instruct in reading and in the Catechism such children as should be sent to them on Sunday. The children were required to come with clean hands and faces, and hair combed, and with such clothing as they had. They were to stay from ten to twelve, then to go home; to return at one, and after a lesson to be conducted to church; after church to repeat portions of the Catechism; to go home at five quietly, without playing in the streets. Diligent scholars received rewards of Bibles, Testaments, books, combs, shoes, and clothing: the teachers were paid a shilling a day. Raikes published a brief notice of his efforts in the Gloucester Journal, Nov. 3, 1783 (copied into the London papers), and, later, another notice in the Gentleman's Magazine of London, which attracted wide attention. William Fox, already interested in the improvement of the moral condition of London youth, saw the notice, opened a correspondence with Raikes, urged the plan at public meetings, and with the aid of Jonas Hanway, Henry Thornton, and other philanthropists, formed the Society for Promoting Sunday Schools throughout the British Dominions, Sept. 7, 1785. From 1785 to 1800 the society expended about four thousand pounds for teachers' wages. The scheme commended itself to popular esteem. Learned laymen and influential persons became its warm friends. Among them were Mr. (afterwards Bishop) Horne, Bishop Porteus, the Bishops of Salisbury and Llandaff, Rev. Thomas Scott, the poet Cowper, Adam Smith, the Wesleys, and Whitefield. It, however, met with determined opposition from professors of religion, who questioned its usefulness. The then Bishop of Rochester violently attacked the movement, and the Archbishop of Canterbury called the bishops together to see what could be done to stop it. In Scotland, sabbath-school teaching by laymen was declared to be an innovation, and a breach of the Fourth Commandment. Sunday schools continued to multiply, however, in face of opposition, rapidly extending throughout England, Scotland, Ireland, upon the Continent, and in America. Though the Gloucester schools founded by Raikes died out in a few years, they were soon followed by others instituted on an improved plan. Following a meeting at Philadelphia, Dec. 19, 1790, attended by Bishop White, Dr. Rush, Matthew Carey, and other philanthropists, the First-Day or Sunday-school Society, was formed Jan. 11, 1791, to give religious instruction to poor children on Sunday. Like the British society, it employed paid teachers. It spent about four thousand dollars in support of schools between 1791 and 1800. As early as 1791 it urged the Legislature of Pennsylvania to establish free schools. This society still continues its usefulness, granting to needy schools in Philadelphia books and other religious publications. It has expended in these donations about thirty-five thousand dollars.

The schools of Raikes, and those of the British society and the First-Day Society of Philadelphia, employed paid teachers. Their chief aim was to reach, not the children of church-members, but of the poor and of those who neglected the church. The schools they established were purely mission Sunday schools. But paid teachers made the system expensive, and necessarily limited its usefulness. Next to founding these schools, the most important step was the securing of instruction by unpaid teachers. Sir Charles Reed says that Oldham, Eng., claims to have had the first Sunday-school teacher who declined to receive pay, and began the gratuitous instruction. John Wesley in 1787 speaks of Sunday schools at Bolton, Eng., "having eighty masters who received no pay but what they received from the great Master." In the famous Stockport Sunday school in 1791, only six of its thirty teachers were paid. In 1790 the Methodist Conference at Charleston, S.C., directed preachers to form Sunday schools for whites and blacks, with voluntary teachers. A Sunday school for Indian children was opened in Stockbridge, N.Y., in 1792, by a sister of Occum, the noted Indian preacher. The children working in a cotton-factory in Passaic County, N.J., were given gratuitous instruction in a Sunday school in 1794; and Samuel Slater had a similar one for his factory-operatives in Pawtucket, R.I., 1797. W. B. Gurney introduced gratuitous instruction into several Sunday schools in London, Eng., about 1796. He also used questions on Scripture-texts, and teachers' meetings, and, with the co-operation of Rev. Rowland Hill and others, formed the London Sunday-school Union at Surrey Chapel, July 13, 1803, to promote Sunday schools having unpaid teachers. A similar meeting at the same place in 1799 had founded the Religious Tract Society of London, which early provided literature for Sunday schools. Gratuitous instruction speedily became a popular feature in the scheme, and in a short time was generally substituted for the earlier plan of paid teachers. Though the growth of the system had been remarkable before, so that, within five years after the beginning by Raikes, it was estimated that 250,000 scholars were enrolled in the schools then established, yet this new feature of voluntary teachers gave it a fresh impetus by adapting it to the needs of the poorest community in city or country. In America the movement was promoted by the visit of Mrs. Graham and Mrs. Bethune to England, who founded schools in New York on their return in 1803, and by the visit to Philadelphia of the Rev. Robert May, a missionary from London, in 1811, who had specimens of reward-tickets, and urged improved methods in a letter to the Evangelical Society of Philadelphia. As a further illustration of the rapid growth of Sunday schools, the American Sunday-school Union estimated that in 1827 the number of scholars enrolled in the Sunday schools of the different countries was 1,350,000. According to the census of 1851 the number attending Sunday schools in England and Wales was 2,407,612; in Scotland, 292,549. The number reported for Ireland in the returns of the Sunday-school Society, and by other authorities, was 272,112; making the total for 1851 in Great Britain and Ireland, including the British Isles, 2,987,980. The total estimated number of schools for England, Wales, and Ireland, for the same year, was 27,048, and of teachers, 325,450. The number of Sunday-school scholars in America at the same period was estimated at about 3,000,000. In 1861 62 the number of Sunday schools in Ireland was 3,235, teachers 25,552, scholars 278,990; while a competent authority estimated the number under catechetical instruction in Roman-Catholic parishes in Ireland at 800,000. In 1862 J. Inglis estimated the Sunday schools in Scotland had 40,000 teachers and 450,000 scholars. A competent Welsh authority in the same year states that 26 $\frac{1}{6}$  per cent of its population were in Sunday school, which would give a membership for Wales of about 295,000; and W. H. Watson of London claimed that there were nearly 300,000 teachers and 3,000,000 scholars in the Sunday schools "of our land." The report of the International Convention in 1881 gave in the United States \$1,730 Sunday schools, 932,283 teachers, 6,820,835 scholars, and, including the British and American Provinces, 90,370 schools, 975,195 teachers, and 7,177,165 scholars. The number reported at the Raikes centenary in 1880 for England and Wales was 422,222 teachers and 3,800,000 scholars, and, for the world, 1,559,823 teachers and 13,063,523 scholars. These statistics were gathered by voluntary organizations, and, though not giving satisfaction as to accuracy and completeness, are the best issued. (See statistics at end of this article.) A government census of Sunday schools was commenced in the United States in 1880, but is not yet completed. A tentative compilation of its reports shows upwards of 91,000 schools in this country.

Nor do numbers alone indicate the immense growth of Sunday schools. The great improvement in the modes of instruction, which will be treated in another paragraph; the beautiful and costly buildings, the ample, airy rooms with glass partitions, carpeted floors, fountains, flowers, and cushioned seats, for the accommodation of these schools in America, as compared with the dark and dingy apartments first provided; the wide enlistment of the ablest talent in the country in teaching, and also in providing lesson-helps and literature; the suitable grading of instruction; the substantial settlement of the right principles of religious education; the clear definition of the place of the Sunday school, not as a thing separate and apart from the church, but as all Christians at work teaching or learning the Lord's message to his church; the remarkable and constant influence this widespread instruction has had in lessening vice and crime, in diffusing a zeal for biblical study, in imparting greater familiarity to its one great text-book, the Bible,—each and all of these are forcible illustrations of the wonderful growth of this Christian institution in modern times.

Foreign Societies.—It is impossible, in this brief space to notice the many Sunday-school societies and organizations which have been formed to promote this cause. A brief description of some of the earlier and more important societies will illustrate the work conducted by all. The London Sunday-School Union—which was formed in 1803, for the improvement of teachers, the extension of Sunday schools, and to supply them with suitable literature at reduced prices—is sustained by members of different evangelical denominations, and conducted by a general committee of fifty-four, divided into various sub-committees. The members of the committee render their services gratuitously. It did not in its early history employ missionaries, but aimed to accomplish its object through the formation of local unions in Great Britain, more particularly in England, and also through affiliated schools. Influenced by the example of the American Sunday-school Union, it employed a missionary in the north of England for some years, but at his death, in 1837, discontinued the effort in England. For the last fifteen or twenty years it has aided in supporting missionaries on the Continent for the establishment of Sunday schools in the various countries of Europe, and has expended in this Continental Mission nearly a thousand pounds annually for the past few years. Its chief work for eighty years has been the improvement of schools, the publication and distribution of juvenile religious literature, and the collection of Sunday-school statistics. It has on its catalogue a large number of books and publications, which it furnishes to schools connected with the society, in special cases, at from one-half to one-third regular prices. The amount of its grants for 1883 was £2,971: its affiliated schools numbered 5,286, having 123,599 teachers and 1,182,199 scholars. Over 16,000 scholars from its schools united with churches in 1883. In London 88 per cent, and in the country 81 per cent, of teachers were church-members; and 88 per cent of the teachers were former scholars in the schools. It maintains a circulating library, a museum, a reading-room, Hebrew and Greek classes, teachers' meetings, normal classes, and competitive examinations for teachers and scholars.

A sabbath-school society was formed in Edinburgh in 1797, and one for the support of Gaelic schools to teach the Scriptures, in 1811. These employed paid teachers; later, voluntary teachers were introduced. The labors of Stowe and James Gall brought important improvements in the modes of instruction. The formation of various local sabbath-school unions at Edinburgh and Glasgow, the adoption of schools in the churches, holding conventions, employing missionaries, and the adoption of juvenile services, mark the progress of the work in Scotland. The Sunday-school Society for Ireland was formed in 1809. Among its publications, Hints on Conducting Sunday Schools had a wide sale, and was reprinted in America. The Church of England Sunday-school Institute began training classes and institutes for Sunday-school teachers in 1844; and still sustains one of the best Sunday-school magazines issued. In 1881 it had returns from 8,405 parishes, representing 16,498 Sunday schools, 113,412 teachers, and 1,289,273 scholars. Estimating the same average membership for the 6,064 parishes not reporting, it computed the total number of scholars in England and Wales connected with the Church of England as about 2,220,000, and of teachers about 195,500. The Wesleyans of Great Britain formed a Sunday-school Union in 1874. The total number of Wesleyan Methodist Sunday schools in Great Britain and Ireland, according to their report for 1882, is 6,489; teachers and officers, 122,999; scholars, 829,666; library books, 781,176. The various Ragged School societies are efficient in promoting the cause in their respective fields. On the Continent, the Dutch, French, German, Swiss, and Italian Sunday-school societies are growing in importance and usefulness. In those countries the organization of schools on the American or class system of instruction was largely due to the efforts of Albert Woodruff of New York, about 1864, and, later, of the several missionaries of the London Union.

American Societies.—The First-Day or Sunday-school Society of Philadelphia, formed in 1791, has been noticed. As early as 1808 the Evangelical Society was formed for promoting sabbath-evening schools in Philadelphia with voluntary teachers. The New-York Female Sunday-school Union and the New-York Male Sunday-school Union were formed in 1816, at the suggestion of Eleazar Lord, who had observed the working of the Sunday school system in Philadelphia. The Sunday and Adult School Union in Philadelphia was formed in 1817, to unite all the Sunday and adult associations in that city and vicinity. In 1821 it employed a missionary, who organized upward of sixty schools. It also issued a large number of Scripture tickets, cards, tracts, and small reward-books. After seven years of marked efficiency and usefulness, it, with other similar unions, was merged in a national society, — the American Sunday-school Union, in 1821. The Adult Union was at that time the largest society of the kind in the country, having auxiliaries in all the States, with over 700 schools and 50,000 scholars. The object of the American Sunday-school Union, as stated at its formation, "is to concentrate the efforts of sabbath-school societies in different sections of our country, to strengthen the hands of friends of pious instruction on the Lord's Day, to disseminate useful information, to circulate moral and religious publications in every part of the land, and to endeavor to plant a Sunday school wherever there is a population." Twenty-one years later, when its charter was obtained, it states the object: "to establish and maintain Sunday schools, and to publish and circulate moral and religious publications." It is an undenominational society, conducted by representative laymen from different evangelical denominations; employs missionaries, lay and ministerial; and clergymen likewise co-operate in its work as editors, secretaries, and literary contributors. The first year it reported 321 auxiliaries, 1,150 affiliated schools, 11,295 teachers, 82,697 scholars; and it estimated the number of Sunday-school scholars in the world at over 1,000,000. Among the more important measures which have been inaugurated or promoted by this Union are the employment of missionaries to form Sunday schools; a world's concert of prayer (monthly) for Sunday schools, in 1825; a system of selected uniform lessons in 1826; the Mississippi Valley scheme for planting Sunday schools throughout that region in 1830; a teachers' magazine (monthly) in 1821, and a teacher's journal (weekly) in 1831; proposing a national Sunday-school convention in 1832; introducing a free circulating library for Sunday schools; a system of graded question-books; issuing cheap illustrated Sunday-school periodicals for children; providing suitable records and manuals for conducting and improving Sunday schools. Its missionary work is sustained by benevolent contributions; and the extent of it may be indicated by the report for the year ending March 1, 1883, showing 2,252 schools organized, with 10,376 teachers and 82,749 scholars. About 5,000 other schools were aided, with a membership of 162,000; 19,029 Bibles and Testaments were distributed, and 35,308 families visited for religious conference. Including $11,000 worth of publications given, it expended in the year's benevolent operations $99,049.51. During the fifty-nine years of its existence it reports over 74,000 Sunday schools organized, with 466,000 teachers, and upwards of 3,100,000 scholars in these schools; and has expended in missionary work $2,825,000, of which over $600,000 were given in books and papers to needy schools. It has circulated by sale and donation, publications to the value of about $7,500,000.

The Massachusetts Sunday-school Union was formed in 1825 of delegates from different denominations, but disbanded, and the Massachusetts Sabbath-school Society instituted in 1832, — a Congregational organization, which was consolidated with the Congregational Board of Publication in 1868. It employs secretaries and agents, and issues publications to promote Sunday schools among Congregational churches. The Sunday-school Union of the Methodist-Episcopal Church was formed in 1827, and re-organized in 1844, and has been very efficient in publishing and distributing literature through the preachers attached to its denomination. It does not employ Sunday-school missionaries. The Presbyterian and Baptist boards of publication have Sunday-school departments; they employ colportors, who promote the extension of Sunday schools in connection with their churches, and distribute denominational literature. The (Dutch) Reformed Sunday-school Union soon after 1850 was merged in that of its publishing society. The Protestant Episcopal Sunday-school Union, and the Evangelical Knowledge Society, provide a denominational juvenile literature for schools in that church. The Foreign Sunday-school Association of New York, formerly auxiliary to the American Sunday-School Union, was incorporated in 1878, and labors to promote Sunday schools in foreign lands, chiefly on the continent of Europe.

Conventions. — Early in this century local Sunday-school conventions were held, especially from 1820 to 1830, in many of the Eastern and Middle States. In 1832, at the suggestion of the American Sunday-school Union, a national convention was held in New York, comprising two hundred and twenty delegates from fourteen States and Territories out of the twenty-four States and four Territories then comprising the United States. A second delegated national convention was held in Philadelphia in 1833, at which full reports and papers were presented as arranged for by the previous convention in New York. The chief work accomplished by these early national meetings was to discover and agree on the principles of a system of religious education. That of 1833 also adopted the recommendation of the American Sunday-school Union, that a systematic and simultaneous canvass of the entire country be made, to obtain scholars, and enlist parents in this work, on the 4th of July following. It also approved of a Uniform Series of lessons already introduced. A third national convention was held in Philadelphia in 1859, "marking a revival of interest in Bible study, and in religious training of the young." A world's convention was held in London, Eng., in 1862, at which papers ably discussing the methods and progress of the cause were presented. The fourth national convention in America was held at Newark, N.J., in 1869, attended by five hundred and twenty-six delegates representing twenty-eight States and seven countries; the fifth, at Indianapolis in 1872, marked by the adoption of the present International Series of Uniform Lessons, and the appointment of a general statistical secretary; the first international (sixth national) convention, at Baltimore in 1875; the second international convention, at Atlanta in 1878; and the third international convention, at Toronto in 1881. Besides these, there have been State and local conventions in every part of the United States and Canada, which have given added impetus to the movement, and disseminated "useful knowledge in regard to the methods of conducting, and teaching in Sunday schools, and imparted more of unity to the cause. Upon the local conventions, which were very prevalent from 1860 to 1870, the "institute" has been widely ingrafted, — a modification of the convention, aiming to give instruction specially to teachers, rather than simply to create enthusiasm. The wide influence of conventions on the cause may be inferred from the statement that over five thousand were held in the United States in the year 1883. The "institute," exhibiting advanced methods of teaching and conducting Sunday schools, has also been popular since 1865. This form of meeting had likewise been adopted in England for many years previous to that date. Out of these institutes and conventions have come the "summer assemblies," among the most noted of which is that of Chautauqua, conducted by the Rev. J. H. Vincent, D.D., which has normal courses of study, lectures on teaching, a "literary and scientific circle" of about thirty-seven thousand members, and classes in Hebrew, Greek, and other languages.

Organization. — The modern Sunday school commonly has three departments, corresponding to three grades of instruction, — the primary or infant, the intermediate, and the advanced. In the intermediate grade the scholars are arranged in classes of from six to ten, with a teacher for each class; in the advanced grade the classes are somewhat larger. In the infant department, until recent years, it was usual to have only one or two teachers for the entire department, even when it consisted of from one hundred to two hundred pupils. The class system is being more widely introduced into the infant or primary grade of the best schools in America. The entire school is in the charge of a superintendent, with an assistant, a secretary, treasurer, and a librarian; the latter gives out the books from the circulating library in connection with the school, charging them to the teacher or scholar, and recording their return at each session. There are church and mission schools. Sunday schools are not intended to be a substitution for, but a supplement to, family and pulpit instruction. Schools in connection with a church are sustained and directed by the church. Mission schools are often established by Christians of different denominations in neglected portions of the country and of large cities. Sunday schools in the United States hold one session each sabbath; formerly many of them held two sessions. A few schools in the cities still hold two sessions, and this custom yet prevails widely in England.

Modes of Instruction and Literature. — The schools founded by Raikes were chiefly for the lower classes in the community, who were ignorant, and hence were taught the elementary branches of reading and writing, with oral instruction in the Catechism. Reading, and memorizing texts in the Bible, followed. Cramming the memory with large portions of Scripture and the Catechism seems to have been a hobby in Scotland, England, and America, for some time. Rev. J. Inglis states that children committed and repeated seven hundred texts every week, until limited to two hundred per week; and R. G. Pardee asserts, that, in the opinion of New-York physicians, it developed a brain-disease in children. James Gall, by his End and Essence of Sabbath-school Teaching and his Nature's Normal School, aimed to introduce a more sensible lesson system in Scotland, which was also used in some schools in America as early as 1820. Stowe's training system, giving prominence to pictorial methods of instruction, also aided in reforming this excessive use of the memory. The reform in America was completed by the introduction of the Uniform Limited Lessons, prepared in 1825, and adopted by the American Sunday-school Union and its three hundred or four hundred auxiliaries in 1826. This scheme contemplated a five-years' course of study for the whole Bible, — one and the same lesson for all, of from seven to fifteen verses, questions and comments in at least three grades, and reviews. It was national in its purpose. In 1829 Mr. Gall urged his lesson system upon teachers in England; and in 1830 regular lessons were furnished, with notes for the use of teachers. Following the wide use of the Uniform Series of Lessons of 1826 to 1832 and the Union Question-Books, in many American schools teachers "appealed to the imagination, and resorted to stories and anecdotes." In 1840 the London Sunday-school Union issued a List of Lessons for general adoption, adding lesson notes in 1842, which it claims to have continued uninterruptedly till the present time, now using the International Series. Mimpriess's Graduated Simultaneous Instruction for Sunday Schools, founded on the gospel history, and issued in 1844, was an attempt to have one lesson for the whole school; but it had only a limited use. In America, for a number of years previous to 1872, each school prepared its own scheme of lessons (if it used any), often unsatisfactory, inasmuch that this method has been not inaptly termed the "Babel series" of lessons. Schemes of lessons for Sunday schools, with notes, were issued in the Sunday-school Teacher of Chicago, in 1865; and in 1867 B. F. Jacobs suggested uniform lessons anew. The desire for such a series increased, until in 1871 a meeting of Sunday-school publishers was held in New York, at the suggestion of the executive committee of the National Sunday-school Convention, which agreed upon a tentative scheme of uniform lessons for 1872. At the Indianapolis convention in that year, a lesson committee was appointed to arrange a course of lessons for seven years, covering the whole Bible, and which was recommended for the use of Sunday schools throughout the country. This committee was re-appointed and enlarged in 1878, and empowered by the convention to select another seven-years' course of Bible-lessons for use throughout the world. In 1875 the lessons were reported to be in use in America, Great Britain, most of the countries of Europe, in Syria, Hindostan, India, and China, in Mexico, Australia, and the Sandwich Islands; and in 1878 it was added, "United Bible study has gained many new friends. Two large denominational publishing-houses which then (1875) stood aloof from us, are now with hearty accord standing with us." Comments on these lessons have multiplied like the leaves of the forest, publishers issuing notes, questions, and lesson-leaves, and even secular papers give regular weekly comments upon the Sunday-school lesson. The most learned pastors, professors in colleges and seminaries, have contributed the results of their ripest study and scholarship in exposition of these lessons; and Christian publishers vie with each other in securing the ablest scholarship, and producing the cheapest helps thereon. Different series of Sunday-school lessons are in use in most of the schools connected with the Church of England, and with the Protestant-Episcopal Church of the United States.

When the modern Sunday-school movement began, a century ago, juvenile religious literature did not exist. The Pilgrim's Progress, Watts's Divine and Moral Songs, a few catechisms and similar books, comprised the religious works specially prepared for children at that day. The earliest Catechism in the English language was issued in 1420: one by Cramer, in 1519; and a Short Catechism in Latin and English, in 1553; the Westminster Catechism, in 1647; and Watts's First and Second Catechisms, in 1729-30. Luther also issued his catechisms in 1529. The early books of instruction in Sunday schools in England and Ireland were chiefly spelling-books and reading-books having portions of Scripture. Later, texts of Scripture on small cards, called "red and blue tickets," were given out as rewards to scholars, and also small books. Sometimes, as a reward, the teacher or superintendent would loan books to a scholar to read. Gradually a juvenile religious literature was developed by the desire of Sunday scholars for reading, and the circulating library in connection with each school was introduced, owing largely to the earlier work and issues of the American Sunday-school Union. It is impossible to state the number of books, lesson-helps, and periodicals, now issued. Dr. John S. Hart in 1870 estimated the number of publishing-houses and religious societies engaged in issuing Sunday-school library books at not less than thirty-six, with a capital of $5,000,000; the whole number of current Sunday-school library books at 7,000, and that the rate of issue for several years had exceeded one a day, reaching 434 in 1868. The number of books, periodicals, and lesson-helps for Sunday schools, has vastly increased in the last decade by the introduction of the International lesson system and other improvements, and is so extensive that it would be hopeless to attempt to gather statistics respecting them. Among the representative journals especially devoted to Sunday schools, the foremost is The Sunday-school Times, in America, edited by H. Clay Trumbull, D.D.; The Sunday-school Chronicle, issued by the London Union; and the English Sunday-school Times, which are weekly journals. The Sunday-school Journal (Methodist), the Baptist Teacher, the Westminster Teacher, the Sunday-school World (Union), the Church Sunday-school Magazine of London, the Westegan Sunday-school Magazine, and the Sabbath-school Magazine of Glasgow, Scotland, are a few of the many helpful teachers' periodicals now issued.

EDWIN W. RICE.

(Editor of the American Sunday-school Union).

SUPEREROGATION. The doctrine of works of supererogation (opera supererogatoria) is based on the distinction between præcepta and consilia evangelica. The former it is the duty of every man to obey, but the fulfilment of the latter establishes a merit. The doctrine has never been an article of faith in the Roman-Catholic Church: the Council of Trent is silent upon the matter. But in the practice of the church it has played a most disastrous part as the true foundation of the doctrine of indulgences, which art. see.

SUPERSTITION. The derivation of the Latin term superstitio is doubtful. Cicero can hardly be right when he says (De nat. deor., ii. 28), Qui totos dies precabantur et immolabant, ut sui sibi liberi superstites essent, superstitiones esse appellatos. Lactantius is also wrong when he says (Inst. div., iv. 28) those are called superstitious who revere the memory the dead leave behind (superstitem), or who, having outlived their parents (parentibus superstites), worship them in their homes as penates. The Greek term δεισιδαιμον is used both for true as well as errant religious devotion. It occurs only in the latter sense in the New Testament (Acts xvii. 22, xxv. 19). [It may well be doubted whether this statement is correct. Paul would not offend and repel the Athenians by calling them "too superstitious;" but he rather compliments them for being "over-religious" in their groping after the "unknown God."]

<sup>1</sup> This table does not include Sunday and parish schools of the Roman-Catholic or the Greek Church, nor is it in all cases complete for Protestant Sunday schools. The statistics for the United States were compiled by E. Payson Porter, statistical secretary, International Convention; for England and Wales, by F. J. Hartley, statistical secretary, London Sunday-school Union; for Holland, by Edwin W. Rice, from Zondag-school-Aldmanak and reports of Free Reformed Church, 1883; for Germany and German Switzerland, by W. Brückelmann; and, for other countries, by prominent Sunday-school authorities and missionaries.

Superstition is always a false and erring faith. It is a misunderstanding of the bearing of supernatural forces upon the visible world, and of visible forces upon the supernatural world, and contradicts reason and revelation. Superstition always involves a supernatural element. It has often happened that men have combined great knowledge with superstition, which is also as much incident to unbelief as to an unreasoning belief. Voltaire, a man of much learning and of unbelief, was more than once deterred from following his inclinations by the fear which bad omens inspired. Robespierre, Napoleon, Josephine, and the Emperor Alexander, all alike consulted Marie Lenormand, [a French necromancer, who died June 25, 1813]. Our cultivated classes, who pride themselves upon their knowledge, have patronized spiritualistic sciences more frequently than the masses have.

Superstition has assumed as many forms as there have been false conceptions of the Deity, and its relation to the world. It has three phases when regarded as modifying the conception of the Deity. (1) It mixes up imperfect notions with true ones of God and his activity. From this point of view all non-Christian religions are superstitions. Fetichism is crass superstition. The dualistic systems of Asia are more intellectual, but no less superstitions. (2) Superstition has also represented fate as a force above or at the side of God. This idea is found almost everywhere in heathenism, as a monotheistic element in the midst of polytheism. (3) Superstition has also placed at the side of God supernatural beings, good and bad, who are regarded as more or less dependent upon him. Ghosts, elves, dragons, witches, etc., belong to this class.

Another class of superstitions is derived from man's faith that he possesses a certain magical power of influencing the Deity, fate, and the world of spirits. This is called magic, sorcery, witchcraft, etc. The belief in pilgrimages, the wonderful cures of Lourdes, the efficacy of the blood of St. Januarius, belong here. Days and signs are regarded as having a relation to fate. Friday is superstitiously held to be an unlucky day. The breaking of a glass, the falling of the bridal ring, the appearance of a comet, etc., are looked upon as unlucky omens. Sorcery is one of the products of the belief in fate.

Superstition is the product of an unregulated fancy, a deficiency of religious strength. It is immoral, and for that reason transforms Christian theism into polytheism, dualism, or spiritualism. It is the most dangerous despot of the human mind; asserting, as it does, full authority to override the laws of sound thought. It has led to great cruelties and enormities. We need only recall the trials of so-called witches. Superstition, however, is better than unbelief, although harder to cure. We agree with Jean Paul when he says, "I would rather be in the densest atmosphere of superstition than under the air-pump of unbelief. In the former case, one breathes with difficulty: in the latter, one is suffocated." RUD. HOFMANN.

SUPRALAPSARIANISM, a theory held by the strictest Calvinists, according to which God not only foresaw and permitted, but actually decreed, the fall of man, and overruled it for his redemption; it being supposed that nothing could happen independently of the divine will. It is logically the most consistent type of Calvinism, but borders on fatalism and pantheism, and hence was excluded from the Reformed Confessions, all of which deny emphatically that God is the author of sin. See INFRALAPSARIANISM and SUBLAPSARIANISM.

SUPRANATURALISM. See RATIONALISM, RELIGION, and REVELATION.

SURIUS, Laurentius, b. at Lübeck in 1522; d. at Cologne, May 23, 1578. He was educated in the Protestant faith, and studied at Frankfort-on-the-Oder and Cologne; but in the latter place he became acquainted with Canisius, embraced Romanism, and entered the Carthusian order in 1542. He was a prolific writer. In opposition to Sleidan's celebrated work on the Reformation, he wrote a Commentarius brevis, etc., 1566; but the performance is rather weak: he accuses the Reformers of having borrowed their doctrines from Mohammed. His best work is his Vita Sanctorum ab Aloysio Lipomanno olim conscripte, Cologne, 1570-76, 7 vols. fol. [often reprinted; e.g., Martius, vol. vi., 1877. "He was the first who used a sound criticism in narrating the lives of the saints."—Darling.] NEUDECKER.

SURPLICE (Latin, superpelliceum, "overgarment") is a loose white linen garment, a modification of the alb, dating back to the end of the twelfth century. It is worn by clergymen of the Church of England during celebration of service, as also by clergymen of the Danish, Norwegian, and Swedish churches, but by them only during celebration of the Lord's Supper.

SUSANNAH. See APOCRYPHA.

SUSO, Heinrich, b. at Constance, March 21, 1300; d. at Ulm, Jan. 25, 1365. He was educated in a Dominican monastery in his native city, studied theology at Cologne, and became an enthusiastic disciple of Eckart; but, having more imagination and sentiment than true speculative talent, he gave his mysticism quite a different form, and became the representative of the poetical mysticism of the middle ages. The idea never satisfied him until it assumed the form of personality, and became clothed with all loveliness and perfection. Thus arose before his eyes from the Solomonic writings the Eternal Wisdom, sometimes identified with Christ, and sometimes with the Virgin. In order to become the true servant of his ideal, he retired to the Dominican monastery where he was educated, devoted himself to a life of severe asceticism, and wrote his book, Von der ewigen Weisheit, 1338. In 1340 he began to preach, stopped for several years in the monastery of Winterthur, and, later on, in a monastery in Ulm; formed connections with Tauler, Heinrich from Nördlingen, the Friends of God; founded brotherhoods, for which he wrote rules; and called many individual converts back from the world. His collected works, which give no consistent system, most of the materials having been derived from other mystics, consist of three parts,—on the eternal wisdom, on the eternal truth, and a narrative of his own inner history. They appeared at Augsburg in 1482; last ed. by Diepenbrock, Ratisbon, 1829 (2d ed., 1838). The book, Von den neun Eysen, often ascribed to Suso, is by Rulman Merswin. C. SCHMIDT.

SUTTEE. See BRAHMANISM.

SUTTON, Christopher, b. in Hampshire, Eng., 1565; entered Hart Hall, Oxford, 1582; soon transferred to Lincoln, of which he proceeded M.A., 1589; held several livings, and was prebendary of Westminster, 1605, and of Lincoln, 1618; d. 1629. He was pious, eloquent, and admired. He wrote Disce mori (Learn to die), Lond., 1600, frequently reprinted (modern edition, with memoir, 1839, Oxford, 1850); Disce vivere (Learn to live), Lond., 1608 (modern edition, 1853); Godly meditations upon the most holy sacrament of the Lord's supper, 1622, 13th ed., 1677 (modern edition, with preface by John Henry Newman, Oxford, 1844, again 1866). See sketch in Wood: Athen. Oxon., Bliss edition, vol. ii. pp. 456 sq.

SWAIN, Joseph, a hymn-writer of marked talent; was b. at Birmingham, 1761; and d. in London, April 14, 1796. He was originally apprenticed to an engraver. Removing to London, he was baptized by Dr. Rippon, 1783, and from June, 1791, was a successful Baptist minister. His Walcroth Hymns, 1792, while abrupt and unequal, are strong, fervid, spontaneous, and marked by frequent bursts of a really poetic imagination. They have been most extensively used by extreme Calvinists, but some of them may be found in almost every collection. F. M. BIRD.

SWEDEN. Christianity was first preached in Sweden by Ansgar. No doubt the Swedes, like the Danes and the Norwegians, had long before that time become acquainted with Christianity on their commercial and piratical expeditions, but only in a vague and indefinite way. Ansgar made two voyages to the country, in 830 and 857. On his first visit he made Hergeir, one of the most distinguished men in the country, a zealous Christian; and by his aid a congregation was formed, and a chapel was built, at Birka. In 854 Gautbert was consecrated Bishop of Sweden, and went thither with his nephew Nithard. But even Hergeir's authority was not sufficient to keep the irritated heathens within bounds. They broke into Gautbert's house, and murdered Nithard. The chapel was destroyed, the bishop fled, and, when Hergeir soon after died, the cause of Christianity seemed lost in Sweden. On his second visit Ansgar came with letters of recommendation from the emperor, with great pomp and costly presents; and, having won the favor of the king, he succeeded, at a great assembly of all the freemen of the people, in obtaining toleration for the Christian religion. Ansfried, a Christian Dane, was settled at Birka, the chapel rebuilt, and the congregation formed anew. In Sweden, however, as in Denmark, the real introduction and actual establishment of Christianity was effected from England. It was the Anglo-Saxon Siegfried, and the English and Danish monks in his company, who, in the reign of Olaf Skotkonung (d. 1024), began the work of converting the Swedish people. It was completed during the reign of Eric the Saint (1150-60), when the first monasteries—Alvastra, Nydala, and Wamhem—were founded. Originally Sweden belonged to the archiepiscopal see of Hamburg-Bremen; but in 1163 it obtained its own metropolitan (settled at Upsala), with the suffragan sees of Skara, Linköping, Strängnäs, Westeras, Wexjö, and Abo.

In Sweden the Roman-Catholic Church struck deeper roots than in either of the other two Scandinavian countries, perhaps because the Swedes are a more imaginative and impulsive people, with ready enthusiasm for any thing grand and magnificent. Nevertheless, after the great political revolution in 1523, the Reformation worked its way among the people, without meeting any considerable opposition. Gustavus Vasa found the church in a miserable condition, and addressed himself to Pope Adrian VI. with complaints, and proposals of reform; but he received no answer. He then undertook to reform the church himself; and in the two brothers Olaus and Laurentius Petri, and their friend Lars Anderson, he found the fit instruments by which to work. The Swedish translation of the Bible appeared in 1526. At an assembly at Oerebro in 1529, all the reforms which had been introduced by the government on the advice of Luther were sanctioned by the Swedish clergy. Laurentius Petri was consecrated the first evangelical bishop of Sweden. Under Eric XIV. (1560-68) the country was opened as an asylum for all persecuted Protestants. Very soon, however, controversies broke out between the Lutherans and the Reformed; and the Roman Catholics were not slow in availing themselves of the opportunities of the situation. Johan III. (1568-92) actually leaned towards Romanism. He restored the monasteries, and re-introduced images, prayers for the dead, and other Roman ceremonies. The Jesuit Antonio Possevino arrived in Sweden under the guise of an imperial ambassador, but in reality as a papal legate; and the king is said to have secretly but formally embraced Romanism. After his death the assembly of Upsala (1593) took the necessary precautions for the preservation of the Evangelical Church; but how long a Roman-Catholic party continued lingering in Sweden may be seen from the fact that Queen Christina, the daughter of Gustavus Adolphus, became a convert to Romanism, 1656.

The protracted though never violent contest with Romanism had a double influence on the Swedish Church: on the one side it retained more of the hierarchical organization of the Church of Rome than either the Danish or the Norwegian Church, and on the other it also became more exclusive and intolerant. By the introduction of the Reformation the clergy did not lose their political power: they continued to form the fourth estate of the diet of the realm until the revision of the constitution in 1865-66. And how this power was used may be inferred from the fact, that, down to 1860, the conversion from Lutheranism to any other denomination was punished with exile, and confiscation of property. Full religious liberty, that is abolition of all connection between civil rights and religious faith, was not introduced until 1877. The consequences are, that, of the 4,578,901 inhabitants of Sweden (in 1879), only an insignificant percentage belongs to other denominations, while the internal state of the Lutheran Church in Sweden by no means can be pronounced healthy. In the present century widespread religious movements (the Readers, the followers of Eric Jansen, etc.) have occurred among the lower classes; showing not the least trace of sectarianism, but giving ample evidence that the spiritual wants of the masses are not duly administered to. They wanted no other theology than that developed by Lutheran orthodoxy, but they wanted more practical religion than that offered by the Swedish Church; and it can hardly be doubted that the emigration, which of late has assumed such dimensions as to frighten the government, is caused as much by the barrenness of the Swedish church as by the poverty of the Swedish soil. It is also a significant fact, that during the last ten years the number of theological students has decreased so much, that it has not always been possible to provide every parish with a pastor. SWEDENBORG, Emanuel, was b. in Stockholm, Sweden, on the 29th of January, 1688, and d. in London on the twenty-ninth day of March, 1772. His father's name was Jesper Swedberg; his mother's, Sarah Behm. He was well born. He descended from families of successful and opulent miners, and combined in his nature the energy, insight into the qualities of material substances, and the practical good sense, which such an employment, followed from generation to generation, would tend to produce.

But little is known of his mother. His father was a clergyman, who gradually rose to be chaplain of the court, professor in the university of Upsal, and dean of its cathedral, Bishop of Skara, and superintendent of the Swedish churches in America, London, and Portugal. In 1719 the family of Bishop Swedberg was ennobled by Queen Ulrica Eleonora with the name of Swedenborg, which entitled the family to seats in the diet, — a privilege which Swedenborg in due time enjoyed. Bishop Swedberg was simple in his habits, direct in his action, and courageous to attack evil and error wherever he found it, — in king or subject. He was a zealous reformer, a prolific writer, and constantly on the alert to correct abuses, and provide improved methods of instruction. He was a sturdy, devout, wise, practical man. Such was the parentage which had its influence in determining the mental and spiritual qualities of Swedenborg.

He was well educated. But little is known of his early life. The following account, written by himself, gives us a glimpse of the qualities and natural bent of his mind. "From my fourth to my tenth year," he says, "I was constantly occupied in thought upon God, salvation, and the spiritual experiences of men; and sometimes I revealed things at which my father and mother wondered, saying that angels must be speaking through me. From my sixth to my twelfth year I used to delight in conversing with clergymen about faith; saying that the life of faith is love, and that the love which imparts life is love to the neighbor, also that God gives faith to every one, but only those receive it who practise that love." Nurtured by such a love, and penetrated by the influences of a pure home and a cultivated society, by which his native endowment became imbued with pure and true principles of life, he spent his early years. These influences and principles formed the groundwork and best part of his education.

In 1709, at the age of twenty-one years, he graduated from the university of Upsal with the degree of doctor of philosophy. In the following year he set out on his travels, at that time an essential part of a young man's education. His mind had now taken a strong bent towards mathematics and the natural sciences, specially in their application to practical use. He sought access to every man in his power from whom he hoped to gain any knowledge upon his favorite studies. He declares that he has an "immoderate desire" for his studies, especially for astronomy and mathematics. But this was not an aimless desire, looking only to the gratification of his thirst for knowledge. He always, even in these early years, regarded knowledge as a means to a practical end. This was a dominant quality of his mind. He even turned his lodgings to use in gaining practical knowledge; living with a watchmaker for a time, afterwards with a cabinet-maker, and then with a mathematical-instrument maker, that he might learn from them arts which would be useful to him and to his country. But he did not let his thirst for knowledge absorb his whole thought and affection. When he found that his intense devotion to study prevented him from being as "sociable as is desirable and useful to him, and as his spirits were somewhat exhausted, he took refuge for a short time in poetry, that he might be somewhat refreshed by it, but with the intention of returning to his mathematics again, in which he intends to make more discoveries than any one else in his age."

He now spent five years abroad; passing his time in London, Holland, Paris, and Germany. His mind was open to every phase of human life. He examined the customs, habits, and character of the people, and the influence of their institutions and industries upon them. He returned home with his mind enlarged and enriched with knowledge gained by observation, experience, and intercourse with learned men, and teeming with new inventions and plans for giving them a practical test.

In 1716, a year after his return from his travels, he was appointed by Charles XII., king of Sweden, assessor extraordinary in the College of Mines. This office gave him "a seat and a voice in the college, whenever he was present, and especially whenever any business was brought forward pertaining to mechanics;" though he was particularly directed in the royal commission "to attend Pollheimer, the councillor of commerce, and to be of assistance to him in his engineering works and in carrying out his designs." This appointment brought him for a time into personal relations with the king, who was fond of mathematics, and to whom Swedenborg rendered great service by constructing machines by means of which two galleys, five large boats, and a sloop were conveyed overland a distance of fourteen miles.

Swedenborg now devoted himself entirely to the duties of his office. These duties did not require oversight of the practical workings of the mines so much as inquiry into the nature of the elements the miners dealt with. He began to study the nature of heat and the constitution of matter. In the pursuit of this purpose he made several visits abroad, examined the mines and the methods of working them in other countries, and gained knowledge from every source to which he could get access that would throw light upon the subjects he was investigating, and be of any practical value to his country. He continued in this office for more than thirty years, to the satisfaction of his countrymen and the interests of science. During this time he had written and published a great number of works, comprising all branches of science. A catalogue of his writings shows that he had written seventy-seven distinct treatises, some of them of a directly practical nature, others upon the profoundest subjects of scientific research, in the investigation of which he showed the most penetrating insight, and anticipated many of the important discoveries of modern times. Says a recent writer, "Among all the men who rose to eminence in any of the departments of natural science during his time, it would be difficult to name one whose labors in the different departments of applied science it would be more interesting or more profitable to dwell upon." After giving the titles of his scientific and literary works, he adds, "The ability to treat such a variety of topics, and most of them, I may add, upon the authority of perfectly competent testimony, as no other man of his time could have treated them, is due to qualities of mind and character which have not received from his biographers the attention they merit. There was no kind of knowledge which could be made useful to his fellow-creatures that he thought it beneath him to master, or which he neglected an opportunity of mastering."

Having attained the highest rank among the scientists and philosophers of his time, and being in favor with the king and royal family and his countrymen, he laid aside his philosophical and scientific studies, and turned his attention wholly to questions of a spiritual and religious nature. The end he was seeking led directly to this result, though he reached it in a manner most unexpected to himself. He had been for some years in search of the soul, and had written four large octavo volumes, the first two of which were called the Economy of the Animal Kingdom, and the others, the Animal Kingdom, in which he describes his methods and their results. Before the last work came from the press, he had an experience which changed the direction and character of his studies for the rest of his life. After giving an account of his studies and works up to the present time, he says, "But all that I have thus far related I consider of little importance; for it is far transcended by the circumstance that I have been called to a holy office by the Lord himself, who most mercifully appeared before me, his servant, in the year 1743, when he opened my sight into the spiritual world, and enabled me to converse with spirits and angels; in which state I have continued up to the present day. From that time I began to print and publish the various arcana that were seen by me, or revealed to me, concerning heaven and hell, the state of man after death, the true worship of God, the spiritual sense of the Word, and many other important matters conducive to salvation and wisdom."

From this time until his death, a period of nearly thirty years, he devoted himself entirely to the new work committed to him. He resigned his office as assessor, discontinued his scientific studies, and turned his attention to those subjects which were necessary to the performance of his work. He learned Hebrew, and read the Word attentively and critically in its original languages, and showed the same systematic diligence, and sincere devotion to truth, that he had exhibited in his scientific works. Though claiming special illumination and direction by the Lord, his writings conclusively show that his illumination was gradual, and subject to immutable spiritual laws. His theological works, devoted to an exposition of the spiritual meaning of the Word, to the doctrines of spiritual truth derived from the Word so interpreted, and to what he claims to have seen and heard during his intromission into the spiritual world, comprise about thirty octavo volumes, and give the most ample means for testing the truth of his claims. To this test they must finally come. They cannot be established or destroyed by assertion or personal authority. They must stand or fall by the only infallible test,—their accordance with the immutable laws of the divine order.

Whatever may be the result of this weighing in the balances of divine truth, with regard to his seership and his claim to be divinely commissioned to reveal new truth to men, the unprejudiced mind can hardly fail to conclude that Swedenborg was in many respects the most remarkable man of his own or of any age.

He had a peculiar genius, which amounted almost to intuition, for penetrating into the secret causes of natural phenomena, while at the same time he was faithful to facts and experience, which he followed as constant guides. He was an unselfish and devout lover of the truth. Regarding it as the order of the divine wisdom, he valued it above all other possessions, and followed wherever it led. He was eminently practical, and valued truth for its use far more than for its beauty and possession. While a member of the Diet, and engaged in writing his religious works, he prepared some of the best papers that were presented on finance, the currency, and other questions concerning the conduct of civil affairs. He saw the evils of intemperance, and proposed measures to prevent them. He was a welcome guest in the highest social circles; and, though absorbed in the great work which he believed had been committed to his hands, he did not forget the children and those who served, with whom he was a great favorite. He was a sincere and devout Christian. Though living in a sceptical age, there is no evidence that he ever doubted the existence of a Supreme Being, and his direct control of human affairs: even his scientific works contain many devout acknowledgments of his dependence upon him for every faculty and every blessing of life. His nature was large, round, full, and complete. It is a significant fact, that at the present time, more than a century since his decease, his life and works, both scientific and religious, are receiving more attention than ever before. A brief statement of his theology can be found in the article on the NEW-JERUSALEM CHURCH.

SWIFT, Elisha Pope, D.D., b. at Williamstown, Mass., April 12, 1792; d. at Allegheny, Penn., 1865; grandson of Hon. Heman Swift, Revolutionary colonel, by fifth remove descended from John Eliot, "Apostle to the Indians;" converted at twenty; graduated from Williams College with honor in 1813; studied theology at Princeton; licensed by New-Brunswick presbytery in 1816; ordained as foreign missionary, Sept. 3, 1817; preached and lectured for missions; no foreign field opening, settled as pastor at Dover, October, 1818, then at Pittsburgh, in Second Church, in 1819; during this pastorate served gratuitously in 1827-28 as professor in Western Theological Seminary; resigned in 1831 to become corresponding secretary of the Western Foreign Missionary Society. From 1835 till his death he was pastor of First Church in Allegheny City.

Dr. Swift was in character consecrated, impressively devotional, humble, transparently sincere, careless of man's applause, and sedulous to please God; in mind, powerful, comprehensive, original; in preaching, massive and effective, a "Webster" in the pulpit; in public spirit, eminent; forward in educational zeal as a friend and a founder of the Western University and of the Western Theological Seminary; as a presbyter, always a leader.

But foreign missions stirred him most deeply, and therein he accomplished his most remarkable work. He had the foresight to see the necessity of distinctive church-organization in giving the gospel to the world, the courage to plead for it in the face of opposition and misunderstanding, the organizing power to give it actual existence, and the mingled gentleness and force to secure the adoption and success of the principle with the least possible friction. The Western Missionary Society of 1831, an undertaking, under the circumstances, of moral sublimity, became, "as was intended at its very outset" [Dr. Swift], "the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church." Dr. Swift was the originator of the first, and is deservedly considered the father of the second. His comprehension of missionary principles has never been surpassed; and his writings are standards still for fervor, intelligence, insight, and the glowing confidence of faith. SYLVESTER F. SCOVEL.

SWITHIN, St. (SWITHUN, SWITHUM), Bishop and patron of Winchester; d. July 2, 862. He was of noble birth, educated in the Old Monastery, Winchester, where, after his ordination (830), he was made provost, or dean. Egbert, king of the West Saxons, committed his son and successor, Ethelwolf, to his care, and availed himself of his counsels. Ethelwolf, on his accession, made him his minister, especially in ecclesiastical affairs, and in 852 procured his election to the see of Westminster. St. Swithun's Day is July 15; because on that day, in 964, his relics were moved from the churchyard where he had been buried at his own request, so that his grave might be trodden on by passers by, to the Cathedral of Winchester. There is a saying, demonstrably erroneous, "If it rain on St. Swithun's Day, there will be rain, more or less, for forty succeeding days." See BUTLER: Lives of the Saints, July 15.

SWITZERLAND. I. Introduction of Christianity, and Outline of Ecclesiastical Affairs to the Beginning of the Sixteenth Century.—In the middle of the third century Christianity was established in Geneva by Bishops Parakodus and Dionysius of Vienne. From Geneva the new religion spread to Wallis, and then to other parts of the land, the way for it, very likely, prepared by Roman Christian soldiers; but its history is enveloped in great darkness. By the sixth century this wave of Christianity, coming from France, had exhausted itself. Six bishoprics had, however, been established,—Geneva, Sitten, Lausanne, Chur, and Constance. Then came Columban and the monks of St. Gall, and evangelization was given a fresh start. Christianity at length was everywhere embraced. It was, as elsewhere, Oriental in type. Monasticism was its highest development. Monasteries kept on multiplying; yet they were, with the exception of St. Gall, so far from being centres of learning, that, in the fourteenth century, no member of the one in Zürich knew how to write. But in 1460 the first Swiss university (Basel) was founded, and at once a change for the better set in. A printing-press was set up, first at Beromünster (1470), and then at Basel and Geneva; and an abbot of Einsiedeln, Albert of Bonstetten, wrote a history of the Burgundian War, and described the Confederacy. The number of parishes and the might of the bishops had increased, likewise, very greatly, since the eighth century. In 1228 the see of Lausanne embraced 301 parishes, and yielded the bishop 60,000 ducats annually. The see of Constance, at the beginning of the sixteenth century, embraced 350 cloisters, 1,760 parishes, and 17,000 priests. The six Swiss bishops were princes of the Holy Roman Empire: the abbots of St. Gallen, Einsiedeln, Pfäfers, Dissentis, and Muri were princes. The church was rich and splendid: but it was luxurious and lax, and not entirely able to carry out its plans; on the contrary, everywhere was opposition to its politics and its doctrines. In the fight between Gregory VII. and Henry IV. Western Switzerland sided with the emperor. The clergy were forced to pay their taxes, like other people. Whole districts purchased their independence of the church. No attention was paid to interdicts, episcopal or papal. The Basellers in 1323 threw into the Rhine the Papal legate who would publish the ban among them. The sermons of Heinrich and Arnold of Brescia, full of intimation of religious changes, were listened to attentively. The Zürichers in 1274, and again in 1331, set before their priests the alternative, either to lay down their ecclesiastical functions, or to leave the city.

At the end of the fifteenth century there were increasing symptoms of the imminency of relief from the intolerable burden of ecclesiastical criminality. Nevertheless, the church everywhere exercised its wonted power over the majority of the people. The Waldenses had shown themselves in the cantons of Bern and Freiburg in 1399, but had quickly been suppressed. The councils of Constance (1411-18) and Basel (1431-43) had only shaken the pillars of the Papacy, not broken them. The Swiss cities of Bern and Zürich received long indulgences in recognition of their fidelity to the Pope. No serious attempts were made by the clergy to stem the tide of wickedness. The pulpit was dumb. But the light of the rising sun of the new and better day was meanwhile gilding the snow-clad peaks of Switzerland.

II. The Period of the Reformation from 1519 till 1566.—In Switzerland as in Germany, the Reformation was carried through in consequence of the capacity of its leaders, the readiness of the people, and the favorable political situation. The Pope, for his own ends, had loosened the Swiss Confederacy; and this state of things wrought against the Papacy. The birthday of the Reformation for Switzerland is April 13, 1525, when in Zürich, under the guidance of Zwingli, who had since 1519 preached Reformed doctrine, the first Reformed Eucharist was celebrated. The next year the canton of Zürich was read out of the Confederacy for its heresy. But this act of arrogance stirred only the deeper the Swiss desire for liberty, and love for independence; and the effort to raise the religious question into a political one aborted. The Reformation before 1529 had carried the day in all the German cantons.

But this happy result had come about in no easy fashion. The Anabaptists had given no end of trouble. The seven Catholic cantons—Uri, Schwyz, Unterwalden, Zug, Luzern, Freiburg, and Solothurn—were arrayed against the Protestant; and in May, 1529, Jacob Kaiser was for the Reformed faith burnt at the stake in Schwyz. [See R. STÄHELIN: Die ersten Märtyrer d. evangel. Glaubens in der Schweiz, Heidelberg, 1883, 31 pp.] This event made an immense sensation, and war seemed imminent. It was for a time averted; but in 1531 it broke out, and on Oct. 12 Zwingli fell, at the head of the Reformed combatants, in the defeat at Cappel. An humiliating treaty of peace was concluded Nov. 16, 1531; and the future of the Reformed cantons was black enough. On Nov. 23, 1531, Œcolampadius died. The Reformed cantons fell into mutual recriminations; the Anabaptists renewed their disturbances; the latent sympathy for the old religion dared express itself; but the Reformation did not fail. Bullinger appeared as the worthy successor of Zwingli, and Myconius of Œcolampadius. In French Switzerland, Farel labored for the cause; and on Aug. 27, 1535, Geneva abolished the Papal power. In 1536 appeared John Calvin, whose energy made Geneva the metropolis of the Reformed Church: by his side were Viret and Beza. The first authoritative symbol of the Reformed Church of Switzerland was the Second Helvetic Confession (1536), the work of Bullinger; and with its promulgation closes the period of the Swiss Reformation. III. The Period from 1566 to the Present.—The conflict between Protestants and Roman Catholics, which in Germany lasted until 1648 (the Peace of Westphalia), in Switzerland terminated only in 1712 (the second battle of Villmergen). The Catholic re-action in the second half of the sixteenth century found its leader in Carlo Borromeo, archbishop of Milan, who introduced into Switzerland the Capuchins and Jesuits, founded the Swiss college in Milan, established a nunciature in Switzerland, and in 1583 entered into a plan to overthrow the Reformation there altogether. At length the two Confessions met in a decisive battle at Villmergen, the result of which was a permanent peace.

The great men on the Protestant side who in this period carried on the Reformation, were such as Bullinger, Peter Martyr Vermigli, Heidegger, the two Hottingers, the Buxtorfs, Wolfgang Musculus, Diodati, Spanheim, and Turretin. The Helvetic Consensus Formula of 1675, with its Calvinistic doctrine of predestination, and its Buxtorfian doctrine of the inspiration of vowel-points, is the symbolical performance of this period; but after 1729 it ceased to have any authority.

The nineteenth century brought an awakening of religious activity. Fresh troubles, however, broke out. In 1839 the call of David Friedrich Strauss to the university of Zürich led to a revolution. In 1845 the Vaud canton experienced a similar fate because the radicals arose against the call of Jesuits to teach theology in Luzern. It was really, however, a protest of the ungodly against the progress of evangelical truth. In November, 1845, the Vaudese clergy left the Established Church, and formed the Free Church of the Vaud canton. (See VAUD, FREE CHURCH OF.) In the Roman-Catholic cantons, Ultramontanism grew apace until it received a severe blow from the Vaudese revolution. [In 1847-48 the Sonderbund, or union of the Roman-Catholic cantons of Switzerland, vigorously opposed the reorganization of the Diet in the interests of progress; but it was worsted, and the old regulation which forbade the establishment of Reformed congregations in Roman-Catholic cantons, and vice versa, was abrogated. Thus the defeat at Cappel was avenged.]

HERZOG.

IV. The Present Religious Condition of Switzerland.—According to the census of Dec. 1, 1880 (reprinted in Appletons' Annual Cyclopaedia for 1882), the population of Switzerland was 2,846,102, of which 1,667,109 were Protestants (Reformed Church), 1,169,782 Roman Catholics, 10,838 of minor Christian sects, and 7,373 were Jews. Three cantons<sup>1</sup> (Zürich, Vaud, Schaffhausen) and a half canton (Appenzell Rhodes ext.) are Protestant; six cantons (Zug, Luzern, Schwyz, Uri, Tecino, Valais) and three half-cantons (Appenzell Rhodes int., Unterwalden-Obwalden, Unterwalden-Nidwalden) are Roman-Catholic; and ten cantons (Neuchâtel, Bern, Glarus, Thurgau, Grisons, Aargau, Geneva, St. Gallen, Freiburg, Solothurn) and two half-cantons (Bâle-ville, Bâle-camp) are mixed. The Protestants belong almost entirely to the National Reformed Church of their canton. There are, however, Free Churches in Geneva, Vaud, and Neuchâtel. The Lutheran Church has only a single congregation, at Geneva. Uri is the only canton in which there is no Protestant congregation. In German Switzerland are the three Protestant theological faculties of Basel, Bern, and Zürich; in French Switzerland, three National and three Free,—in Lausanne, Geneva, and Neuchâtel respectively.

The Roman-Catholic Church in Switzerland is divided into five dioceses,—Basel-Solothurn, Coire, St. Gallen, Lausanne-Freiburg, and Sion. The Roman-Catholic clergy are very numerous. Roman-Catholic parishes exist in every canton.

The opponents to ultramontanism, as shown in the infallibility dogma, have since 1871 formed the "Christian Catholic" Church, which has one bishop, whose diocese embraces all Switzerland, and a theological faculty at Bern. They were excommunicated by the Pope. Their first bishop, Dr. Herzog (formerly a priest at Olten) was consecrated by the Old-Catholic bishop of Germany (Dr. Reinkens) in 1876. Their number in 1877 amounted to about 73,000. See OLD-CATHOLICS.

The details of church-life are regulated for each canton by local authority; but the federal constitution of April 19, 1874, lays down certain general principles, to which all the cantons are required to conform. Absolute liberty of conscience is secured to all. Parents and guardians have the sole right of regulating the religious instruction of children less than sixteen years old. No one is required to pay taxes raised for the support of a church to which he does not belong. Free exercise of religion is guaranteed to all, within the limits compatible with order and morality. The cantons are authorized to take measures necessary to maintain peace between the different confessions, or to repress any ecclesiastical infringement upon the rights of citizens. All disputes relative to the creation of religious congregations, and to schisms in existing congregations, are decided by the federal authorities. No new bishopric shall be established without the approbation of the Confederation. The Jesuits and the affiliated orders, whether exercising ecclesiastical or educational functions, are absolutely forbidden to enter any canton, on the ground that such orders threaten the peace of the state. The founding of new convents and religious orders is forbidden.

SYLLABUS, the Papal, is an index, or catalogue, of eighty heresies condemned by Pope Pius IX., Dec. 8, 1864, on the basis of several encyclical letters issued by the same pontiff during his long reign. Its full title is, A Syllabus containing the Principal Errors of our Times, which are noted in the Consistorial Allocutions, in the Encyclicals, and in other Apostolical Letters of our Most Holy Lord, Pope Pius IX. The number of heresies was probably suggested by the work of Epiphanius against the eighty heresies of the first three centuries, which are mostly of a Gnostic character. The Papal document is purely negative, but indirectly it teaches and enjoins the very opposite of what it condemns as error. It is divided into ten sections. The first condemns pantheism, naturalism, and absolute rationalism; the second, moderate rationalism; the third, indifferentism and latitudinarianism; the fourth, socialism, communism, secret societies, Bible societies, and other "pests of this description;" the fifth, errors concerning the Church and her rights; the sixth, errors concerning civil society; the seventh, errors of natural and Christian ethics; the eighth, errors concerning Christian marriage; the ninth, errors concerning the temporal power of the Pope; the tenth, errors of modern liberalism. Among the errors condemned are the principles of civil and religious liberty, and the separation of Church and State. The Syllabus indirectly asserts the infallibility of the Pope, the exclusive right of Romanism to recognition by the civil government, the unlawfulness of all non-Catholic religions, the complete independence of the Papal hierarchy, the power of the Roman Church to coerce and enforce, and its supreme control over public education, science, and literature.

It will be seen that the Syllabus condemns many errors which are likewise rejected by all good Protestants. At the same time it condemns, also, important truths. It re-asserts all the extravagant claims of the mediæval Papacy, and is a declaration of war against modern civilization and progress. It is a glaring anachronism.

What authority attaches to this document? Cardinal Newman, in his defence of the Syllabus against Gladstone's attack, virtually denied its dogmatic force, saying (Letter to the Duke of Norfolk, p. 108), "We can no more accept the Syllabus as de fide, as a dogmatic document, than any other index or table of contents." But the Syllabus is more than a mere index, and contains as many definitions and judgments as titles. Moreover, the Papal infallibility decree of 1870 makes all ex-cathedra or official utterances of the Pope on matters of faith and discipline infallible. It acts backwards as well as forwards: otherwise it would be null and void (Si falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus). The Syllabus is certainly an official document, addressed to all the bishops of the Catholic world, and sent to them with a Papal encyclical. And herein lies its importance and danger. As a personal manifesto of the Pope, it would be comparatively harmless and unheeded outside of the Roman communion; but clothed with infallible authority, and followed by the decrees of the Vatican Council, it provoked and stimulated the so-called Kulturkampf in Germany, a pamphlet war in England about its bearing on civil and political allegiance, and led to serious conflicts between Church and State in Italy, Austria, Prussia, France, Belgium, and Brazil. Where Church and State are united, there must be collision when both claim sovereignty, and the one claims infallible authority in addition. Even in the United States, where the government has nothing to do with the Church, the influence of the Syllabus is felt in the legislation on marriage and in public education, both of which have a secular as well as a religious aspect. The State claims and exercises the right and duty of educating the people for intelligent and useful citizenship; while the Syllabus condemns all public education which is not controlled by the teaching of the Roman Church, and stimulates the efforts of the priesthood to Romanize or to break up the public schools, or, where neither can be done from want of power, to neutralize them by parochial schools in which the doctrines and principles of Trent and the Vatican are inculcated upon the rising generation. Time must show what will be the ultimate issue of this irrepressible conflict.

SYLVESTER is the name of three Popes.—Sylvester I. (314–335), of whom it is said that he baptized Constantine the Great, and received the famous donation from him, is a saint of the Roman-Catholic Church, and commemorated on Dec. 31.—Sylvester II. (999–1003), whose true name was Gerbert, descended from humble parents in Auvergne, but distinguished himself by his immense learning and brilliant accomplishments, and attracted general attention by his liberal views of the relation between the synods, the bishops, and the Pope. Otto II. chose him as tutor for his son, and made him abbot of Bobbio. Afterwards he taught in the school of Rheims, and was, on account of his knowledge of chemistry and physics, believed by simple people to have sold his soul to the Devil. He defended the decrees of the synod of Rheims (991), against Pope John XV., but was afterwards reconciled with the Pope, and made archbishop of Ravenna. When he ascended the Papal throne, he completely changed his views of the Papal power, and treated all cases occurring with supreme authority. His literary remains, of which his letters are of special interest, have been edited by Masson, Duchesne, and others, last by Pertz. His life was written by Hock, Vienna, 1837; and MAX BÜDINGER, Cassel, 1851.—Sylvester III. was for three months the Antipope of Benedict IX. and Gregory VI., and was deposed by the synod of Sutri (1046). NEUDECKER.

SYLVESTER, Joshua, b. 1563; d. at Middleburg in Holland, Sept. 28, 1618; was a member of the Company of Merchant Adventurers, and eminent as a linguist. His poems, mostly on sacred subjects, and translated from the French, occupy in the edition of 1620 some twelve hundred folio pages, and won him the epithet of "silver-tongued." Chief among them is Du Bartas, his Divine Weekes and Works. According to Campbell, this "was among the most popular of our early translations," and has "beauties strangely intermixed with bathos and flatness." Charles Dunster, rector of Petworth, Sussex, published in 1800 Considerations on Milton's Early Reading, and the Prima Stamina of his Paradise Lost, maintaining that it was much indebted to Sylvester. F. M. BIRD.

SYLVESTRIANS, a monastic order founded by Sylvester Gozzoloni (b. at Osimo in the States of the Church, 1170; in 1231 he founded a monastery on Monte Fano, and adopted the Benedictine rules, with some modifications, for the inmates). The order was confirmed by Innocent IV. in 1247. In 1662 it was united with that of Vallombrosa, but was again separated from it in 1681, and confirmed anew by Alexander VIII. in 1690. NEUDECKER.

SYMBOL (σύμβολον, symbolum, literally, that which is thrown together) is properly a mark, badge, watchword, or test. It was first used in a theological sense by Cyprian, in his Epistle Ad Magnum (Ep. 76 or 69), in the year 250, but since the fourth century very generally. Originally it had reference to the Apostles' Creed as the baptismal confession, as a military watchword, distinguishing Christians from all non-Christians, since they were regarded as soldiers of Christ. Luther and Melancthon first applied the word to Protestant creeds. Symbolical books are the symbols themselves. For a discussion of the nature of creeds and their distribution, see art. CREED.

SYMBOLICS treats of the origin, history, and contents of the various creeds of Christendom. It is comparative dogmatics. It was formerly known under the name of "Polemics," and "Controversial Theology," but is now treated in a more historical and irenic spirit. In this modern form it may be said to have begun with Marheineke, who in 1810 published his Symbolik. He was followed by Winer, with a comparative presentation of different authorized creeds (1824). Since his day much study has been given to the origin of different creeds, particularly to those of prime importance, e.g., the Apostles', the Nicene, the Athanasian; and much light has been thrown upon the subject. The teachings of the Roman Catholic Mohler, in his Symbolik (1833), upon the contrasts between Roman Catholicism and Protestantism, were met by Baur, Nitzsch, and other Protestants. Among the most eminent scholars in this department may be mentioned Swainson, Lumby, Caspari, and Schaff. See the LITERATURE in the Creeds (N.Y., 1878, 3 vols.) by the last-named. Recent works in this department of study are G. F. OEHLER: Lehrbuch d. Symbolik, Tübingen, 1876; K. H. G. v. SCHEELE: Theologisch Symbolik, Upsala, 1876 sqq., German translation, Gotha, 1880-81, 3 vols.; B. WENDT: Symbolik der römisch-katholischen Kirche, Gotha, 1880.

SYMBOLUM APOSTOLICUM. See APOSTLES' CREED.

SYMMACHIANS was the name of a sect which lived in Rome, and taught that the human body was created, not by God, but by the Devil, and was consequently to be misused in every way possible. The origin of the sect is doubtful, — whether founded by that Symmachus who translated the Old Testament into Greek, or by some other Symmachus. In the time of Augustine it was rapidly disappearing. See Contra Cresconium, i. 31; see also PHILASTRIUS: De Hæresibus, ed. Fabricius, Hamburg, 1721. NEUDECKER.

SYMMACHUS, Pope, 498-514. After the death of Anastatius II., a double election took place; the popular party in Rome electing the deacon Symmachus, the imperial the archpresbyter Laurentius. Theodoric, the king of the Ostrogoths, was called in as umpire, and decided in favor of Symmachus; but it was several years before Laurentius finally yielded. At the synods of Rome (in 502, 503, and 504), Symmachus introduced various measures, limiting the participation of the laity in the Papal election and in the administration of the property of the Papal see; so, on the whole, his government tended towards the consolidation of the Papal power. NEUDECKER.

SYMPHORIANUS, a Gallic martyr from the reign of Aurelian; d. probably in 180. He was a native of Autun (Augustodunum), and is described as a youth of distinguished appearance and excellent education. Having refused to do homage to the statue of Berecynthia (Cybele), he was carried before the prefect Heraclius; and as he continued repeating, "I am a Christian," and absolutely refused to make any concessions to the demands of the reigning Paganism, he was decapitated. He is commemorated on Aug. 22. See Acta Sanctorum, Aug. 22, and RUINART: Acta prim. martyrum. GASS.

SYMPHOROSA, a Christian widow, whose husband, a tribune, had suffered martyrdom. She was summoned before the Emperor Hadrian, and commanded to sacrifice, and partake in the Pagan solemnities at the consecration of the new imperial palace at Tibur. As she refused, she and her seven sons were cruelly tortured and killed. They are commemorated on July 18. See Acta Sanctorum, July 18, and RUINART: Acta primorum martyrum, who accepts the story as true, though it does not harmonize with what is else known of Hadrian. GASS.

SYNAGOGUE, the Great, according to Jewish tradition, denotes the council first appointed, after the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity, to re-organize the religious life, institutions, and literature of the people. Ezra, if he was not the originator of that council, certainly was its president. [Comp., against this view, Graetz, in Frankel's Monatsschrift, Leipzig, 1857, etc., pp. 31 sq., 61 sq.] This council consisted of a hundred and twenty men, who were not contemporaneous, but who are to be regarded as transmitters of tradition from Moses and Joshua down to the time of Simon the Just (q.v.), who, according to Pirke Aboth (i. 1), was the last surviving member. As to the work of the Great Synagogue, see the arts. CANON and BIBLE-TEXT (OF THE OLD TESTAMENT), and SCRIBES. The existence of the Great Synagogue [was first questioned by Richard Simon: Hist. Crit. du Vieux Test., lib. i. cap. viii.]; then by Jacob Alting, who was followed by Rau: Diatrise de Synag. Magna [Traj. ad Rhen., 1726], pp. 42 sq.; Aurivillius: De Synag. vulgo dicta Magna [ed. J. D. Michaelis, Göttingen, 1790], De Wette, and others, who rejected it as one of the inventions of tradition, because it is not mentioned by Josephus, Philo, or the Seder Olam, and because the earliest record of it is in the tract of the Mishna entitled Pirke Aboth, which belongs to the second century of our era. On the other hand, scholars like Eichhorn (Einführung, i. § 5), Bertholdt (Einführung, i. pp. 66 sq.), Ewald (Gesch. Israel's, ii. 192), Jost (Geschichte der Israeliten, iii. pp. 43 sq.), Zunz (Gottesdienstl. Vorträge, p. 33), maintain that there is much historical truth underlying the tradition of a body of men, who, between the time when prophecy was about to die out and the Greek period, were leaders among the Jewish people, transmitted tradition, and made such provision for the spiritual welfare of the people, that the law of God again permeated their life. But the name "Great Synagogue" was probably first adopted some centuries later. Whether there were really a hundred and twenty men or not is difficult to say. We must not, however, identify the Great Synagogue with the Great Sanhedrin (q.v.), or take it as its original form, as does Schickard (De jure reg. Hebr., i. part 2), Witsius (Misc. diss. de synedr., § 28), J. Braun (Sel. Sacr., Amst., 1700, p. 595), Sachs, Herzfeld, Heidenheim.

SYNAGOGUES OF THE JEWS. I. NAME, ORIGIN, AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE SYNAGOGUE. — Synagogue (Greek, synagoge) is the name of those religious assemblies, which, during the post-exile period, existed first side by side with the sacrificial service in the temple, and which, after its existence, were substituted for it. Metonymically, synagogues denote also "places of assembly." After Israel had lost, not only its national independence, but also its national sanctuary, the Jews were anxious to preserve the unity in faith, doctrine, and life. To achieve this, regular assemblies were inaugurated on certain days, in the different places of Palestine where Jews lived, and where men of learning expounded the law. Thus, in all places where a certain number of Jews lived, synagogues were called into existence, which afterwards became the only bearer and banner of their nationality. According to Jewish law, wherever ten Jews lived, a house of assembly was to be erected. At the time of Jesus, not only each city in Palestine, but also the cities of the diaspora, had each at least one synagogue. Of the many synagogues which were at Jerusalem, the temple synagogue was the most famous.

II. INTERNAL ARRANGEMENT, WORSHIP, ETC., OF THE SYNAGOGUE. 1. The Building. — Taking the temple as the prototype, and following the traditional explanation of words in Prov. i. 21 and Ez. ix. 9 ("to set up"), taken to mean that the voice of prayer is to be raised on heights, the Jewish canons decreed that synagogues are to be built upon the most elevated ground in the neighborhood, and that no house is to be allowed to overtop them. Failing of a commanding site, a tall pole rose from the roof to render it conspicuous. The building was commonly erected at the cost of the district: sometimes it was built by a rich Jew, or even, as in Luke vii. 5, by a friendly proselyte. The river-side outside the city was also deemed a suitable spot for building the synagogue; because, being removed from the noise of the city, the people could worship God without distraction, and at the same time have the use of pure water for immersions and other religious exercises. Often synagogues were erected near the tombs of famous rabbins or holy men. The congregation was divided — men on one side, women on the other — by a low partition, five or six feet high, running between them (Philo: De Vita Contempl., ii. 476). In modern synagogues the separation is made more complete by placing the women in low side-galleries, screened off by lattice-work (Leo Mutin: De cerem. Jud., 10, 4). When the building was finished, it was set apart, as the temple had been, by a special prayer of dedication. From that time it had a consecrated character. No one was to pass through it as a short cut. Even if it ceased to be used, the building was not to be applied to any base purpose, might not be turned, e.g., into a bath, a laundry, or a tannery. A scraper stood outside the door, that men might rid themselves, before they entered, of any thing that would be defiling.

2. Furniture. — In oldest times the people probably stood in the synagogue (Neh. vii. 5, 7), or sat upon the floor. But there were also armchairs, or seats of honor, for the elders of the synagogue, the doctors of the law, etc. (Matt. xxiii. 2, 6; Mark xii. 39; Luke xi. 13; Jas. ii. 2, 3). They were placed in front of the ark containing the law, or at the Jerusalem end; and these distinguished persons sat with their faces to the people, while the congregation stood facing both these honorable ones and the ark. Besides the rostrum or platform, capable of containing several persons (Neh. viii. 4, ix. 4), there was a reading-desk, on which the sacred scrolls were laid. These scrolls were wrapped in linen or silk wrappers, often adorned with letters or other ornaments of gold and silver, and were kept in the wooden chest, or ark, or sanctuary. In some synagogues there was also a second chest for the rolls of the prophets, and where damaged rolls were preserved. There were, moreover, a perpetual light, and lamps brought by the people, which were lighted at the beginning of the sabbath, i.e., on Friday evening. To the furniture also belonged alms-boxes at or near the door, also notice-boards, on which were written the names of offenders who had been put out of the synagogue.

3. Times of Worship. — Besides on sabbaths and festivals, the people also met on Monday and Thursday, which were the two market-days in the week.

4. Liturg., or Order of Service. — (1) The prayers which took the place of the daily sacrifices were offered up also at those hours when the daily sacrifices were made. As on sabbaths and festivals additional sacrifices were offered besides the usual, so, likewise, additional prayers were added to the regular ones. The main part of the daily service was the Shema and the eighteen benedictions. The prayer was followed on the sabbath and festivals by (2) the reading of the section of the law, which was originally divided in a hundred and fifty-four sections, or parashiyoth. After the section of the law (3), a section from the prophets, or Haphtarah, was read; then came (4) the homily, exposition, or derasha. The service closed (5) with the benediction, to which the congregation responded by saying "Amen."

III. OFFICERS OF THE SYNAGOGUE. — The synagogues were governed by the elders (Luke vii. 3), who were presided over by the ruler of the synagogue (Matt. ix. 18; Mark v. 35; John vii. 48; Luke viii. 41; Acts xiii. 15), and constituted the local Sanhedrin. To give unity and harmony to the worship, one was delegated to go up before the ark to conduct divine service. He was called shaliach zibur, i.e., the legate of the congregation. There was also the chazzan, or sexton of the synagogue, who had the care of the furniture, to open the doors, to clean the synagogue, to light the lamps, etc. Other officers were the almoners, corresponding to the seven deacons (Acts vi. 1 sq.); and they had to be "men of honesty, wisdom, justice, and have the confidence of the people." We must also mention the Ten Ballanim [or "Men of Leisure"], who were independent of business, because they had private means, or were stipendiaries of the congregation. They had to be present at all services, so that there might be no delay in beginning the service at the proper hours.

SYNCELLUS (one who shares his cell with another) denotes, generally, the visitant of one of the higher ecclesiastical officers. The Patriarch of Constantinople had several syncelli, of whom the first (protosyncellus) at one time even ranked before the metropolitans. Syncelli were also known in the West.

SYNCRETISM is a word of Greek origin, though of rare occurrence in ancient literature, referring to a saying about the Cretians, — that they were very much disposed to wage war against each other, but immediately made peace, and joined hands, when attacked by foreigners. It was brought into currency again by Erasmus (see his letter of April 22, 1519, to Melancthon), and became quite commonly used by the Reformers, denoting, not exactly a compromise between different tenets, but a union on the basis of such tenets as were common to both parties. (See ZWINGLI: Opp., ed. Schuler and Schulthess, vii. p. 390, and Butzer's letter to Zwingli of Feb. 6, 1531.) At first it was indifferently used, both in a good and in a bad sense; but in the course of the sixteenth century the Roman Catholics, who wished to suppress Protestantism, but not to compromise with it, and who feared more than any thing an agreement between the Lutherans and the Reformed, succeeded in giving to the appellation, "a syncretist," the meaning of a religion-monger; and that sense the word afterwards retained. During the seventeenth century its compass became somewhat circumscribed. First, all attempts at union between Roman Catholics and Protestants, then all attempts at union between Lutherans and Reformed, were excluded; and finally the word came to designate simply a principle within the pale of Lutheran theology, — the principle of moderation, expansion, development, in opposition to the principle of a stiff and stationary orthodoxy.

Throughout the whole period of the Reformation two opposite tendencies are discernible: one starting from the axiom that all truth is one, and consequently condemning toleration of different opinions as laxity; and the other moving along upon the conviction that all true religion is love, and consequently striving after reconciliation and harmony. In the middle of the seventeenth century those two tendencies clashed against each other; and the result was a sharp and bitter literary contest, known as the "Syncretistic Controversy." The situation is very vividly characterized by the decrees of the synod of Charenton (1631) and the criticism which those decrees called forth. Some French-Reformed congregations asked the synod whether Lutherans living among them could be baptized, married, admitted to the Lord's Supper, etc., in their churches, without first abjuring their specifically Lutheran tenets; and the synod answered in the affirmative. Then the Roman Catholics raised a huge cry, stigmatizing such indifference to religious divergences as mere atheism. (See FRANCIS VÉRON: Méthodes de traiter des controverses de religion, 1638.) The controversy proper, however, began a little later, and was carried on in another field. It broke out at the Colloquy of Thorn (1645), and raged till the death of Calixtus (1656). Renewed by the Colloquies of Cassel and Berlin (1661), it went on till the secular governments commanded silence (in 1669); and once more it finally burst forth during the last years of Calovius' life (1675-86).

Considering the reciprocal hatred between the Lutherans and the Reformed among his subjects as a national calamity, King Ladislaus IV. of Poland arranged a religious disputation between the two parties at Thorn in 1645. As delegates from the evangelical churches of Germany were also invited, intrigues immediately began. The Saxon theologians, representatives of the strictest orthodoxy, were eager to prevent any theologian of the Helmstädt school, whose tendency was syncretistic, from being sent as a delegate to the colloquy; and they succeeded. So, though Calixtus, the head of the school, was elected for Dantzic, they managed to have the election cancelled. He was present, however, at Thorn; and he was seen to converse freely with the Reformed theologians, even to walk along with them in the streets, and to visit them in their lodgings. Such a scandal could not, of course, be tolerated. The colloquy over, and no result arrived at, the Saxon theologians issued a memoir (Dec. 29, 1646), in which they accused the Helmstädt theologians of undermining the Lutheran Church by their novelties. Calixtus answered (Feb. 26, 1647), characterizing the accusation as an infamous calumny. The Saxon theologians now seized upon every, even the most insignificant, deviation of Calixtus from the traditional Lutheran system, and made the most possible out of it, shrewdly calculating, that, if they could prove him to be unsound, the inference would be irresistible that his moderation towards the Reformed was pernicious. They sent a hail-storm of attacks down upon him, — little tracts, and heavy quartos of sixteen hundred pages, Latin and German (HÜSEMANN: Dialysis apologetica problematis Calixtini, etc., 1649, Judicium de Calixtino desiderio, etc., 1650, Calixtinische Gewissenscurm, 1651; CALOVIVS: Consulatio nova theologiæ Helm., etc., 1649, Syncretismus Calixtinus, 1653). But Calixtus was prompt in answering (De questionibus, etc., 1649; Appendix, 1650; Verantwortungen, 1651). Political passions and interests were brought to bear upon the controversy. Jealous of Brandenburg and the Palatinate, the supports of the Reformed Church in Germany and of syncretism in German theology, the elector of Saxony attempted to deal the Reformed Church in Germany a deadly blow by preventing the Peace of Westphalia from placing it on an equal footing with the Lutheran Church. He failed. As head of the Corpus Evangelicorum, he then sent an admonitory letter to the three princes who maintained the university of Helmstädt, but received a very sharp answer. Finally the Saxon theologians summed up their complaints against Calixtus in ninety-eight heretical propositions culled from his writings, and a new shower of polemics burst over him. In one year (1655) Calovius published Harmonia Calixtinohæretica (twelve hundred pages in quarto), Systema locorum (two heavy volumes in octavo), and Fides veterum. The death of Calixtus, however, brought about a kind of armistice.

In order to establish a more satisfactory modus vivendi between the Lutheran and Reformed subjects, the landgrave of Hesse invited two professors from the Reformed faculty of Marburg, and two from the Lutheran faculty of Rinteln, to a colloquy at Cassel, July 1-9, 1661. The colloquy proved a success. The Brevis relatio which was issued at its close, though it nowhere concealed the actually existing differences between the Lutherans and the Reformed faith, everywhere emphasized their fundamental harmony; and for that very reason it was received with great favor throughout the Reformed Church. Quite otherwise in the Lutheran Church. The faculty of Rinteln was filled with pupils of Calixtus; and their moderation at the colloquy of Cassel was by the strictly orthodox party considered a treasonous surrender of the very principles of Lutheranism. The faculty of Wittenberg, composed of Calovius, Quenstedt, Deutschmann, etc., sent a violent harangue to Rinteln (Epicrisis de colloquio Cassellano), March 12, 1662, and received an answer of the same character (Epistola apologetica), Dec. 18, 1662. Calovius again descended into the arena with a German book (Gründlicher Beweis) of a thousand pages, and a Latin book (Antapologia) of seven hundred pages; and once more the Syncretistic Controversy was raging. Meanwhile, the elector of Brandenburg, encouraged by the success of the landgrave, determined to try the same experiment, and arranged a colloquy in Berlin. But the Lutherans were unwilling and suspicious; and the colloquy dragged on from September, 1662, to May, 1663, without any result. On Sept. 16, 1664, the elector issued a decree forbidding all discussion of the points in question from the pulpit, besides taking other measures for the establishment of peace and order. All ministers were demanded to sign the edict; and those who refused—as, for instance, Paul Gerhardt—were dismissed. In the same year the faculty of Wittenberg published the Consilia theologica Witebergensia, containing the famous Consensus repetitus fidei vere Lutheranae, which aimed directly at the pupils of Calixtus. It was, no doubt, the idea of Calovius to represent the theology of the school of Helmstädt, not only as a deviation from true Lutheranism, but as a new religion, not protected by the Peace of Westphalia. The situation became critical. The syncretists found an able defender in Fr. U. Calixtus, a son of their late leader, who in 1667 published his Demonstratio liquidissima against the Consensus. But he was attacked by Ægidius Strauch with such an asperity and coarseness, that he had to go to the civil courts for protection. A libel-suit was instituted, and the procedure caused great and widespread scandal. At that moment the elector interfered (1669), and commanded both parties to keep silent.

During the period of quiet which followed, from 1669 to 1675, Duke Ernst the Pious, of Saxe-Altenburg, made great exertions in order to effect a reconciliation between the syncretists and the orthodox party, between the Lutheran and the Reformed churches. The memoir of Spener, dated May 31, 1670, made a deep impression; and his practical suggestions pointed in the same direction as the duke's schemes. But all hopes of peace were finally wrecked on the stubbornness of Calovius. Immediately after the death of Duke Ernst, he began the controversy again. Attacks and counter-attacks followed in rapid succession, in Latin and German, in verse and prose. The satirical comedy, Triumphus concordie, which was acted in Wittenberg by the students at some university-festival, became very famous. The author was imprisoned, the printer was fined, and the elector saw fit to revive the laws forbidding the publication of controversial writings. But Calovius continued: he wrote anonymously or pseudonymously. His principal work from this period is his Historia syncretistica, which appeared in 1682, without name, or place, or date. It was not confiscated; but its sale was prohibited, and that measure seems to have made a very deep impression on him. As the counterpart of the Historia syncretistica, and closing the whole controversy, may be considered Fr. U. CALIXTUS' Via ad pacem, Helmstädt, 1700. See, besides the works quoted above, H. SYNERGISM is a sublimated type of Semi-Pelagianism, and had for its representatives Erasmus, and specially Melancthon and his school. Protestant theology in its first stage was the strictest Augustinianism. Luther taught that the fall rendered man incapable of all good, and incompetent to contribute any thing towards his conversion. In his Enarratio in Ps. xc. (1541) he says, "In spiritual matters, so far as the soul's salvation is concerned, man is like a pillar of salt, like Lot's wife, yea, like a clod and stone, a dead picture, using neither mouth nor eyes, mind nor heart." Conversion is solely the act of divine grace. Melancthon held to this view at first. In his Loci of 1521 he speaks of the will as destitute of all freedom, and of a man's works which seem to be good as only "the cursed fruit of a cursed tree" (arboris maledictæ). As a consequence, Luther taught [in his earlier period] the strict doctrine of predestination, as did also Melancthon, who says, "All things which happen, happen by necessity, according to divine predestination,"—the treachery of Judas, as well as the conversion of Paul. This was the theology of Melancthon's head, not of his heart; and in the third series of his Loci (1543) sin is regarded as the work of the Devil and the human will. God is not the cause of it. Man abused his freedom of will, and a certain measure of will-power remained to him after the fall. Three agents are active in every truly good deed,—the word of God, the Holy Spirit, and the human will, which is called the "power of seeking after grace" (facultas sese applicandi ad gratiam). This theory of co-operation between God and man got the name of synergism. It prevailed in the Leipzig Interim. "God does not deal with man as with a block, but draws him, so that his will co-operates." Pfeffinger, professor in Leipzig, in his De libertate voluntatis hum. questiones (Leip., 1555), advocated this view, but was caustically opposed by Amsdorff. Then Flacius took up the controversy, in his Refutation of Pfeffinger's Propositions (1558), declaring that man is absolutely passive (pure passive) in conversion. Man has no more part in it than a stone or piece of wood in the work of the artist who forms out of them a statue. The campaign of the anti-synergists was organized at the recently founded university of Jena, whither Flacius was called in 1557. Wittenberg and Leipzig represented the synergistic theory. Under the direction of the Duke of Saxony, the Weimar Confutationsbuch (Illustrissimi principis ac Domini, Dom. J. Friderici II. . . confutatio et condemnatio præcipuarum corruptelarum, sectarum et errorum hoc tempore grassantium, 1559) was prepared, which was regarded as the ægis of strict Lutheranism, and forced upon the pastors, etc. Melancthon read it with great pain. Strigel, however, one of the professors at Jena, and a synergist, had a public discussion with his colleague Flacius at Weimar (August, 1560). He insisted upon man's freedom of will, and his co-operation with the Divine Spirit. Flacius declared that man was in more wretched plight than a stick of wood; for by nature he can will the bad, and the bad only. He sins "necessarily and inevitably." According to the Confutationsbuch, Strigel should have been condemned, but was not. Flacius was strengthened by Wigand, a pugnacious genius of acerbity rarely equalled. The fortunes of the two parties were for a time in the balance. The duke favored the synergists, and started, thereby, a howl on the part of the Flacians, who reminded him of the destiny of the forty children devoured by the bears, etc., and called Strigel the voracious wolf, etc. Strigel was restored to his place at the university; but, called upon to sign Stössel's Declaration (Colturnus Stösselis), he refused, and escaped to Leipzig, rejecting all overtures (Oct. 17, 1562) for his return to the university (of Jena), which he had built up. Stössel's Declaration was not orthodox enough, and forty preachers who spoke out against it were exiled. Schnecker, Freihub, and Salmuth, all Melancthonians, were called to Jena; but a new duke ascended the throne, 1567, and they retired. Wigand, Coelestin, Hesshusius, and Kirchner were substituted for them, all Flacians. The duke had the so-called corpus doctrinæ Thuringicum put together, according to which not the least spark (ne scintillula quidem) of spiritual power remained to man after the fall. The human will is absolutely incompetent to good, hard as stone. It only has a passive capacity to be converted by divine grace. Conversion is nothing less than "resuscitation from spiritual death." The Formula of Concord followed, and by its declaration about the will, which pleased the Flacians, closed the controversy. SYNESIUS, b. about 375, at Cyrene, the capital of the Libyan Pentapolis; studied philosophy and rhetoric in Alexandria, and became a passionate disciple of Hypatia. In 397 or 398 he was placed at the head of an embassy which Cyrene sent to Constantinople, and on that occasion he delivered before the Emperor Arcadius his celebrated speech, On Kingship (edited by Krabinger, Greek and German, Munich, 1825). He staid two years in Constantinople, but returned home in 400, thoroughly disgusted with the state of affairs, of which he had given a description, Αἰώντιος (edited by Krabinger, Greek and German, Salzburg, 1835). For several years he staid on his estates, occupied with agriculture and the chase, studying philosophy, and writing hymns, Neo-Platonic and pompous: in short, leading a life of ease and refined elegance. In 409 or 410 the people of Ptolemais elected him—the Pagan philosopher, a married man—their bishop; and after some hesitation he accepted. Materials for the explanation of this singular fact are found in a letter he wrote to Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, immediately after his election. He speaks of the Christian priesthood with the greatest reverence. He considers it as something divine; and in order to obtain it he declares himself willing to give up his fields, his garden, the chase, all his amusements. But he will not give up his wife, and he cannot give up his philosophical ideas. Theophilus, though at times a most stubborn and vindictive adherent of strict orthodoxy, gave his consent; and Synesius was consecrated. Very soon, however, after entering upon his office, he came into conflict with the prefect of the province, Andronicus. It seems that the church was liable to misuse its right of asylum; and it seems that Andronicus fell into the opposite extreme, trying to cancel the right altogether. Synesius was finally excommunicated, and the speech he delivered on that occasion is still extant. It gives a very vivid picture of the dreary and unhappy life he led, unable to fulfil his new duties, and abandoned by his old friends; and new calamities—the invasion of the barbarians, the loss of his children, etc.—made it still worse. He seems to have died in 414, at all events before the cruel death of Hypatia in 415 or 416. His collected works first appeared at Liege, 1612, and again in 1633. See

SYRIA, AND MISSIONS TO SYRIA. I. HISTORICAL SKETCH.—Syria is called Bur-esh Sham by the Arabs, who include in the title Palestine (Filistin). The name Syria is derived from Tsur, or Sur (Tyre). The Greeks early became acquainted with that city, and gave its name to the country. At a remote era the Aramaeans had founded political communities in Syria; and the kingdoms of Aram, Dameshk (Damascus), and Aram-Zobah (the Bukaa), are mentioned in the Bible.

The Phœnicians, or Canaanites, were the most remarkable of all the ancient inhabitants of the country, and with the Damascenes long held the northern part of Syria. Phœnicia attained its greatest power about B.C. 1050, and continued in almost uninterrupted prosperity five hundred years. During the period of the judges, Syria was more or less under the suzerainty of the Pharaohs; and David extended his dominions over Damascus and Hamath.

From the time of Cyrus (536 B.C.) until the rise of the Grecian power, Syria and Palestine were governed by a Persian satrap, resident in Damascus.

After the battle of Issus (333 B.C.), Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine yielded to Alexander the Great, excepting Tyre and Ascalon.

After the death of Alexander, Syria continued under the reign of the Ptolemies for sixty years, and then was conquered by the Seleucidæ, who held it until 143, the era of the Maccabees.

In B.C. 34 Syria passed under the Roman yoke, Herod the Great being made king of the Jews. After the destruction of Jerusalem (70 A.D.), Judæa was attached to the province of Syria; and, soon after, Syria and Palestine were placed under the direct dominion of a Roman prefect, Antioch being the seat of government.

In this state the country continued under the Roman and Byzantine Empire until the Muslim conquest in A.D. 634.

Christianity was established under Constantine; and the "extent, wealth, and architectural taste of the Christians" in the subsequent period may be inferred from the splendid ruins of their churches in every part of Syria. The finest mosques in Damascus, Beirût, and Tripoli, the Aksa in Jerusalem, and the Agia Sophia in Constantinople, were Christian churches.

In A.D. 649 Damascus was made capital of the Mohammedan Empire. Syria was full of splendid cities, such as Antioch, Palmyra, Damascus, Heliopolis, Apamea, Gerasa, Bostra, Ascalon, and Cæsarea; but under the blight of Islam these all fell into decay, and Damascus alone remains prosperous.

In 750, under the Abassides, the Caliphate removed to Cufa, and then to Bagdad; Syria becoming a mere province of the Mohammedan Empire.

In the middle of the tenth century it was taken by the Fatimite dynasty of Egypt; and toward the close of the eleventh century, Syria was invaded by the Seljukian Turks, and annexed to their empire.

The period of the Crusades continued from A.D. 1099 until A.D. 1291, when Acre was taken by the Mamelûke Sultan of Egypt.

For more than two centuries after this period Syria suffered from the fierce wars of the "Shepherd hordes of Tartary," and their brethren the Tartar Slav sovereigns of Egypt. In 1401 Timur the Tartar (Tamerlane) invaded the country, burnt Antioch, Emessa, Baalbek, and Damascus, and either massacred their inhabitants, or sold them into slavery.

In 1517 Syria and Palestine were conquered by the Ottoman Sultan, Selim I., and have continued under Turkish rule to this day, declining in wealth and prosperity until the people of the interior provinces sunk to the lowest point of intellectual and moral degradation.

In 1832 Ibrahim Pacha conquered Syria for his father, Mohammed Ali, but was expelled by the English in 1841, and Syria restored to the Porte.

II. THE LAND.—Syria and Palestine lie along the eastern shore of the Mediterranean, extending from Egypt and the Sinaitic desert on the south to the confines of Asia Minor on the north, and reaching from 31° to 36° 30' north latitude. The length of the country is 360 miles, and its breadth from 60 to 100 miles; its area being about 28,000 square miles.

A mountain chain, under different names, runs through the land from north to south, being intersected at different points, thus forming distinct ranges. From the wilderness north of Beersheba, the foot-hills rise to mountains about Hebron; and the broken, undulating range extends northwest to the headland of Carmel. North of the Carmel range lies the plain of Esdraelon, which extends through to the Jordan. Over this plain a railway route has just been surveyed.

North of Esdraelon the range continues broad and broken, to the deep ravine of the Litany, which empties into the sea near Tyre. Beyond the Litany rises the noble range of Lebanon, which runs a hundred miles to the north, varying in height from four thousand to eleven thousand feet, and breaking down north-east of Tripoli into a broad plain, which sweeps from the sea eastward to the Orontes at Hums and Hamath, forming the "entrance of Hamath," mentioned by Moses as the northern border of the land of Israel (Num. xxxiv. 8). North of this plain rises the Jebel el Husn, the southern spur of the Nusairiyeh range, anciently Bargylus Mons, which extends north, and terminates in the beautiful conical peak of Mount Casius at the mouth of the Orontes.

North of the Orontes the range is known as Gawar Dagb, the Amanus of Ptolemy, which extends north fifty miles to Mount Taurus.

The chain of Anti-Lebanon rises in the plain of Hamath, about twenty miles east of the northern end of Lebanon, and runs parallel to the latter, culminating in Mount Hermon, which has an elevation of about ten thousand feet. From Hermon the ridge breaks down into an irregular and lower range, which runs due south along the eastern bank of the Jordan and the Dead Sea to the mountains of Edom.

The political geography of Syria has changed with every change of dynasty for centuries. At present Syria and Palestine constitute one Welaïet, or pachalic, extending from Antioch to Gaza, which is styled the Pachalic of Damascus.

The province of Mount Lebanon was erected into a distinct pachalic after the massacres of 1860; the pacha being always a Latin Christian, appointed by the Porte, with the approval of the great powers of Europe. David Pacha was the first pacha of Lebanon; Franco Pacha, the second; and the next mutserrif was Rustem Pacha, an Italian by birth, a man of enlightened views and liberal education. The present pacha is Wassa Pacha, a Catholic Albanian. Under this régime, Lebanon has become, in proportion to its size, the most prosperous part of the Turkish Empire. Schools are encouraged, roads built, new land cultivated, and everywhere is security to life and property.

III. THE PEOPLE. — The population of Syria in 1881 was estimated at 2,076,300, as follows:—

Mohammedans, Sunnites, and Metawileh	1,000,000
Nusairiyeh	250,000
Maronites	250,000
Orthodox Greeks	235,000
Papal sects	80,000
Jews	30,000
Ismailiyeh Gypsies, etc.	30,000
Armenians	20,000
Jacobites	15,000
Druzes	100,000
Protestants	6,300
Bedawin Arabs	60,000
Total	2,076,300

The limits of this article forbid a detailed description of these sects; but of the more obscure it may be said, that the Druzes and Nusairiyeh are semi-Pagan; the Bedawin, nominally Muslim, but really ignorant and superstitious deists; the Maronites, devoted adherents of the Papacy; the Ismailiyeh and Metawileh, heretical Muslims; while the Greeks, Armenians, and Jacobites are Oriental Christians.

The bulk of the population in the cities is Mohammedan, excepting Beirût, of whose population of eighty thousand not more than one-third are Mohammedans.

The northern part of Lebanon is almost exclusively Maronite; the southern portion, south of the Damascus road, being chiefly Druze, with scattering villages of Greeks, Maronites, Muslims, and Metawileh. In Palestine Proper the most of the villagers are Muslims, the Greeks and Papal Greeks being dispersed in Northern Palestine and on the plain of Sharon.

IV. THE NATIVE ORIENTAL CHURCHES are the Orthodox Greek, the Maronite, the Papal Greek, the Jacobite, Armenian, and Papal Armenian.

The Greeks are supposed to number about two hundred and thirty-five thousand. They are Syrians by birth and descent, and speak only the Arabic language. The doctrines and ritual are the same as in Greece and Russia. They differ from the Roman Church in the following points: (1) the calendar, (2) the procession of the Holy Spirit, (3) the use of pictures and the exclusion of images from sacred buildings, (4) the rejection of purgatory, (5) communion in both kinds, (6) the marriage of the secular clergy.

The church is divided into the patriarchates of Antioch and Jerusalem, which, though nominally independent, are really under the control of the Primate of Constantinople.

The Patriarch of Antioch governs the bishoprics of Beirût, Tripoli, Akkar, Ladakiyeh, Hamah, Hums, Saidnaya, and Tyre. The patriarchate of Jerusalem includes Palestine and Perea, and has under it the bishoprics of Nazareth, Akka, Lydda, Gaza, Sebaste, Nâbulus, Philadelphia, and Petra. Among these the Bishop of Akka is the only one who resides in his diocese: all the others live in the convent at Jerusalem.

The Greek Church allows the reading of the Scriptures by the people, and hence they have become more enlightened than any other of the Syrian sects.

The Syrians, or Jacobites, separated from the Oriental Church on account of the monophysite heresy. The Syriac language is used in the church services, although it is not understood by the people. Their head is the Patriarch of Mardin. Their number is small, chiefly in Sudud, Kuryetein, Hums, Nebk, Damascus, and Aleppo. They are poor and industrious, and receive the Scriptures without opposition.

The Maronites originated as monothelites in the seventh century, although Bishop Dibbs of Beirût has written laboriously and vainly to disprove their heretical origin. Their name was derived from a monk, John Marôn, who died in 701. In 1180 they renounced monothelitism, and submitted to the Pope. They are devoted Romanists, and call their part of Lebanon the Holy Mountain.

Although adhering to the Pope, they still retain many of their former peculiarities. Their ecclesiastical language is Syriac. Their patron saint, Marôn, is not found in the Roman calendar. They have their own church establishment, and the people regard their Patriarch as not inferior to the Pope. Their secular clergy marry.

Their convents, numbering nearly 100, own the best estates in Lebanon, and support about 2,000 monks and nuns, with a revenue of not less than $350,000.

The people are independent, hardy, and industrious, but are left in gross ignorance, illiteracy, and superstition. Their clergy are educated at Ain Werka; and those trained in Rome are men of fair learning: but the mass of the priests are lamentably ignorant.

The Papal schismatic churches—the Papal Greek, Papal Syrian, and Papal Armenian—have sprung from the missionary efforts of Romish priests and Jesuits during the past two centuries. The Papal Greeks retain the marriage of the clergy, their Arabic service, Oriental calendar, and communion in both kinds.

The Armenian population is confined to the vicinity of Antioch and Aleppo, speaking the Turkish and Armenian languages.

The Jews of Palestine are foreigners, numbering about fifteen thousand; having come from every country on earth, and living chiefly in Jerusalem, Hebron, Tiberias, and Safed. But the Jews of Damascus, Aleppo, and Beirût, are natives, speaking the Arabic, and many of them possessed of great wealth.

V. MODERN PROTESTANT MISSIONS IN SYRIA.

(a) American Presbyterian. — The first modern Protestant mission to Syria began in January, 1819, when Rev. Messrs. Pliny Fisk and Levi Parsons, missionaries of the A. B. C. F. M., landed in Smyrna. In February, 1821, Mr. Parsons reached Jerusalem. In 1823 Messrs. Fisk, Jonas King, from America, and Way, of the London Jews Society, reached Beirût, and summered in Lebanon.

Jerusalem and Beirût continued for years the two centres of American missionary labor, until 1843, when the American mission was withdrawn from Jerusalem, and confined to Syria Proper, leaving Palestine to the Church Missionary Society.

In 1871 the Syria mission of the American Board was transferred to the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions of the United States, owing to the then recent re-union of the two branches of the Presbyterian Church.

The whole number of American missionaries laboring in Syria under these two boards from 1823 to 1883, is as follows: male missionaries, 55; female missionaries, 63; printers, 4; total, 122.

The missionaries were at first directed to attempt the reform of the Oriental churches, leaving the converts within the Oriental communions; but it soon became necessary to organize a distinct Oriental Evangelical Church.

The great work undertaken by the American Syria Mission, however, was not merely for the two millions in Syria, but, through the medium of the Arabic Scriptures and Christian Arabic literature, for the hundred and seventy-five millions of the Mohammedan world. The work of translating the Bible from the original tongues into Arabic was begun in 1848 by Dr. Eli Smith, who labored assiduously until his death, Jan. 11, 1857.

Only Genesis, Exodus, and the first sixteen chapters of Matthew had received his final revision; but he had revised and nearly prepared for the press the whole of the New Testament, and all except Jeremiah, Lamentations, and the last fourteen chapters of Isaiah, of the Old Testament.

On his death, Rev. Dr. C. V. A. Van Dyck continued the work of translation. In 1860 the New Testament was completed, and issued from the press; and in 1865 the entire Bible was finished, and sent forth to the world. Dr. Smith had prepared in 1837, with the aid of Mr. Homan Hallock, the punches of a new font of Arabic type, made from the best specimens of Arabic calligraphy. The type were cast by Tauchnitz, in Leipzig. This type, which at first was anathematized by the religious heads of the Oriental sects, has now been adopted by the Turkish Government journals, the Dominican press at Mosul, the Greek and other native presses, and the Leipzig Arabic press.

Several editions of the Arabic Bible have been electrotyped in Beirût at the expense of the American Bible Society.

The Arabic Bible, during the past eighteen years, has been distributed throughout Syria and Palestine, Mesopotamia and Egypt, and in Asia Minor, Tunis, Algiers, Tripoli, and Morocco, Sierra Leone and Liberia, Zanzibar, Aden, Bagdad, India, and China.

In addition to this, nearly two hundred different books have been printed at the Beirût press; comprising works on medicine, surgery, anatomy and physiology, chemistry, natural philosophy, botany, astronomy, the higher mathematics, geography with atlases, grammar, arithmetic, history, theology, homiletics, church history, evidences of Christianity, mental philosophy, hermeneutics, etc., together with religious books and tracts, and illustrated books for the young, and weekly and monthly journals.

Mr. Butrus Bistany, a learned convert from the Maronite faith, who aided Dr. Eli Smith in the Bible translation, has published a fine dictionary of the Arabic language, in two volumes octavo, 1,200 pages, and is now publishing an Arabic encyclopædia in twelve octavo volumes, 800 pages each, of which the sixth is already completed.

During the year 1882, 21,000,000 pages in Arabic were printed at the Beirût press, making 243,000,000 from the foundation of the press. The demand for the Beirût publications is greater in Egypt than in any other country. The Beirût press has an Arabic type foundry and electrotype apparatus.

Education is a prominent branch of the mission-work in Syria. The first missionaries found the people in a deplorable state of intellectual and moral ignorance. The only schools were the Muslim medrissehs, attached to the mosques, and the clerical training-school of the Maronites in Ain Wurka, Mount Lebanon. Books were to be made for readers, and readers for books.

Drs. Thomson and Van Dyck founded a seminary for boys in Abeib in 1846, which was placed under the care of Mr. Calhoun in 1849, and continued in his care until 1876. It was the highest literary institution in Syria for years, until the founding of the Syrian Protestant College in Beirût.

This institution was incorporated by the Legislature of New York in 1863, and is under the control of a board of trustees residing there. The college began with a preparatory class in 1865, and the college proper opened in the fall of 1866. A medical class was formed in 1867. In the autumn of 1873 the present permanent buildings at Ras Beirût were occupied. The departments of the college are three, — preparatory, collegiate, and medical, including pharmaceutical. The language of the preparatory and collegiate departments is English; and, in the future, medical instruction will also be in English. The whole number of students in the college in the year 1882-83 was 168. The total number of graduates in pharmacy to the year 1882 was 9; medical, 70; collegiate, 74; total, 153.

Progress has been made in founding a library and scientific museums.

The mission has also three female seminaries, — in Beirût, Sidon, and Tripoli, — with about 100 boarders and 300 day pupils, and 113 common schools, with about 5,000 pupils.

A theological seminary building adjoins the college, in which several members of the mission give instruction to candidates for the Christian ministry.

Fourteen native evangelical churches have been organized, of which four have native ordained pastors; and twenty-seven licensed preachers aid in the work of evangelization. The number of communicants is about 1,000, of whom 400 are women. Eighty-four Sunday schools contain about 4,000 scholars. The number of Protestant adherents is about 4,000.

Medical mission-work has received especial attention, both in hospital services and in medical practice among the poor in the interior towns and villages.

The American Bible Society and the American and London Religious Tract societies have given substantial aid in the printing and publishing work of the mission.

(b) The Irish Presbyterian Mission in Damascus was founded in 1843. The United Presbyterian Church of the United States soon entered upon the work, and continued to co-operate with it until a few years since, when the latter church concentrated its work upon Egypt. Rev. Messrs. Crawford and Phillips, with a corps of lady-teachers, now carry on the work, with 14 catechists, 7 preaching-stations, 110 communicants, and 430 pupils in their schools. Their work embraces Damascus and vicinity, and the eastern and southern parts of Anti-Lebanon.

(c) The Church of England Missions in Palestine have their centre at Jerusalem, and embrace (1) the London Jews Society, with 8 foreign laborers, 8 native teachers, 80 communicants, and 2 schools with 104 pupils; (2) the Church Missionary Society, with 20 European laborers, 4 ordained natives, 37 catechists, 24 female teachers, 25 preaching-stations, 214 communicants, 45 schools with 1,142 pupils.

The Protestant bishopric of Jerusalem, founded by Frederick William IV. of Prussia, is supported half by Prussia and half by England. The first bishop was Dr. Michael S. Alexander; the second, Dr. Samuel Gobat; and the third, Dr. Barclay, who died in 1881. At present there is no incumbent. See JERUSALEM, EPISCOPAL SEE OF ST. JAMES IN.

The Church Missionary Society labor in Palestine Proper as far north as Acre, and east of the Jordan.

(d) The German Evangelical Missions embrace (1) the German Deaconesses of Kaiserswerth, whose work comprises orphan-training, higher education, and hospital-nursing (they began labor in Sidon in 1860 after the massacres, then transferred their work to Beirut, where they have spacious premises, and are engaged in a work which is of the greatest value to the people of Syria. They have in Beirut 16 deaconesses, 6 native female assistants, and 240 pupils. They have also the care of nursing the indoor patients to the number of 500 in the Johanniter Hospital in Beirut. In Jerusalem four of the deaconesses act as nurses in the hospital, with about 700 indoor patients annually); (2) German chaplains in Beirut and Jerusalem, who preach to the German and French speaking Protestants; (3) The Jerusalem Verein of Berlin, which supports Dr. Reinicke at Jerusalem, and Mr. Muller at Bethlehem, whose work embraces 135 communicants, 8 schools with 296 pupils.

(e) The British Syrian Schools, founded by the late Mrs. J. Bowen Thompson, and now conducted by her sister, Mrs. A. Mentor Mott, are doing a great work for female education in Syria. They have schools in Beirut, Damascus, Baalbek, Tyre, Hasbeiya, Bukfeiya, Mukhtara, Zahleh, and Ain Zehalteh. This society has 17 foreign laborers, 22 catechists, 75 female teachers, 24 Bible-women, and 30 schools with 2,878 girls and 452 boys; total, 3,330 pupils.

(f) The Free Church of Scotland has a mission in the Metn district of Mount Lebanon, in connection with the Lebanon schools' committee. This mission has 23 catechists, 7 female teachers, 35 communicants, 21 schools, and 832 pupils. Rev. W. Carslaw, M.D., labors in harmony and close connection with the American mission.

(g) The Society of Friends in England and America have a mission in Lebanon at Brummana, and also schools at Ramullah and vicinity in Palestine. Mr. Theophilus Waldemeier of the mission at Brummana was one of the captives in Abyssinia under King Theodore, and has labored industriously in founding the Boys' Industrial School, the Girls' Boarding-school, and the Hospital and Dispensary, together with various village schools. The society have 10 schools with 300 pupils.

Other societies besides those mentioned above are laboring in Syria and Palestine, the chief of which are the Church of Scotland Mission to the Jews, Miss Taylor's Muslim Girls' School, the Society for promoting Female Education in the East, the Reformed Presbyterian Mission in Latakiah, the Crishona Orphan-House Mission, Miss Arnett's School, the Mary Baldwin Memorial School, and Miss Mangan's Medical Mission (the last three at Jaffa).

The whole number of foreign laborers, male and female, in Syria and Palestine in 1881 was 191, with 581 native teachers and catechists, 26 churches, 140 preaching-stations, 1,700 communicants, 6,311 Protestant adherents, 302 schools with 14,624 pupils, of whom 7,475 were boys and 7,149 girls.

The medical missions are 12 in number, with 15 physicians, 24 nurses, 1,805 indoor-patients, and 73,432 outdoor-patients in polyclinique.

In addition to the Protestant educational institutions in Syria and Palestine, numerous schools have been opened by other sects, foreign and native; and the Turkish Government is urging upon the provincial governors the opening of medrischs for the Muslim children.

VI. THE ROMAN-CATHOLIC MISSIONS IN SYRIA AND PALESTINE may be said to date back to the Crusades, when the Latin priests made an attempt to convert the Oriental churches to Rome. But within the past two centuries their efforts, as stated above, have resulted in the founding of various affiliated churches, known as Greek-Catholic, Syrian-Catholic, Armenian-Catholic, etc. More recently the Jesuits, Franciscans, and Lazarists have set themselves to the work of caring for these native Catholic sects, proselytizing the Oriental sects, and counteracting the influence of Protestant missions.

The Jesuits have a college in Beirut with 250 pupils, and other schools with 1,000 pupils. They have also a large printing-house, and have made, under Dr. Von Hamn, an Arabic translation of the Bible from the Vulgate, including the Apocrypha. It is an elegant and expensive work, varying but slightly in text from that made by Drs. Smith and Van Dyck.

The Franciscans have a monastery and church, the Capuchins, a church and schools, and the Lazarists, schools, in Beirût. The Lazarists also have a large boys' boarding-school at Aintura in Mount Lebanon.

The French institution of the Sœurs de Charité de St. Vincent de Paul embraces an orphanage of about 600 pupils, and a day-school and boarding-school.

The Dames de Nazareth have also erected a stately building east of the Damascus Road, and have about 130 pupils.

The most important of the native Catholic institutions are the Maronite Bishop Dibbs's college with 250 pupils, and the College Patriarcal Grec Catholique with nearly 300 boys.

The city of Beirût takes the lead in education, and has become a city of schools, as the following official statistics for 1881 will show:—

While the Protestant schools are 30 in number, with 128 teachers, 575 male pupils, 2,429 female pupils, a total of 3,004, the non-Protestant schools (as Orthodox Greek, Maronite, Jesuit, Papal Greek, Lazarist Monks, Sisters of Charity, Sisters of Nazareth, Maronite Bishop Dibbs's, Mohammedan, Jewish, Italian, Madame Melhamy [a Maronite lady], and the Catholic St. Joseph's) number 53, with 301 teachers, 4,893 boys, 3,492 girls, a total of 8,385 pupils. Adding to these the 3,004 Protestant pupils, we have 11,389 pupils in the schools of Beirût.

The most remarkable proof of a popular awakening on the subject of education is the opening of boys' and girls' schools by the Mohammedans in Beirût, Damascus, Tripoli, Sidon, Hums, and other places.

They have erected neat school-edifices, fitted with seats and desks (the girls' schools with American sewing-machines): and in Beirût they now have 1,150 boys and 420 girls under instruction.

One of the great obstacles to the evangelization of the Mohammedans is the politico-religious alliance between Islam and the State. This has increased the fanaticism of the Muslim masses. But contact with European influence, the growth of education, the reading of the Bible, the newspaper press, and the spread of a pure Christianity, are gradually leavening the minds of the Mohammedans. In 1860 the Muslims everywhere sympathized with the massacre of Christians. In 1882 the Muslims of Beirût formed a relief committee to aid the ten thousand Christian refugees who fled from the Muslim fanatical outbreak in Egypt.

Diplomacy can never regenerate the East. The patient work of education, the preaching of the gospel, the distribution of God's word among the masses, and the diffusion of Christian literature, will gradually disarm prejudice, awaken inquiry, promote social harmony, destroy polygamy, reform the Oriental churches, and bring the followers of Islam to the religion of Jesus Christ. Thus will the press, the church, and the school co-operate in hastening the true regeneration of that most interesting, and, until recently, so degraded land.

SYRIAC LITERATURE. The literature of the Syriac tongue is mostly biblical and ecclesiastical; the rest being historical, poetical, legendary, folk-lore, and translations (chiefly) from the Greek classics and Fathers. The extant Syriac literature (proper) begins with the second century A.D., and ends shortly after the Crusades; though later works exist, related to the earlier, like the Latin of the middle ages to that of the classic period. The modern Syriac, easily acquired by a reader of ancient Syriac or of Arabic, has a literature of its own, both native, and fostered by the American and the Jesuit missionaries, and current from Mosul to Urmi (Oroomiah). For an account of this language and literature, see Dr. Justin Perkins's Eight Years in Persia, Andover, 1843; also a partial bibliography in the Introductory Remarks of Rev. D. T. Stoddard's Grammar of the Modern Syriac Language (in Journal of the American Oriental Society, also separately, New Haven, 1855); also Socin's Die Neu-Aramäischen Dialekte von Urmia bis Mosul (autolithographic text, with German translation, Tübingen, Laupp, 1882); and Nöldecke's notice of the same in Z. D. M. G., Bd. 36, pp. 609 ff. The words of this dialect are incorporated into R. Payne Smith's Thesaurus Syriacus, vol. i. Oxon., 1879. The chief monument of this dialect is the Bible by Dr. Justin Perkins (Urmi, New Testament, 1846; Old Testament, 1852), and, next, a manuscript lexicon, Syriac-English, compiled principally by Deacon Joseph, Dr. Perkins's assistant and translator. (See art. PERKINS.) Other works are missionary literature, Protestant and Catholic, with a few native historical, poetical, and moral works. A great portion of this literature is still extant only in manuscript.

Another dialect, called Turâni, is spoken in the Mesopotamian region of Tür 'Abdin, a portion of which has been reduced to writing, and published by Eugen Prym and Albert Socin. For an account of this dialect, see Prym and Socin's Der Neu-Aramäische Dialekt von Tür 'Abdin (Göttingen, Vandenhoeck and Ruprecht, 1881, 2 vols.), and art. by Socin, in Z. D. M. G., Bd. 36, pp. 238 ff. Neither the modern Syriac nor the Turâni has yet superseded the ancient Syriac in the church service-books, except among the Protestants.

The ancient Syriac literature might be treated under various divisions, but the most convenient is that of age. There are three well-marked periods: I. From the second century to the Mohammedan conquest, A.D., 636; II. From the Mohammedan conquest to the decay of Syriac as a spoken language, A.D. 636-1318; III. From 1318 onward, when Arabic was established as the common vernacular, and writers wrote in either tongue, and some in Greek also. Throughout, the Syriac maintained itself as a beautiful and flexible language; easily receiving accessions from other tongues, abounding always in Grecisms and Greek words, till it even naturalized French and English words in the times of the Crusades, and later.

Period I., Second Century to A.D. 636.—Chiefly worthy of note are the Bible versions. First, doubtless, the Curetonian, dating, probably, from the second century, extant only in fragments of sixth-century manuscripts (found at the convent of Sta. Maria Deipara, in the Nitrian Desert), named from the discoverer, and published by him (London, 1858); other fragments privately printed by W. Wright [London, 1872]. Second, the Peshitto, a recension of the Curetonian, perhaps, which probably assumed its present shape in the fourth century; a noble version, and the best monument of the ancient language. The New Testament lacks the Epistles, Second Peter, Second and Third John, and Jude, with the Apocalypse. Third, the Philoxenian, made by the chorepiscopus Polycarp, A.D. 508, for Philoxenus, Bishop of Hierapolis (or Mabûg). This was based on the Peshitto. It is probably extant in those Epistles which are lacking in the Peshitto, but printed in the common editions of the Syriac New Testament; and in the Gospels it is probably most nearly represented by a manuscript belonging to the Syrian-Protestant College at Beirut, and brought to light by the present writer. (See Notes on the Beirut Syriac Codes, in Jour. Soc. Bibl. Lit. and Eccegesis, 1882, pp. 2 ff.) Fourth, the Harklensian, a recension of the Philoxenian, made by Thomas of Harkel, A.D. 616. The Gospels are extant in several manuscripts. The rest of the New Testament, except the Apocalypse, is extant in one manuscript. Fifth, contemporaneous with the Philoxenian, and almost a part of the same labor, is the Hexaplar version of sundry portions of the Old Testament, made by Paul of Tella, A.D. 616. Sixth, the Palestinian or Jerusalem version, extant only in portions of an Evangelistarium in the Vatican Library (published at Verona, 1861, by Count F. Miniscalchi Erizzo), and a few fragments published by Land in his Anecdota (tom. iv., Lugd. Bat., 1875). A few other versions of portions (at least) of the Bible are extant only in scraps and quotations.

In this connection is to be mentioned the Diatessaron of Tatian the Assyrian, which was either originally composed in Syriac, or had its chief circulation in a Syriac version. The work itself is now lost; but a commentary thereon by Ephrem Syrus (fourth century) is extant in an Armenian translation (published with a Latin version at Venice, 1836; Latin version again, revised, Venice, 1876). Tatian's work dates about A.D. 155-170, and is the most important early witness to the general recognition of the four Gospels.

Other works of this early period were translations of the Epistles of Clement of Rome, of the Festal Letters of Athanasius (extant in one of the earliest known Syriac manuscripts, discovered by Cureton, and published by him at London, 1818), of portions of Eusebius, of Josephus, etc.

The commentaries, and especially the hymns and homilies of Ephrem Syrus (fourth century, deacon of Edessa) have been hitherto as noted as any non-biblical Syriac remains. (The homily, in Syriac, is usually a sermon in verse, heptasyllabic, octosyllabic, or dodecasyllabic.) Ephrem was inspired to sing by the earlier poetry of Bar Desanes the Gnostic. Ephrem is the greatest name in early Syriac literature and sainthood, and many works of others have wrongly been attributed to him. His hymns and homilies are beautiful and poetic, but very didactic and dogmatic.

A throng of writers—homilists, chroniclers, and translators—belong to this period, many of whose works are lost, and many others extant only in manuscript, for a catalogue of whom reference is best had to Aug. Friedrich Pfeiffer's condensation of J. S. Assemani's Biblioth. Oriental., Erlangen, 1776. Of especial note are Joshua the Stylite, whose Chronicle (A.D. 507) was best published by W. Wright (Cambridge, 1882); Jacob, or James, of Sarûg, of whose works one of the most curious is the Homily on the Baptism of Constantine, published at Rome, 1852, with Italian translation and notes, by Arthur L. Frothingham, jun. Of very great importance is the anonymous Chronicle of Edessa (circa A.D. 550), containing a great wealth of church and secular history. Edessa was the literary home of the Syriac tongue, as Antioch of the Syrian Church.

The Syriac hymnology and liturgical literature of this period deserve a volume for their treatment, if for no other purpose than to show their influence on the Western hymnology and liturgies.

The publication of many important works of this period has been accomplished in great part by the enterprise of scholars of the present generation.

Period II., A.D. 636-1318.—During this period chroniclers and poets were more in fashion, and they have preserved many important matters of history that otherwise would have been lost. Lexicographers and grammarians also, with law-writers, scientific authors, collectors of proverbs and riddles, likewise abounded in this period; although almost every writer was an ecclesiastic of some grade, or a monk.

Prominent is Dionysius of Tell Mahre, a Jacobite bishop and patriarch (flor. A.D. 750-845), established in power by the Caliph Abdallah. His Chronicle was written before he became bishop, or before A.D. 775; and in it he treated of historical subjects from the beginning of the world to about A.D. 755. His Chronicle incorporated, and preserved as well, the Chronicle of Joshua the Stylite above mentioned. A long list of chroniclers followed, until we reach the important name of Dionysius Bar Salibi, bishop of Amida (flor. circa A.D. 1154-71), whose commentaries, theological works, and liturgies are of great value for critical purposes. Then, after another swarm of writers, appears Gregory Bar-Hebræus, called also Abu-l-Farag (Abulpharagius) (b. A.D. 1226). His Chronicle and commentaries are crowded with invaluable material of every sort. He wrote Arabic, as well as Syriac. His works are quite voluminous, and among Syriac authors he ranks among the very first for utility and value, although of so late a date.

A long list of writers on other topics might be named as belonging in this period, but we can stop to mention but one for his importance, — Jeshua (Jesus) Bar-Bahlûl (circa A.D. 963), who published a lexicon of his tongue that is still extant. Several grammars of the period are extant, both in manuscript and in print.

To this period belongs also the Nestorian (a word which ought to be replaced by "Chaldean") writer, Ebed-Jesu, metropolitan of Soba and Armenia (d. 1318). His most noted and noteworthy book is his catalogue of the Sacred Scriptures and of patristic writings or writers, including many, if not most, of the known Greek and Syrian Fathers. This work, like that of Gregory Bar Hebraeus, is among those indispensable to the biblical critic.

This period was one of great literary activity, as well as of life, throughout the Syriac-speaking peoples. Missions were extended eastward to the Pacific. It was in A.D. 781 that the famous Chinese-Syriac monument was set up, which records the planting of Christianity in China by the Syrian missionaries. Copies of this tablet, in facsimile, are in several of our libraries; and notices and translations appear in a long series of books in many languages, from Kircher (1631) to Doolittle and Williams. (See, e.g., Pfeiffer, ubi supra, pp. 493 ff.)

Period III., from A.D. 1318 onward. — The death of Ebed-Jesu marks the close of the classic period. After him there follows a very long and numerous series of writers of less note, among whom few, if any, could require particular mention here. Their works are chiefly valuable to the linguist, or in special limited investigations. As in earlier times, most of them were ecclesiastics.

Concerning the development of the language, the contrast between the Peshitto and the Harklensian versions appears very strong to one who reads only those specimens of the literature. Such a reader is apt to suppose that the Peshitto represents the pure Syriac, and the Harklensian a strong Greek element; but a more extended reading shows that the Harklensian bears also a later Syriac character, and that the Peshitto was already rather solemn and antiquated before the Philoxenian was made. The idiom of the Harklensian has much in common with the style of the secular writings, both those of earlier and those of later date than itself. As time went on, the Grecisms scarcely decreased, but the Arabicisms became more frequent. The secular language, also, is more flexible, and indulges more in complex syntactical structures.

A catalogue of printed Syriac books would far exceed the limits of this whole article. The best bibliography of printed ancient Syriac literature is to be found in Dr. EBERHARD NESTLE'S Brevis Ling. Syr. Gram., Literatura, etc. (one of the series Porta Ling. Oriental., begun by Petermann, Carlsruhe et Lipsiæ, Reuther, 1881, Litteratura, pp. 1-39); but a very considerable number of printed books have appeared since that work. The best accounts of Syriac manuscript literature are to be found in the following works: Hebræica Tractatus, etc., ed. ABR. ECHELLENSIS (Romæ, 1653); J. S. ASSEMÂNI: Biblioth. Orientalis (Romæ, 1725-28);

A. FRIEDR. PFEIFFER; J. S. ASSEMÂNI: Biblioth. Oriental. in einen Auszug gebracht (Erlangen, 1776); STEPH. EVOD. ASSEMÂNI: Biblioth. Apostolic. Vatic. Codd. MSS. Catalog. (Romæ, 1758-59); [ANGELO MAI:] Script. Vcter. Nov. Collectio e Vat. Codd. Editæ (Romæ, 1831); STEPH. EVOD. ASSEMÂNI: Biblioth. Medicea Laurent. et Palatin. Codd. MSS. Orientalis Catalogus (Flor., 1742); ROSEN and FÖRSHALL: Catalog. MSS. Oriental. qui in Brit. Mus. (London, 1838); W. WRIGHT: Catalogue of the Syriac Manuscripts in the British Museum, acquired since the Year 1838 ([London], 1870, etc.); R. PAYNE SMITH: Catal. Codd. MSS. Biblioth. Bodlegian. (Oxon., 1864); [H. ZOTENBERG:] MSS. Oriental., Cat. des MSS. Syriacques, etc., de la Bibliothèque Nationale (Paris, 1874); ANDR. THEOPH. HOFFMANN: Kurze Geschichte der Syr. Literatur (Berthold, Jour. XIV., 1822); GUST. BICKELL: Conspectus Rei Syriacæ Lit. (Monast., 1871).

Of the editions of the Bible in ancient Syriac, a critical edition of the Peshitto is still a desideratum. For the New Testament, the best editions are (for text) the ed. princeps of WIDMANSTADT (Vienna, 1555, now very rare) and the American editions (Urmî, 1846, New York, 1871); of the Old Testament, the Urmî edition of 1852. The Ambrosian Codex of the Old Testament, edited by A. M. Ceriani (Milan, 1876, etc.), is the oldest Old-Testament manuscript, and all important. For other editions, and editions of the Apocrypha, see NESTLE (ubi supra). A very useful work is the Psalter, the "first labor" of the American press at Urmî (1841), printed for the use of the Nestorian (Chaldean) ecclesiastics. It contains parallel Scripture references and the prayers and rubrics used in public service. Much of this accessory matter has found its way into other editions of the Psalter. The older editions of the New Testament give the Nestorian (Chaldean) church-lessons. For further information respecting the Syrian writers mentioned in this article, see respective arts. SYRIAC VERSIONS. See BIBLE VERSIONS.

SYROPULOS, Sylvester, a Greek ecclesiastic of the fifteenth century, author of a valuable history of the Council of Ferrara-Florence (see art.). He was δικαιοφύλαξ ("law-officer") and chief sacristan in Constantinople, one of the five dignitaries immediately about the patriarch. He was passionately devoted to his church, and opposed to the Latin. Nevertheless, he was a delegate to the Council of Ferrara-Florence, especially designed to effect a union between the Greek and Latin churches, took part in its deliberations, and by command of his sovereign signed the decrees. This act of weakness he deeply lamented; and by his efforts to defeat the practical effect of the decrees he encountered such opposition, that he was forced to retire to private life. The only edition of his work is the copy of the Paris Codex, which unhappily lacks the first book, issued by Robert Creighton, Vera hist. unionis, . . . sive Concilii Florentini exactissima narratio. The Hague, 1660. See SCHRÖCKH: Kirchengesch., vol. xxxiv. pp. 411 sqq.

TABERNACLE (ôhel mo'ed, or ôhel ha-eduth, or mishkan ha-eduth) denotes the movable sanctuary of the Hebrews prior to the time of Solomon. Other terms are mikdash (Exod. xxv. 8; Lev. xii. 4), mishkân (Exod. xxv. 9), bayith, i.e., house (Exod. xxiii. 19, xxxiv. 26; Josh. vi. 24, ix. 23; Judg. xviii. 31), ôhel, i.e., the tent, also heykât, i.e., temple (1 Sam. i. 9, iii. 3), and ma'ôn, i.e., dwelling (1 Sam. ii. 29, 32).

PREPARATION OF THE BUILDING. — As Jehovah went before the people in the pillar of cloud and of fire, as it was his intention to show and to reveal his presence unto the people, whether they were on the way or in their tents, therefore he promised unto the people, "In all places where I record my name I will come unto thee, and I will bless thee" (Exod. xx. 21). To make this place of blessed meeting a visible reality, not only does God show unto Moses the model pattern of the tabernacle and of all the instruments (Exod. xxv. 9, 40, xxvi. 30, xxvii. 8), but the people are also directed to bring freewill offerings, or rather the material, which is to be used under the direction of Bezaleel and Aholiab. The sin of the golden calf apparently delays the execution. On the intercession of their leader, a tent is pitched (probably that of Moses himself, which had hitherto been the headquarters of consultation) outside of the camp, to be provisionally the tabernacle of meeting. This provisional tent is accepted of God, and dedicated by his divine presence (Exod. xxxiii. 9). After God has become reconciled again to his people, the work is resumed. The people offer the necessary materials in excess of what was wanted (xxxvi. 5, 6). Other workmen (xxxvi. 2) and workwomen (xxxv. 25) place themselves under the direction of Bezaleel of the tribe of Judah, and Aholiab of the tribe of Dan.

STRUCTURE OF THE TABERNACLE AND THE COURT (Exod. xxv.-xxvii., xxxv.-xxxviii.). —

1. The Tabernacle formed a rectangle of thirty cubits long, ten wide, and ten high. The outside length was thirty cubits and a half; the outside width, eleven cubits. The walls were built of forty-eight planks of shittim-wood, overlaid with gold on both sides, ten cubits high, and a cubit and a half broad. Of these boards, which were in close contact with each other, twenty were on the north, and twenty on the south side; for the west end were eight boards. From the foot of each plank came out two "tenons" (yadoth), which were thrust into two silver sockets, of which two were prepared for each plank, each socket being the weight of a talent of silver (xxxviii. 27). These tenons were to be "coupled together." The walls or planks were bound together by five bars or bolts, thrust into rings attached to each plank. These bars ran along the outside: one is said to have gone in the middle. The structure was adorned by four kinds of hangings. The roofing material was canvas, consisting of ten "curtains," each twenty-eight cubits long and four cubits wide. Ten of these were to be "coupled," i.e., sewed together, five in one sheet, and five in another. This was done by means of fifty "loops" and as many taches of "brass." The connecting line run over the curtain of the Holy of holies. This curtain was of byssus, with figures of cherubim stitched upon it, apparently with the art of the embroiderer. The second set of curtains, or tent-roof, of goat's hair, called also ôhel, consisted of eleven pieces of stuff, each thirty cubits long and four cubits wide. They were sewed into two large cloths, and suspended on fifty knobs, or taches, of gold by means of fifty loops. A coat of "rams' skins dyed red, and tachash (A. V. badgers') skins," was furnished as an additional covering (xxvi. 14, mitnalal, i.e., from upward). The entrance to the tabernacle was towards the east, and closed by a "hanging" of byssus, and embroidered, suspended upon five copper-socketed and gilded pillars of acacia-wood by means of golden hooks. A "veil" divided the interior into two apartments, called respectively the "holy place" and the "most holy." This partition-cloth was suspended upon four pillars precisely like those of the door "hanging," except that their sockets were of silver.

2. The Court was a large rectangular enclosure a hundred cubits long and fifty broad. It was composed of a frame of four sides of distinct pillars, with curtains hung upon them. The sixty wooden pillars were five cubits in height. At the bottom they were protected or shod by sockets of brass. At the top these pillars had a capital, which was overlaid with silver. Connected with the head of the pillar were hooks and rods, joining one pillar to another. These rods were laid upon the hooks, and served to attach the hangings to, and suspend from them. The hooks and rods were silver. The hangings of the court were of twined shesh, that is, a fabric woven out of twisted yarn of the material called shesh (A. V., fine linen).

THE FURNITURE OF THE TABERNACLE. — The only piece of furniture within the inner or most holy place was the ark of the covenant (q. v.). The furniture of the outer room, or holy place, consisted of the altar of incense, the table of shewbread, and the "golden candlestick" (q. v.). In the court was the altar of burnt offering and the laver (q. v.).

3. Provisions for the Transport (Num. iv. 4-33). The Levitical family of Kohath, to which Aaron's family also belonged, had to carry all the vessels of the Holy of holies (Num. iv. 4, 15). Then came the family of Gershon with the tabernacle and its lighter furniture, while the Merarites had charge of its heavier appurtenances. The sons of Aaron prepared for the removal by covering every thing in the Holy of holies with a purple cloth. The Kohathites had to carry every thing on their shoulders: the Merarites had four wagons for their transport.

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE TABERNACLE. — As the name indicates, it was to be the dwelling of Jehovah in the midst of his people. As king of his people he dwells in his palace. His throne is over the kophereth ("the mercy-seat"), between the cherubim, which, however, must not be taken in an anthropopathic manner. If there was to be a mutual relation between the holy and living God and his people, which he selected from among the nations of the earth to be the bearer of his name, revelation, and word, it was necessary to have some means of approaching God. This access is mediated in a gradual manner. In the court, as the lowest grade, the people meet, partly to bring their offerings to Jehovah, partly to hear the revelation of his divine will, and to receive his mercy and blessing. Being sinful, the people do not dare yet to enter the sanctuary: they need human mediators, the priests, who in their stead present themselves to God. But the priests themselves can only approach Jehovah in an immediate manner in their high priest, who only once in the year can enter the Holy of holies, where the throne of Jehovah's glory is. This leads us to the New-Testament idea of the Tabernacle (cf. Heb. viii. 2, 5, ix. 1-11, 23 sq., x. 1, 19 sq.; cf. Col. ii. 17; Eph. ii. 14, 22; Rev. xxi. 3), — that the entire structure of the tabernacle was nothing but a typical prophecy of the New-Testament economy, according to which, after the eternal high priest had entered the Holy of holies with his own blood, all curtains are removed, and that all who have become Abraham's children by faith have a daily access to the mercy-seat, and that they shall once also enter the Holy of holies of the heaven (Heb. xii. 14 sq., 23 sq.). As to the symbolic signification of the tabernacle, there can be no doubt that the structure of the same was obviously determined by a complex and profound symbolism; but its meaning remains one of the things which will always be guess-work. Jewish rabbis as well as Christian theologians have exercised their ingenuity, with more or less success. Thus the material, not less than the forms, in the Holy of holies, was significant. The metals, colors, and numbers had their signification. Thus three is the numerical "signature" of the Divine Being and of all that stands in any real relation to God (Num. vi. 24-26; Isa. vi. 3). The number three being the "signature" of God, of the Creator, four is the signature of nature, of the created things of the world; not of the world as "without form, and void," but as a kosmos, as the revelation of God so far as nature can reveal him. Five is the symbol of completeness and perfection, while five represents one-half of the "signature" of perfection. Seven (i.e., 3+1) is the note of union between God and the world, the number of religion, the signature of salvation, blessing, peace, perfection. Twelve denotes by multiplication the combination of the signature of God and the signature of the world (3×4).

HISTORY OF THE TABERNACLE. — After the sanctuary was completed, under the direction of Bezaleel and Aholiab, it was dedicated on the first day of the second year from the exodus, and the ritual appointed for it begun (Exod. xl. 2). After the entrance into Canaan, the tabernacle was in the camp of Israel, at Gilgal (Josh. iv. 19, v. 10, vi. 24, ix. 6, x. 6, xiv. 6), and, after the taking and division of the country, at Shiloh (xviii. 1, 10, xix. 51). At Shiloh it continued during the whole period of the judges; but, when the ark of God was taken, the sanctuary lost its glory. It probably became once again a movable sanctuary; less honored, as no longer possessing the symbol of the divine presence, yet cherished by the priesthood, and some portions, at least, of its ritual kept up. For a time it seems, under Saul, to have been settled at Nob (1 Sam. xxi. 1-6), which thus became a priestly city. The massacre of the priests probably caused its removal from Nob to Gibeon, where it connected itself with the worship of the high places (1 Kings iii. 4), while the ark remained at Kirjath-jearim. The capture of Jerusalem, and the erection there of a new tabernacle, with the ark, of which the old had been deprived (2 Sam. vi. 17; 1 Chron. xv. 1), left it little more than a traditional, historical sanctuary. The provisional tabernacle erected by David was to make room for the temple which he intended to build. His purpose was fulfilled by Solomon, who had the tabernacle, and the ark, and all the holy vessels, brought to Jerusalem, and put in some place within the temple, to remain there as holy relics (1 Kings viii. 4; 2 Chron. v. 5).

TABERNACLE is a term originally applied to an ambry above the altar, for the preservation of the Eucharist, contained in the pyx, which had the shape of a tower, more often than of a dove. This ambry stood either on the altar, or was suspended. From the fourteenth century on, the pyx containing the Eucharist was preserved in a stationary place called tabernacles, built either in the form of a tower, and standing near the wall or a pillar, or made like coffers, which were more or less decorated. In both forms they were on the right side of the altar. They form an indispensable piece of furniture in the Church of Rome. In the Evangelical Church, which refuses the ultra-sacramental use of the body of the Lord, they have no liturgical value; yet as works of art there still exist some very fine tabernacles in some evangelical churches, as in Nuremberg and Ulm. Since the sixteenth century, the tabernacles have been connected with the altar in order to be more conspicuous. The tabernacle, as well as the pyx, is also termed kiborium, which must not be connected with the Latin cibus (i.e., food), but with the Greek kiborion, meaning the canopy on the altar, supported by columns. The term ciborium was also applied to the pyx, the monstrance, and to the tabernacle itself, because it formed as it were a protecting cover. The monstrance may be regarded as a portable tabernacle. MEURER.

TABERNACLES, The Feast of (חג הסוכות, ḥag ḥas-sukkot in the LXX., σκηνοπηγία in John vii. 2 and Josephus, σκηναί in Philo, ἡ σκηνή in Plutarch, Symp., iv. 6, 2), also called the feast of ingathering (Exod. xxiii. 16), is the last of the three yearly festivals which the Mosaic law ordained to be celebrated at the tabernacle. The account of its institution is given in Exod. xxiii. 14 sqq.; Lev. xxiii. 34 sqq.; Deut. xvi. 13 sqq. The descriptions of the Old Testament absolutely exclude the hypotheses of some recent writers, who identify the festival with the harvest festivals of heathen peoples. The feast of tabernacles was designed to be a reminder of the time when the Israelites dwelt in booths in the wilderness (Lev. xxiii. 43), and lasted seven days (Lev. xxiii. 39), — from the 15th to the 21st of Tisri. The people were to dwell in booths (Lev. xxiii. 42), and to take "branches of palm-trees, and the boughs of thick trees, and willows of the brook." This festival was emphatically a festival of rejoicing; [and a proverb in Succah says, "He who has never seen the rejoicing at the pouring out of the water of Siloam has never seen rejoicing in his life"]. Burnt, meat, drink, and other offerings were to be made. Deuteronomy alone designates the place of celebrating the feast, — "the place which the Lord shall choose" (xvi. 15). Zechariah (xiv. 16) insists upon its celebration, and Nehemiah (viii. 17) says the feast had not been celebrated since the days of Joshua as it was in his day. This notice cannot exclude, however, all celebration of the festival during the interval (1 Kings viii. 2; 2 Chron. vii. 8-10).

The booths were erected in the streets, outside the walls of Jerusalem, and on the roofs. Joy and mirth prevailed in them. The main features of the public celebration were the sacrifices by day and the illumination at night. Four hundred and twenty-four priests were in attendance, to serve those who brought sacrifices. Once every day the entire congregation encompassed the altar of burnt offerings, waving palm-branches. On the seventh day this was repeated seven times, in memory of Jericho. The branches mentioned in Lev. xxiii. 40 were tied into a bunch, and called lulabh. During the sacrifices the great Hallel (Ps. cxiii.-cxviii.) was sung, and at the twenty-fourth verse of Ps. cxviii. every one shook his palm-branch a number of times. After the sacrifices the priestly blessing was conferred. Wine, and water from the brook of Siloam, were used for the drink-offering, both morning and evening. One of the priests carried a cup of the water through the water-gate of the temple, when another priest took it, with the words, "With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation" (Isa. xii. 3). The priests and people took up the shout; and the priest, going to the altar, mixed it with wine, and poured it out into a duct which led to the Kidron. The origin of this custom is unknown; but it is very generally agreed that our Lord had reference to it when he said, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink" (John vii. 37). The words of John viii. 12 ("I am the light of the world") seem to contain an allusion to the great illumination which took place on the evenings of the feast of tabernacles; four golden lamps, or candelabra, in the court of the women, being illuminated. Upon the lighting of these lights, there followed dancing and processions.

The eighth day of the feast, a sabbath (Lev. xxiii. 39), had a special name, yom azereth, and marked the dismantling of the booths. The seventh day marked the culmination of the feast, and was undoubtedly "the great day of the feast," referred to in John vii. 37. W. PRESSEL.

TABOR (mount). This interesting and remarkable mount in Palestine, at the boundary between Issachar and Zebulun (Josh. xix. 22; Judg. iv. 6, 12, 14), rises abruptly from the north-eastern arm of the plain of Esdraelon, and stands entirely insulated, except on the west, where a narrow ridge connects it with the hills of Nazareth. It presents to the eye, as seen from a distance, a beautiful appearance; being so symmetrical in its proportions, and rounded off like a hemisphere, yet varying somewhat as viewed from different directions, being more conical when seen from the east or west. It is now called Jebel et-Tûr. The body of the mountain consists of the peculiar limestone of the country. Mount Tabor lies about six or eight miles almost due east from Nazareth. The ascent is usually made on the west side, and it requires three-quarters of an hour, or an hour, to reach the top. The path is circuitous, and at times steep. The trees and bushes are generally so thick as to intercept the prospect; but now and then the traveller, as he ascends, comes to an open spot which reveals to him a magnificent view of the plain. All round the top are the foundations of a thick wall built of large stones. The chief remains are upon the ledge of rocks on the south of the little basin, and especially towards its eastern end. The walls and traces of a fortress are seen here. Whilst now a little chapel stands here, where the priests from Nazareth perform divine service, in olden times the mountains had cities and a large population. Thus a city of Tabor is mentioned in the lists of 1 Chron. vi. as a city of the Merarite Levites in the tribe of Zebulun (77). Mount Tabor makes a prominent figure in ancient history. Here Barak assembled his forces against Sisera (Judg. iv. 6-15). The brothers of Gideon were murdered here by Zebah and Zalmunna (viii. 18, 19). In the year B.C. 218 Antiochus the Great got possession of Tabor by stratagem, and strengthened its fortifications. In the monastic ages Tabor, in consequence, partly, of a belief that it was the scene of the Saviour's transfiguration, was crowded with hermits (but there is no foundation for this tradition); partly because, according to Matt. xvii. 1, Mark ix. 2, Luke ix. 28, the transfiguration must have taken place on some high mountain near Cæsarea-Philippi; and partly because a fortified and inhabited place could hardly have been a proper place for such a scene. The crusaders again fortified the mount, at whose base the main street runs from Egypt to Damascus. In their time Mount Tabor was an archiepiscopal see belonging to the Patriarch of Jerusalem. Tancred built there a monastery, and the Cluniacensians a monastery. But all was lost in the battle of Hattin, July 5, 1187.

The Saracens, under Saladin, destroyed the fortresses; and in 1253 Brocardes only found the remains of palaces, convents, and churches there.

TADMOR, mentioned only in 2 Chron. viii. 1, is undoubtedly the name of that ancient city which to the Greeks, Romans, and to modern Europe, is known by the name of Palmyra. In the Chronicles the city is mentioned as having been built by Solomon after his conquest of Hamath-zobah, and is named in conjunction with "all the store cities which he built in Hamath." It was probably built with the view of securing an interest in, and command over, the great caravan traffic from the East, similar to that which he had established in respect to the trade between Syria and Egypt. We do not again read of Tadmor in Scripture, nor is it likely that the Hebrews retained possession of it long after the death of Solomon. No other source acquaints us with the subsequent history of the place, till it re-appears in the account of Pliny (Hist. Nat., v. 24) as a considerable town, which, along with its territory, formed an independent state between the Roman and Parthian Empires. In the second century it seems to have been beautified by the Emperor Hadrian, as may be inferred from a statement of Stephanus of Byzantium, as to the name of the city having been changed to Hadrianopolis ("city of Hadrian"). Under Septimius Severus it became a Roman colony, and received the jus Italicum; but it had a government of its own, and was ruled by its own laws. The most interesting period in the history of Tadmor is the time of Odenathus and Zenobia. The Emperor Valerian being captured by the Persians, Odenathus, one of the citizens of Palmyra, revenged the wrongs of the fallen emperor, and vindicated the majesty of Rome. He marched against the Persians, took the province of Mesopotamia, and defied Sapor beneath the walls of Ctesiphon (A.D. 260). The services thus rendered to Rome were so great, that Odenathus was associated in the sovereignty with Gallienus (A.D. 264). He enjoyed his dignity but a short time, being murdered only three years afterwards. Zenobia, his widow, succeeded Odenathus as Queen of the East, and ruled the country during a period of five years. In A.D. 271 the Emperor Aurelian turned his arms against her; and having defeated her in a pitched battle near Antioch, and in another at Emesa, he drove her back upon her desert home. He then marched his veterans across the parched plains, and invested Palmyra. Zenobia attempted to escape, but was captured, and brought back to the presence of the conqueror. She was taken to Rome, and there she was led along in front of the triumphant Aurelian. Palmyra, which was taken in A.D. 272, never recovered its former opulence. Twenty years later, under the reign of Diocletian, the walls of the city were rebuilt. It eventually became the seat of a bishop, but never recovered any importance. When the successors of Mohammed extended their conquests beyond the confines of Arabia, Palmyra became subject to the caliphs. From this period Palmyra seems to have gradually fallen into decay. Not once is it mentioned in the history of the crusades. In 1173 it was visited by Benjamin of Tudela, who found there a large Jewish population, besides Mohammedans and Christians. It was again visited in 1751 by Wood and Dawkins. In our century many travellers have visited the place, and their descriptions are very valuable. A complete list of all travels till the year 1851 is given by Ritter, Erdkunde von Kleinasien, vol. viii. 2d division, 3d section, pp. 1432 sq.

TAI-PING (great peace), a Chinese religious sect established by Hung-Siu-Tsuen, b. in a little village thirty miles from Canton, 1813; d. at Nanking, July 19, 1862. While on a visit to Canton to attend the official examinations, he received from I. J. Roberts, an American missionary, a package of tracts in Chinese. Five years afterwards he fell sick, and had visions, in which an old man with a golden beard commanded him to destroy the demons (i.e., the idol-gods) of his countrymen. He then first read the tracts; and associating the man in his visions with Christ, and catching up several Christian ideas, he abandoned the Chinese religion, and started forth valiantly to preach his new faith. He retired to the mountains, and gathered by 1840 many converts, whom he styled "God-worshippers." He carried out his supposed commission, and destroyed some Buddhist idols. This brought him in conflict with the government, so that he again retired to the mountains. In 1850 he started upon a new enterprise. The time was ripe for rebellion; and he shrewdly proclaimed himself as sent by Heaven to drive out the Tartars, and set up a native Chinese dynasty. His standard was pushed victoriously forward. Nanking was captured in 1852. The Tai-ping dynasty was founded, with himself as the first emperor, under the title Teen-Wang ("the heavenly king"). The rebels would probably have been able to carry out their plans, had they not been defeated by the English and French troops, acting in concert with the Chinese. When Nanking was taken, Siu-Tsuen burned himself and wives in his palace.

Siu-Tsuen's religious views were a mixture of Christian and Chinese elements. He considered Christ the oldest of the sons of God, and himself one of the younger. In his manifestoes he grouped God the Father, Jesus Christ, himself and his son, whom he styled the "Junior Lord," as the co-equal rulers of the universe. He adopted baptism, but rejected the Lord's Supper, allowed polygamy (he had himself a hundred and eighteen wives), punished adultery and opium-smoking with death. Cf. TAIT, Archibald Campbell, Archbishop of Canterbury; the son of Craufurd Tait, Esq., a Scotch lawyer; was b. in Edinburgh, Dec. 22, 1811; d. at Croydon, Dec. 3, 1882. After passing through the high school and academy of Edinburgh, he went in 1827 to Glasgow University, and in 1830 entered Balliol College, Oxford, graduating B.A. with first-class honors, and becoming fellow and tutor. He took a prominent part in opposing Tractarianism, and was one of the four tutors who entered a protest against Tract No. 90, written to show that a Roman Catholic might sign the Thirty-nine Articles. In 1842 he was appointed Dr. Arnold's successor at Rugby, administering the office with success. While at Rugby he married a daughter of Archdeacon Spooner. Mrs. Tait died Dec. 1, 1878. In 1850 Mr. Tait accepted the deanery of Carlisle, and became well known as a hard-working parish clergyman. In 1856 he was appointed Bishop of London, as successor of Dr. Blomfield; the immediate occasion of the appointment being, as it is supposed, the Queen's sympathy for him in the loss of five daughters by scarlet-fever. Bishop Tait initiated the scheme for raising a million pounds to meet the deficiency of church accommodation in London. In 1868 he was raised to the see of Canterbury, he having before refused the archbishopric of York. Dr. Tait presided over the Pan-Anglican synod at Lambeth, July, 1878. His only son died in 1878. Archbishop Tait was a representative of Low-Church views, and managed with great courtesy and excellent judgment the conflicting relations of the ritualists, and ecclesiastical law of England. He was a man of sound piety and practical common sense rather than of pre-eminent literary attainments. His relations to dissenting ecclesiastical bodies were friendly, as is witnessed by his letter to the Evangelical Alliance held in New York, 1873. Among his published writings are two volumes of Sermons, 1861; The Dangers and Safeguards of Modern Theology, 1861; The Word of God and the Ground of Faith, 1863, 1864, 2 parts; Some Thoughts on the Duties of the Church of England (a clerical charge), 1876; The Church of the Future (a clerical charge), 1880, etc. See Memorials of Catharine and Craufurd Tait, by Rev. W. BENHAM, London and New York, 1880; A. C. BICKLEY: A Sketch of the Public Life of the Late Archbishop of Canterbury [A. C. Tait], London, 1883; Laud and Tait, by a churchman, London, 1883.

TALLIS, Thomas, b. about 1529; d. Nov. 25, 1585. He was organist of the Chapel Royal, under Queen Elizabeth, and has been styled the "father of English cathedral music." He published, with his pupil William Byrd, a collection of music for churches, which is still in use.

TALMUD, written also THALMUD (from lamad, "to learn"), is the designation given by the Jews to their body of law not comprised in the Pentateuch. It was long forbidden to reduce it to writing; and hence it bears the name of the oral law, to distinguish it from the written law contained in the five books of Moses, of which it professes to be the guardian (hedge) and explanation. According to the rabbis, the oral law was necessary from the beginning for the understanding of the written law, and was actually given to Moses by God. This latter point they attempt to prove by appealing to Exod. xxiv. 12, where the Lord declares to Moses, "I will give thee tables of stone, and a law, and commandments which I have written; that thou mayest teach them." Of these words we have in the Talmud (Berakhoth, fol. 5 a) this curious exposition: "The tables are the ten commandments. The law is the written law. The commandments is the Mishna. Which I have written means the prophets and Hagiographa. To teach them means the Gemara. It teaches us that they were all given to Moses from Sinai." In this quotation, mention is made of the two parts of which the Talmud is composed, — the Mishna and the Gemara. The former is the text, and the latter the commentary. The name Talmud is often restricted, especially by Jewish writers, to the Gemara. The compiler of the Mishna (from shanah, "to repeat," also "to learn") was Rabbi Jehudah, surnamed Hak-kadosh, the Holy, and Hannasi, the Prince. He is often called simply rabbi by way of eminence. According to Jost, he died A.D. 219 or 220; according to others, shortly before the close of the second century. He undertook to sift and reduce to order the oral law. Such an attempt had been made before him, but he completed the work. He wrote nothing down, but arranged every thing in his mind. He twice subjected his compilation to a revision and correction. The doctors introduced as speaking in the Mishna are called Tanaim, from the Aramaic form of the root of Mishna. The Tanaim profess to be the repeaters of tradition. The teachers of the oral law were first called scribes (Sopherim), next elders (Zekanim), next the wise (Chakhamim); after the destruction of Jerusalem, A.D. 70, Tanaim: after the compilation of the Mishna till the completion of the Gemara, Amoraim, lit., speakers, interpreters. Comp. Jost's Geschichte des Judenthums, ii. pp. 219 sq.

The Mishna is divided into six books or orders (sedarim), entitled (1) Zeraim, seeds; (2) Moed, festivals; (3) Nashim, women; (4) Nezikim, damages; (5) Kodoshim, sacred things; (6) Tohoroth, purifications. Under these six orders there are sixty-three treatises, which are again subdivided into chapters. After the completion of the official Mishna by Rabbi Jehudah, additional laws were collected by his successors; but they were not incorporated in the proper Mishna, but kept distinct from it; and this is indicated by the designation given to these extra-Mishnaic laws, Baraitas, from the word bar or bara, which means without. There are also additions to the Mishna, called Toseftas, collected during the third century. It was not till the year 550 A.D. that the Mishna was committed to writing (comp. Graetz: Geschichte der Juden, iv. p. 494). The scribes, by setting up their oral law, violated the strict injunction not to add to the law of Moses (Deut. iv. 2). Traditional precepts additional to the written law were at an early date current in Israel. Isaiah complains of these human ordinances (Isa. xxix. 13); and our Lord charged the Pharisees with making the word of God of none effect by their traditions. The oral law, instead of securing the observance of the written law, superseded it. Very significantly is it said in the Book Sohar, "The grave of Moses in the Mishna, and therefore no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day." The Sadducees rejected the divine authority of the oral law; and so do the Karaites, who arose in the eighth century, and who, though few in number, still exist as a distinct sect. The Mishna was not sufficient to satisfy the Jewish doctors. On its basis they formed the Gemara, a word meaning complement, or doctrine; for it can bear both these significations. The Gemara exhibits the opinions and discussions of the wise men on the Mishna. There are two Gemaras, called the Jerusalemite and the Babylonian, both expounding the same Mishnaic text. It was at Tiberias, near the close of the fourth century, that the redaction of what is commonly called the Jerusalemite Talmud was finished. Hence its proper title should be, not the Talmud of Jerusalem, but the Palestinian or Western Talmud. Its compilation is often attributed to Rabbi Jochanan of Tiberias, who, however, only began the work, being the first of the Amoraim, or doctors of the Gemara.

The Babylonian Talmud had for its chief compiler Rabbi Ashe, head, till 427 A.D., of the school of Sura in Babylon; but its completion was reserved for Rabbi Abina, who died in 498, and who is regarded as the last of the Gemaric doctors. The mass of traditions ascribed falsely to Moses went on increasing from age to age by the addition of the sayings of later doctors; and thus, like a snowball, the longer it rolled, the greater the bulk of the conglomeration.

It should be stated that only a portion of the treatises of the Mishna have their commentary in the Gemara. The Babylonian Talmud is much more highly esteemed by the Jews than the Jerusalemite, and is about four times as large as the latter. It contains two thousand nine hundred and forty-seven leaves, or double that number of folio pages. Its paging in the various editions is kept uniform, to facilitate reference. The Mishna is written, for the most part, in Hebrew in its later form, with a mixture of foreign words (Aramaic, Greek, and Latin). It is composed with extreme conciseness; the aim in expression being to use the fewest words possible, so as not to overburden the memory, when it was unlawful to write down the oral law. The language of the Gemara is a corrupt Chaldee or Aramaic. The Talmud is without vowel-points, and abounds in abbreviations. Delitzsch specifies brachylogy as characteristic of its style. Deutsch affirms, that, "in the whole realm of learning, there is scarcely a single branch of study to be compared for its difficulty to the Talmud." Lightfoot, in the preface to his Hocce Hebraica et Talmudica, thus depicts the unattractiveness of the Talmudic writings: "The almost unconquerable difficulty of the style, the frightful roughness of the language, and the amazing emptiness and sophistry of the matters handled, do torture, vex, and tire him that reads them. In no writers is greater or equal trifling." But he adds, "And yet in none is greater or so great benefit." And he maintains that Christians "may render them most usefully serviceable to their studies, and most eminently tending to the interpretation of the New Testament."

The Talmud treats of a vast variety of subjects. There are separate works on its civil and criminal law, its religious philosophy, its ethics, its psychology, its education, mathematics, medicine, magic, geography, zoology, botany, etc. Dr. Pick in his article on the Talmud, referred to below, gives the titles of monographs on all these subjects. The Talmud is described by Disraeli, in his Genius of Judaism, as containing a "prodigious mass of contradictory opinions, an infinite number of casuistical cases, a logic of scholastic theology, some recondite wisdom and much rambling dotage, many puerile tales and Oriental fancies, ethics and sophisms, reasonings and unreasonings, subtle solutions, and maxims and riddles. Nothing in human life seems to have happened which these doctors have not perplexed or provided against."

It is not necessary to take much trouble to find in the Talmud places illustrating these charges. Wagenseil (Teled Igna, p. 587) refers to the very first words of the Mishna to show the contradictory opinions which are brought together in the Talmud. It begins with the question regarding the time of evening prayer. The answer of the Mishna and Gemara to this simple question will be found in Pressel's article on the Talmud, in the first edition of Herzog's Real-Encyclopædie. Those who have the patience to read it will admit that it fully establishes the point for which Wagenseil made the reference. Two distinct currents of teaching may be traced in the Talmud. These are denominated respectively Halakha and Haggadha. Halakha from halakh, ("to go") means the way which one ought to go, rule, authoritative precept. Haggadha is literally what is said, declared. It is homiletical teaching, intended to edify, console, or even to entertain, and combines instruction with parable and legend. The Talmud commends the study of the oral law above that of the written word of God. "Attend, my son, to the words of the scribes rather than to the law of Moses" (Tract. Gittin, fol. 75 a). "He who goes from the Halakha to the written word has no more peace" (Tract. Chagigah, fol. 10 a). A man is directed to divide his time into three parts, and to devote one-third of it to the written law, one-third to the Mishna, and one-third to the Gemara. And the man who transgresses the words of the scribes is pronounced worthy of death (Tract. Eruvin, 21 b). Such views of the Talmud are now discarded by the more enlightened Jews. But there has been of late a persistent attempt made by Jews, who own its human origin, to glorify the Talmud at the expense of the New Testament. Deutsch's celebrated article, which appeared in The Quarterly Review, London, October, 1867, is the best known essay of this kind in the English language. But it is only one of a considerable number of writings having the same aim. Deutsch makes Christianity to have appropriated the teaching of the Jewish doctors of the Mishnaic period, and "to have carried those golden gems, hidden in the schools and among the silent community of the learned, into the market of humanity." He would have us to regard even Paul's doctrine concerning faith as genuine Pharisaism! "The faith of the heart—the dogma prominently dwelt upon by Paul—was a thing that stood much higher with the Pharisees than the outward law. It was a thing, they said, not to be commanded by any ordinance, yet was greater than all. 'Every thing,' is one of their adages, 'is in the hands of Heaven, save the fear of Heaven.'" How any one who had read Paul's writings could make faith in his system of doctrine identical with the simple fear of God may well excite astonishment. The adage which Deutsch quotes, and which is a rabbinical commonplace, is diametrically opposed to the great principle of salvation by grace, which Paul so strongly insisted on (comp. Eph. ii. 1-10), and contradicts the Old Testament, which expressly teaches that it is in the power of God to infuse his fear into the heart of man. "I will put my fear in their hearts," is a promise which the Lord has actually made (Jer. xxxii. 40, comp. xxxi. 33; Ps. lxxxvi. 11; Dent. xxx. 6).

It is matter of debate whether or not the Talmud sanctions the doctrine of original sin. Graetz and Deutsch deny that it does. But Jost (Gesch. d. Jud., i. 265) expresses the opposite view. Some Christian writers have affirmed that the teaching of the rabbis on this subject does not differ from the orthodox doctrine of the church. But Vitringa (Obs. cr. Sac., L., iii., C., ix.) shows that the difference between them is real and important. According to the Jewish doctors, it is the connection of the soul with the body that produces the yetser ra, the evil disposition. Borrowing from Platonism or Oriental sources, they make the body the originating cause of the inclination to sin. To adopt the language of Vitringa, the church places the seat of corruption in the mind; the synagogue, in the body.

Among the questions debated by the wise men in Israel was one which is freely discussed in the present day; viz., "Is life worth living?" For full two years and a half the schools of Shammai and Hillel contended on the point whether it were better for man to have been created or not. When at last a vote was taken, a majority declared that it would have been better for man not to have been created. To this decision the addition was made, that, since man is in being, he is to be very careful in his actions (Eruvin, 2). We are utterly at a loss to understand how Graetz (Gesch., iv. 235), Deutsch, and others could assert that the Mishna, as distinguished from the Gemara, knows nothing of a hell. If this were true, then we might vindicate for the New Testament independence of Mishnaic teaching on this point. But that treatise of the Mishna, the Pirke Aboth, from which Deutsch has culled his choicest sentences, contains in its first chapter these words: "The wise have said, Every one who talks much with the woman (his own wife, as the context shows) lays up evil for himself, and ceases from the words of the law, and his end is—he shall inherit hell (Gehenna)."

Whatever may be stated to the contrary, the Talmud, in opposition to the Old Testament, sanctions astrology. It is true, that in one place it is taught that a majority of the rabbis (not all) maintained that Israel was not under the influence of the stars, as the heathen nations confessedly are (Shabbath, fol. 156). Rashi explains that God changed the names of Abram and Sarai to Abraham and Sarah, in order that they might escape the baleful influence of the stars, and have a son. Astrology, as affecting all, without exception, is taught in various places in the Talmud (comp. McCaul: Old Paths, chap. xxiii.).

"Life, children, and a livelihood depend not on merit, but on the influence of the stars. . . . An eclipse of the sun is an evil sign to the nations of the world. An eclipse of the moon is an evil sign to Israel; for Israel reckons by the moon, the nations of the world, by the sun."

The virtue of amulets is recognized both in the Mishna and in the Gemara. The Mishna (Shabbath, fol. 61 a) teaches it is not lawful to go forth on the sabbath with an amulet that is not approved. An approved amulet is one that has cured three men (comp. Buxtorf: Lex. Talmud., p. 2057, under Qamla). The charm prescribed in the Talmud for the scratch and bite of a mad dog has been often quoted. It is an extraordinary specimen of profane folly. We give the briefer and less known statement of the way by which we may obtain a sight of the mischievous demons, invisible to ordinary eyes, who wear out the clothes of the rabbis by rubbing against them, cause bruised legs, and want of room at the sermon:—

"Whosoever wishes to see them, let him take the interior covering of a black cat, the daughter of a first-born black cat, which is also the daughter of a first-born, and let him burn it in the fire, and pulverize it, and let him then fill his eyes with it, and he will see them," etc. (Berakhoth, fol. 6 a).

The little effect, it has been rightly observed, produced on the minds of the scribes and Pharisees by the display of divine power in the miracles wrought by our Lord and his disciples, was largely owing to their faith in charms and magical arts. They forgot the teaching of the law of Moses, for the observance of which they could profess such zeal (Dent. xviii. 10-12).

It is idle to quote from the Talmud examples of teaching similar to what we read in the Gospels, and thence to argue the dependence of the latter on the former. The Gospels were, we know, extant in a permanent written form long before the Mishna was compiled, and centuries before it was reduced to writing. And what if authorities for Talmudic sayings analogous to words in the New Testament can be shown to have imbibed instruction from Christians? This can be done. The Mishnaic doctor Rabbi Eliezer, to whom a striking saying, very like one uttered by our Lord, is credited, confessed to Rabbi Akiba that he had intercourse with James, a disciple of Jesus of Nazareth, and that he was greatly pleased with instruction which James communicated to him as he had heard it from Jesus (Aboda Sara, fol. 16, 17). So Jonathan ben Joseph, whose teaching (Tract. Joma, 85 b) strikingly resembles that of our Saviour concerning the sabbath, is said to have had much intercourse with Christians (comp. Biesenthal: Zur Geschichte der christl. Kirche, elftes Kap.). Biesenthal calls attention to the fact that the Mishna (Tract. Megillah, cap. 1, 9) prohibits the use of Christian phrases in the public prayers of the synagogue. Expressions recognized as of Christian origin were actually heard, according to the testimony of the Mishna, at the public worship of the Jews. It is admitted, too, that the Talmud has borrowed from the neighbors of the Babylonian Jews superstitious views, and practices notoriously contrary to the spirit of Judaism (Graetz, iv. p. 410). Why, then, may it not have appropriated Christian sentiments also?

Of the rabbis whose life and teaching are related in the Talmud, none has of late years been so much spoken of as Hillel, who was still alive when our Saviour was born. The attempt has been repeatedly made to represent Jesus as standing in the relation of dependence on Hillel, as having appropriated his doctrines, and given them a wider circulation. To give some plausibility to this attempt, even the few sayings of Hillel which can fairly be compared with words of our Lord have been sometimes mis-translated. But Hillel's whole bearing toward the traditions of the elders was the very opposite of Christ's. According to Hillel, the unlearned man, who is not a student of the oral law, cannot be pious (Pirke Aboth, ii. 5; Am haarets lo chasil). Hillel's famous saying about not doing to others what we should not like to be done to ourselves is, as Jost observes, repeated by him as a rule with which people were familiar. It is not an original thought of his; and, unlike the "Golden Rule" enunciated by Christ, it sets forth only the negative side of our duty to our neighbor. A full and fair statement of what the Talmud contains regarding Hillel is the best answer to the attempt to degrade Jesus from his unique position of having none of the sons of men worthy to be placed on a line with him. Indeed, the account which Jost gives of Hillel is of itself sufficient to show how absurd it is to think of comparing him with our Saviour (comp. Jost's Gesch. des Jud., i. pp. 254-270, and Delitzsch's Jesus und Hillel. The English reader may consult Schaff's History of the Christian Church, i. pp. 159 sq.). The precious sayings ascribed to Hillel and others, which have been extracted from the Talmud, are, to use Da Costa's language, "a few bright pearls found at the bottom of an immense heap of rubbish."

Hillel's disciples, who were the contemporaries of Christ, and leading scribes of his day, must have been extraordinary men. The Talmud tells us of them, that "thirty of them were as worthy as Moses to have the Shechinah resting on them. Thirty others were as worthy as Joshua, the son of Nun, that for them the sun should stand still." The least of all of them knew, among other things, "the language of demons, the language of palm-trees, and the language of the ministering angels" (Bava Batra, fol. 131 a). The knowledge of these languages was in order to use enchantments. This is what the Talmud has to say of the Jewish leaders who would not acknowledge the claims of Jesus.

One is interested to know what the Talmud relates concerning the Founder of Christianity and his church. Those who have investigated this subject (Wagenseil: Telea Ignea, pp. 57 sq.) allow, that in the Mishna, as distinguished from the Gemara, no word of blasphemy against Christ can be found. There are, however, allusions to Christian practices even in the Mishna (Biesenthal, ubi supra). The horrid blasphemies against Jesus contained in the Gemara, the older Jews, fearful of persecution, tried to refer to another Jesus than the author of the Christian religion. But modern Jews have abandoned this evasion. The English reader will find the principal blasphemous passages reflecting on the origin and character of our Saviour in Lardner's Collection of Jewish and Heathen Testimonies (chap. v.). He will see there that the rabbis have exhibited the same malicious spirit of foul invention against the Roman general Titus, and he may form his own judgment of the trustworthiness of the Talmud on historical questions. Jost confesses (i. p. 404, note) that the Babylonian rabbis are in error beyond conception in regard to the time of Jesus, making him to have lived a hundred years too early, and that, in regard to the early Christians, the rabbis of the third or fourth century grope entirely in the dark, and have recourse to unjustifiable fables. The unmentionable calumnies fabricated against the mother of Jesus (they call her Stada: see Buxtorf: Lex. Talm., pp. 1458 sq.) are perhaps without a parallel. The account of the trial of Christ's five disciples (given also by Lardner) is one of the strangest specimens of transparent fiction, and of silly trifling with the words of Scripture. In the Basel edition of the Talmud the blasphemies against Christ are omitted.

The Mishna has been translated by Surenhusius, Rabe, and Jost. But, though a translation of the whole Talmud has been promised and begun, there is yet no complete version of it in any language. In an age in which the sacred books of all nations are made accessible to those who cannot study them in the original, those who speak of the inexhaustible mine of wisdom hidden in the Talmud ought not to suffer it to be concealed in a language which few can read. Geiger (Jüdische Zeitschrift, 1869, p. 197) affirms that even Ewald, the celebrated Hebrew grammarian, could not accurately understand and translate a single sentence of the Talmud. [M. Schwab has begun a translation into French of Le Talmud de Jérusalem, Paris, 1872 sqq., tom. 5, 1882.]

TAMMUZ, a sun-god, worshipped with peculiar rites by women among the Chaldeans, and even in Jerusalem (Ezek. viii. 14). In Babylon, and also in the Jewish sacred year, his month was from June 20 to July 20, the time when the days begin to shorten; in Jerusalem in the autumn, when the nights begin to be longer than the days. His annual festival, which celebrated his supposed death and resurrection, was a time of mourning, followed by one of joy. The old (Cyril of Alexandria and Jerome) and the majority of the new commentators connect Tammuz and Adonis, who was similarly mourned for. In the beautiful story of Istar's descent to Hades, Lenormant (Premières civilisations, vol. ii. pp. 82-99) sees the Tammuz legend, because Istar is the widow of the "Son of life," Du-mu-zi (DMZ) or Dû-zi, which he thinks was changed into T M Z, as might easily be, in view of the frequency with which D and T exchange places. Tammuz was the name of the fourth month of the Jewish sacred year. See W. BAUDISSIN: Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, vol. i. pp. 300 sq.; SCHRADER: Keilinschriften u. das A. T., 2d ed. p. 125.

TANCHELM, or TANCHELIN, or TANQUELIN, is a characteristic specimen of that peculiar kind of opponents which arose in various places, towards the close of the eleventh and in the beginning of the twelfth century, attacking, sometimes the dead dogmas of the scholastic speculation, sometimes the hypocrisy and corruption of the clergy, but sometimes, also, the whole fabric of the Church of Rome. Thus Tanchelm rejected not only the Pope, the bishops, the clergy, but the whole existing church, which he designated as a lupanaria. The true church comprised only his followers, for he alone had the fulness of the spirit of God. He preached in Holland, and caused great disturbances, as he was generally received by women and persons of the lower classes as an angel from heaven. From Utrecht he was expelled by the Archbishop of Cologne. He afterwards appeared at Bruges and Antwerp; finally he was killed on board a vessel, by a priest, 1124 or 1125. The followers were brought back into the church by St. Norbert. See Epistola Trajectensis eccl. ad Fridericum Archiepiscopum Coloniensem, in TENGNAGEL, Collectio veterum monument., Ingolstadt, 1612, and in D'ARGENTRÉ, Collectio judiciorum, Liège, 1728, tom. i. NEUDECKER.

TANCRED OF BOLOGNA, sometimes but mistakenly designated as Tancredus de Corneto, was one of the most celebrated canonists of his time; taught at Bologna since 1210, and was in 1226 made archdeacon at the cathedral. His Summa de matrimonio was written between 1210 and 1213. The first printed edition of it, by Simon Schard (Cologne, 1563), is much interpolated. The best edition is that by Agathon Wunderlich, Göttingen, 1841. Of much greater importance is his Ordo judiciorum, written in 1214, often re-edited, and steadily used for many centuries. Best edition by Bergmann, Göttingen, 1842. H. F. JACOBSON.

TÂOISM is a popular and widespread religion of China, recognized by the government, which, in A.D. 1015, granted large tracts of land as an endowment for its pope, or hereditary chief, whose name is Chang, and title, Heavenly Master, and who lives on the Lung-hû mountain, in the department of Kwang-hsin, Chiang-hsi. Tâoism was originally not an organized religion, but a mass of indigenous Chinese superstitions, a belief in magic and kindred hallucinations. Its priests were necromancers, and its objects of worship were spirits. Under the rivalry of Buddhism, introduced from India A.D. 65, Tâoism was developed into a religion with idols, temples, monasteries, and public services. The three great idols found in Tâoist temples are called San Ch'ing ("The Three Holy Ones"); viz., "The Perfect Holy One," "The Highest Holy One" (Lâo-tze), and "The Greatest Holy One." But, besides this triad, Tâoism owns innumerable gods. Confucius unhappily ignored, rather than opposed, the base superstitions out of which Tâoism sprang, and so did nothing to destroy their force. The latter now makes common cause with Buddhism; so that the shaven Buddhist and the "yellow-topped" Tâoist "priests" (so called) are seen officiating side by side in the same service. Frequent attempts have been made to unite the sects, but the Tâoists have always refused to adopt the celibacy of the Buddhists. One feature of Tâoism is its eschatology. It teaches that each one has three souls, one of which remains with the corpse, one with the spirit-tablet, while the third is carried off to purgatory, which consists "of ten courts of justice, situated at the bottom of a great ocean which lies down in the depths of the earth." The soul can pass through endless transmigrations; and, if its punishments do not improve it, it is assigned to an endless hell. Some become "immortals" without passing through purgatory. The offerings of the living, and the services of the priests (either Buddhist or Tâoist), deliver souls from purgatory. The two most important functions of a Tâoist priest are, (1) to deliver unfortunate persons from the domination of evil spirits, and (2) to choose grave-sites. He does the first by writing charms, and preparing amulets. The head of the religion has unrivalled skill in this way. "It is said, that about his residence on the Lung-hû mountain there are thousands of jars in rows, all tenanted by demons whom the great magician has shut up in them." The second function is very important; for, if a proper spot be not selected, "the spirit of the dead is made unhappy, and avenges itself by causing sickness and other calamities to the relatives who have not taken sufficient care for its repose." The Taoist priest selects the site on geomantic principles.

TAPPAN, David, D.D., Congregationalist; b. at Manchester, Mass., April 21, 1752; d. at Cambridge, Aug. 27, 1803. He was graduated at Harvard University, 1771; was pastor of Third Church in Newbury, 1774, until, on Dec. 26, 1792, he became Hollis Professor of Divinity in Harvard University. He held the position at his death. After his death, two volumes of his writings appeared, — Sermons on Important Subjects, Boston, 1807; Lectures on Jewish Antiquities, 1807. See biographical sketch in the first-named volume; also SPRAGUE: Annals, ii. pp. 97-103.

TAPPAN, Henry Philip, D.D., LL.D.; b. at Rhinebeck, N.Y., April 23, 1805; d. at Vevey, Switzerland, November, 1881. He was graduated at Union College, 1825; studied theology at Princeton; was pastor of a Reformed Dutch church in Schenectady, N.Y., and subsequently of a Congregationalist church in Pittsfield, Mass. (1828-32). From 1832 to 1835 he was professor of moral philosophy in the University of the City of New York. After keeping a private school for some years, he was elected chancellor of the University of Michigan in 1852, and held the office until 1863, when he resigned. He spent the rest of his days in Europe. He was an eminent educational and philosophical writer. He was a corresponding member of the Institute of France, 1859. Among his works may be mentioned, A Review of Edwards's On the Will, New York, 1839; Doctrine of the Will determined by an Appeal to Consciousness, 1840; Doctrine of the Will applied to Moral Agency and Responsibility, 1841 (the three volumes were issued in a revised form in Glasgow, 1857, 1 vol.); Elements of Logic, 1841, new ed., 1856.

TAPPAN, William Bingham, b. at Beverly, Mass., Oct. 29, 1794; d. at West Needham, Mass., June 18, 1849; began life as an apprentice in Boston, but removed to Philadelphia, 1815, and was there engaged in business and in teaching. From 1822 he was in the employ of the American Sunday-school Union, and in its service lived a while in Cincinnati, but chiefly in Boston. In 1841 he was licensed as a Congregational preacher. He published New-England and Other Poems, 1819; Poems, 1822; Lyrics, September, 1822; and, after a long interval, Poems and Lyrics, 1842; Poetry of the Heart, 1845; Sacred and Miscellane- ous Poems, 1846; Poetry of Life, 1847; The Sunday School, etc., 1848; Late and Early Poems, 1849. Some of these are reprints; but Griswold called him "the most industrious and voluminous of our religious poets." Some of his hymns have been extensively used, especially the two beginning "There is an hour," which appeared in his first volume, 1819. F. M. BIRD.

TARASIVS, Patriarch of Constantinople; d. 806; was secretary of state during the reign of Constantine and Irene; and, when the empress discovered that he was an ardent worshipper of images, she raised him, in 784, to the patriarchal see of Constantinople, though he was a layman. By some adroit manoeuvres he procured the recognition even of Adrian I.; and at the synod first assembled in Constantinople in 785, but broken up by a sudden rebellion in the city, and then re-assembled at Nicea in 787, the worship of images was once more established in the Greek Church.

TARGUM (i.e., translation) is the name given to a Chaldee version, or paraphrase, of the Old Testament. The origin of the Chaldee paraphrase may be traced back to the time of Ezra. After the exile it became the practice to read the law in public to the people, with the addition of an oral paraphrase in the Chaldee dialect. Thus we read in Neh. viii. 8, "So they read in the book of the law of God distinctly, and gave the sense;" which expression the Talmud (Bab. Megillah, fol. 3, col. 1) explains "to give the sense means Targum." At what time these paraphrases were written down, we cannot state; but it must certainly have been at an early period. [In the Talmud Shabbath, fol. 115, col. 1, a written Targum on Job, of the middle of the first century, is mentioned. "Since it is not likely that a beginning should have been made with Job, a still higher antiquity, as very probably belonging to the first renderings of the law, may be assumed" (Zunz, p. 62). The two oldest paraphrases are the Targum of Onkelos on the law, and that of Jonathan ben Uzziel on the earlier and later prophets.

I. As to the person and time of Onkelos, he was, according to tradition, the disciple and friend of the older Gamaliel; and thus the Targum of Onkelos must have originated at least in the first half of the first century of our era.

The language of Onkelos greatly approaches the biblical Chaldee. His translation is, on the whole, very simple and exact. His elucidations of difficult and obscure passages and expressions, perhaps less satisfactory, are commonly those most accredited by internal evidence, and in particular he is worthy of a more careful regard and assent than have usually fallen to his lot. Larger additions, and deviations from the original text, are found mostly in the poetical parts of the Pentateuch (Gen. xlix.; Num. xxiv.; Deut. xxxii. and xxxiii.). In passages relative to the Divine Being we perceive the effect of a doctrinal bias in certain deviations from the Hebrew text. Anthropomorphic and anthropopathic expressions are avoided, and Elohim and Jehovah are rendered by "the word of God." It is obvious, from the character of the work, that the author was in possession of a rich exegetical tradition.

Editions.—The Targum of Onkelos was first published, with Rashi's commentary on the Pentateuch, Bologna, 1482. It was subsequently reprinted in the rabbinic and polyglot Bibles. [A new and critical edition according to that of Sabionetta (1557) is in course of preparation by Dr. A. Berliner of Berlin, the author of Die Masorah zum Targum Onkelos, Leipzig, 1877. This Targum has been translated into Latin by P. Fagius and by John Mercier, 1568. The translation of Fagius is the best. It was rendered into English by Etheridge, London, 1862-65.]

II. THE TARGUM ON THE PROPHETS [i.e., Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets] is ascribed to Jonathan ben Uzziel, a pupil of Hillel, according to tradition (Baba Bathra, 131 a; compare Succah, 28 a, M. gillai, 3*). As to his paraphrase, it is simple, and tolerably literal in the historical books; but in the prophetic books the text is more freely handled. Another peculiarity of this Targum is the Jewish dogmatical opinions of that day, with which the work is interwoven, and the theological representations, in introducing which a special preference was given to the Book of Daniel. Examples of this are the interpreting of the phrase "stars of God" by "people of God" (Isa. xiv. 13; comp. Dan. viii. 10; 2 Macc. ix. 10), the application of the passage in Dan. xii. 1 to that in Isa. iv. 2, etc. Here and there the author indulges in many perversions. There is little doubt that the text has received several interpolations.

Editions.—First edition was published at Leira, 1491, then again in the rabbinic and polyglot Bibles. [For the different editions, translations, and older literature, see Fürst: *Bibl. III. PSEUDO-JONATHAN AND JERUSHALMI ON THE PENTATEUCH.—Besides the Onkelos Targum, there are still two targumim on the Pentateuch,—one on the whole Pentateuch; the other, on single verses and words. The former is ascribed to Jonathan ben Uzziel; the latter goes under the name of Jerushalmi. That Jonathan is not the same as the paraphrast on the prophets is acknowledged on all sides. That he wrote at a later period, we see from his mentioning of Constantinople, Mohammed's wives (Chadija and Fatima), and other things which betray the later date,—the second half of the seventh century. That Pseudo-Jonathan had Onkelos before him, a very slight comparison of both shows. Substantially in the same dialect is the Jerusalem or Jerushalmi Targum written. The similarity of both is striking, and yet there is so much divergence as to prove diversity of authorship. But how is their resemblance to be explained? Only by the fact that both have relation to Onkelos. The author of the Jerusalem Targum worked upon that of Onkelos; his object being to correct it according to certain principles, and to insert in it a selection of Haggadahs current among the people. Pseudo-Jonathan afterwards resumed the same office, and completed what his predecessor had begun. The Jerusalem Targum formed the basis of Jonathan, and its own basis was that of Onkelos. Jonathan used both his predecessors' paraphrases; the author of Jerusalem Targum, that of Onkelos alone.

Editions.—The Pseudo-Jonathan Targum was first published in Venice, 1590; then at Hanau, 1618; Amsterdam, 1640; Prague, 1646; [Berlin, 1705; Wilna, 1852; Vienna, 1859]. It is also in the London polyglot, vol. iv. [together with a Latin translation made by Antony Chevalier. It was translated into English by Etheridge, London, 1862-65]. The Jerusalem Targum was first printed by Bomberg, Venice, 1518, [and reprinted in the subsequent rabbinical Bibles issued by him], and in the London polyglot; [also at Wilna, 1852; Vienna, 1859; Warsaw, 1875. Francis Taylor made a Latin version of this Targum (London, 1649); but the more correct one is that of Antony Chevalier, above noticed. There are also commentaries on these Targums].

IV. TARGUMS ON THE HAGIOGRAPHIA.—These Targums are generally divided into three groups; viz., (a) Job, Psalms, Proverbs; (b) the five Megilloth; (c) Daniel, Chronicles, and Ezra. Tradition ascribes to Rabbi Joseph the Blind the authorship of these Targums; but this is contradicted by writers, even of the thirteenth century.

(a) [The Targum on the Book of Job.—A feature of this Targum is its Haggadical character. In many places we find a double Targum. The language is intermixed with Latin and Greek words. It sometimes agrees with the Septuagint or with the Peshito. It was published by John Terentius, Franck., 1663. Latin translations were made by Mercier, Franckfort, 1663, and Scialai, Rome, 1615. Compare on this Targum, Bacher, in Graetz: Monatsschrift, 1871, pp. 208-223; and

Weiss: De Libri Jobi Paraphrasi Chaldaica, Breslau, 1873.]

(b) The Targum on the Psalms. — Sometimes it follows the original with a tolerable degree of closeness, as in i. iii. v. vi. etc. In more cases, however, it indulges in prolix digressions, absurd fables, and commonplace remarks. Two or three different versions of the same text occasionally follow one another without remark, though the introductory notice שׁוֹר, i.e., another Targum, sometimes precedes [Comp. Bacher: Das Targum zu den Psalmen, in Grätz's Monatsschrift, 1872, pp. 408-416, 463-473. It was printed in Justinian's polyglot Psalter (Genoa, 1516) and in the hexaglot edition of the Psalter published at Rostock, 1643. It is also printed in the latest rabbinical Bible, Warsaw, 1875. The Antwerp and following polyglots (1572, 1615, 1657) contain the Latin version of Arias Montanus. From the Codex Reuchlin it was published by Lagarde, in his Hagiographa Chaldaica (Leips., 1873), and republished by Nestle, in his Psalterium Tetraglotum, Tübingen, 1877-79.]

(c) The Targum on Proverbs. — This Targum is not Haggadic, and adheres more closely to the original text. Its remarkable agreement with the Syriac version has been noticed, — an agreement which extends even to the choice and position of words; comp. i. 1-6, 8, 10, 12, 13; ii. 9, 10, 13-15; iii. 2-9; iv. 1-3, 26; v. 1, 2, 1, 5; viii. 27; x. 3-5; xxvi. 1; xxvii. 2, 5, 6, 8; xxix. 5, 6; xxxi. 31. Comp. Dathe, De Ratione Consensus Versionis Chaldaicae et Syriacae Proverbiorum Solomonis (Lips., 1761), who endeavors to prove that the Chaldee interpreter was dependent on the Syriac. [An opposite ground to that of Dathe is taken by Maybaum, Ueber die Sprache des Targum zu den Sprüchen u. dessen Verhältniss zum Syrer, in Merx's Archiv für wissenschaftliche Erforschung des Alten Testaments, ii. 66 sq.; cf. also Pick's art. "Relation of the Syriac Version to the Septuagint and Chaldee," in McClintock and Strong's Cyclop., vol. x. pp. 121-121.]

(d) The Targum on the Five Megilloth [i.e., on Ruth, Esther, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, and the Lamentations] is written in an intermediate dialect between the West Aramæan of Job, Psalms, and Proverbs, and the East Aramæan of the Babylonian Talmud. The whole, which may perhaps belong to one author, bears the impress of a date considerably posterior to the Talmudic time, and is a Midrashic paraphrase, exceedingly loose and free in character, containing legends, fables, allusions to Jewish history, and many fanciful additions.

[1. The Targum on Ruth was published separately, with a Latin translation and scholia by J. Mercier, Paris, 1561.

2. The Targum on Ecclesiastes has been translated into English by Ginsburg, in his Commentary on Ecclesiastes, London, 1861.

3. The Targum on Canticles is found in the rabbinical Bibles. It has been translated into Latin, and also into English by Gill, at the end of his Commentary on the Song of Solomon, London, 1751, pp. 535 sq.]

4. The Targum, or rather Targums, on Esther. — One translation of concise form, and adhering closely to the text, occurs in the Antwerp polyglot. It was issued enlarged, with glosses by

Tailor, in Targum Prius et Posterior in Esther, studiis F. Tailor, London, 1655, and forms the Targum Prius, which is contained in the London polyglot. Much more prolix, and amplifying still more the legends of this Targum, is the Targum Posterior, in Tailor. [Its final redaction probably belongs to the eleventh century. With a commentary, the second Targum is found in the Warsaw rabbinical Bible. A separate edition, with notes, etc., was published by Munk, Targum Schein zu d. Buche Esther, Berl., 1876. It has been translated into German by P. Cassel, in an appendix to his Das Buch Esther, Berlin, 1878. It has been treated in essay by Reiss, Das Targum Schein zu dem Buche Esther, in Grätz's Monatsschrift, 1876, pp. 161 sq., 276 sq., 398 sq.]

5. The Targum on the Book of Chronicles was published from an Erfurt codex of the year 1313, by Beck (Augsburg, 1680-83), with learned notes and a Latin translation. Another edition was published by Wilkins (Amsterdam, 1715), from a codex belonging to the Cambridge University, with a Latin version. [This latter was lately republished by Rahner (Thorn, 1866), with the deviations from Beck's edition. The origin of this Targum cannot be put earlier than the eighth century, or the beginning of the ninth. Comp. Frankel, Monatsschrift, 1867, pp. 349 sq.; Rosenberg, Das Targum z. Chronik, in Geiger's Jüdische Zeitschrift, 1870, pp. 72 sq., 135 sq., 263 sq. There is not any Targum, so far as is known, upon Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah. An edition of the Chaldee Hagiographa was published by Lagarde, Leips., 1873.

TARSHISH. I. A geographical or ethnographical idea, to comprehend which it is necessary to examine the different passages in which this word occurs.

1. What is meant by Tarshish in the genealogical table, Gen. x. 4, 5, where it is placed among the sons of Javan, — Elishah and Kittim and Tarshish and Dodanim, (a) the Dorians (Zeller, Lionnett); (b) the Tyrsenians (or Etruscans, Tuskanis), so Knobel; (c) Tarsus in Cilicia, so Delitzsch; (d) a famous port or region, so Movers.

2. As for the passages of the Bible, there is no doubt that Tarshish is to be fixed somewhere in or near Spain: so already Eusebius. For Spain we must also look on account of the metals (Jer. x. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 12) which were brought from thence. There can therefore be no doubt that Tarshish must have been near the mouth of the Guadalquivir. In fixing more precisely the locality, Movers, with whom Knobel also seems to agree, has come to the conclusion that Tarshish-Tartessus was not the name of a city, but that it was the name of a people and country in the southwest of Spain, beyond the Columns of Hercules. With this view of Movers agree not only the biblical notices, but also the older Greek writers. This also will explain the fact, that nowhere the destruction of Tartessus is mentioned. With this fact, that Tarshish is the name of a Spanish people and country, all etymological efforts to derive the word from the Shemitic are in vain.

In fine, the two passages of the Book of Chronicles in which Tarshish occurs need to be mentioned. While we read in 1 Kings x. 22, that Solomon had at sea a navy of Tarshish with a navy of Hiram, bringing once in three years gold, silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks, which (with reference to 1 Kings ix. 26-28) leads to the supposition that a voyage to Ophir is meant, — Tarshish-ships only meaning "large vessels," — we read in 2 Chron. ix. 21 of a trip to Tarshish. The same is the case with 1 Kings xxii. 48 sq. and 2 Chron. xx. 36. The difference in the two statements is only to be explained by assuming that the Tarshish-ships intended for Ophir were changed into ships going to Tarshish. Keil's efforts to save the correct statement of the chronicle-writer are unsatisfactory; and we can only assume, with Bleek (Eindeutung, pp. 397 sq.), that the writer did not correctly understand the expression, hence his endeavor to fix it more precisely, which he did in an incorrect manner, — a view which is also adopted by Bertheau and Ewald; or, with Movers, that in the course of time the knowledge of the real Tarshish was lost among the Hebrews, and that it came to mean all distant countries in the west or in the south, or, as Movers says, a western and eastern Tarshish.

II. A precious stone, which was probably found in Tarshish, whence it took its name (Exod. xxviii. 20, xxxix. 13; Ezek. i. 16, x. 9, xxviii. 13; Cant. v. 14; Dan. x. 6). The Septuagint, followed by Josephus, makes it the "chrysolite" or topaz. Comp. BRAUN; De Vestitu Sacerdot., ii. 17.

III. Proper noun (Esth. i. 14; 1 Chron. vii. 10).

TAR'SUS, the chief town of Cilicia, was in Xenophon's time a city of some considerable consequence (Anab., 1, 2, 23). In later times it was renowned as a place of education under the early Roman emperors; and Strabo compares it in this respect to Athens and Alexandria, giving, as regards the zeal for learning shown by the residents, the preference to Tarsus (xiv. 673). To the Christian, Tarsus is of the greatest importance, because it was the birthplace and early residence of the apostle Paul. His rabbinic training he received at Jerusalem (Acts xxii. 3). At Tarsus he prepared himself for his apostolic work; and here, as well as in the neighborhood, he first preached (Acts ix. 11, 30, xi. 25, xxi. 39, xxii. 25 sq., xxiii. 34). At a very early period Tarsus had a Christian church, and at the time of the Council of Nice it had an episcopal see. In the period of the crusades Tarsus had an archiepiscopal see. The learning which was there cultivated exercised also its influence upon the Christians there. We only mention Diodorus of Tarsus, the founder of the school of Antioch, and Theodore of Tarsus, whom Pope Vitalianus sent to England as archbishop of Canterbury in the year 667. The caliph Harun al Rashid fortified the city, especially against the Byzantines; but under the Turkish régime it lost all its former splendor. Many ruins remind of the former magnificence of Tarsus; but the city is dirty, and has about six thousand inhabitants. In modern times the European residents have contributed largely to the amelioration of its affairs. It is remarkable, that up to this day the main industry is the same as in the time of the apostle (Acts xviii. 3).

TAR'TAN (2 Kings xviii. 17; Isa. xx. 1), not a proper name, but an Assyrian title equivalent to our field-marshal, — the commander-in-chief of the army. This officer occupied the highest rank, and is named immediately after the king. A tartan mentioned in the inscriptions as being under Sennacherib was Belemurani, and it was quite likely that he was the one sent to Jerusalem to solicit the people to revolt from Egypt.

TASCODRUGITES (from τασκόγ, "a wooden nail," and δρουργός, "a nose"), a nickname applied to an heretical sect which arose in Galatia in the fourth century, because they placed the finger on the nose while praying: Epiphanius (Hær., 48) and Augustine (De Hær., 63). According to Theodoret, they rejected the doctrines of the sacraments, the incarnation, etc.

TASMANIA is a triangular-shaped island, a hundred and twenty miles south of the Australian Continent. It is situated between 40° and 44° south latitude, and between 141° and 149° east longitude. In extent, it is one hundred and seventy miles from north to south, and one hundred and sixty from east to west, with an area of over fifteen millions of acres. It is nearly the size of Scotland. The climate is proverbially one of the most healthy and delightful in the world. The annual rainfall averages twenty-four inches; being higher than on the Australian Continent, and lower than in Britain and America. The mean midwinter temperature is about 46° F.; and that of midsummer, 63° F. There are no extremes of heat or cold. The winter is scarcely severe enough to merit the name. Cattle are turned out in all seasons; and life in the open air may be enjoyed all the year round. The scenery is in harmony with the climate; and the island is a favorite resort for people from neighboring colonies, and travellers from a distance. It was discovered by the Dutch navigator Abel Tasman in 1642, who named it Van Diemen's Land, in honor of Anthony van Diemen, governor of Batavia, who had fitted out the expedition. The work of the first discoverer remained as he left it till the closing years of the eighteenth century, when Capt. Cook and others gradually opened up what had so long been as a sealed book. The settlement of the colony took place in 1803, when the convict establishment at Botany Bay, near Sydney, which had existed for about fourteen years, being overcrowded, a number of the most dangerous felons had to be dispersed, and were brought to Tasmania. Transportation ceased a quarter of a century ago; and in 1856 the event was signalized by changing the name from "Van Diemen's Land" to "Tasmania," in honor of the rightful discoverer. Practically there is now nothing to remind one that the land was once a convict settlement. The aborigines, who presented, probably, almost the lowest type of savage tribes, numbered somewhere from five thousand to ten thousand in the early part of the century. The last of them died in 1866. Tasmania, like other colonies, has a governor of her own, appointed by the British cabinet, who holds office for six years. The Parliament consists of two chambers,—the Legislative Council with sixteen members, and the House of Assembly with thirty-two members, both elective. The system of education is compulsory, secular, and free. "By exhibitions from the schools, a certain number of pupils of both sexes are enabled annually, even in the absence of private resources, to proceed to the best private schools, and thus qualify themselves eventually for examination for the local degree of associate of arts. Two Tasmanian scholarships, of two hundred pounds a year each, tenable for four years at a British university, are awarded annually to associates of arts (male) who pass a prescribed examination." There is no lack of mechanics' institutes, public libraries, and scientific societies. New books, and all leading British and some American periodicals and journals, arrive regularly. The population is now only a hundred and twenty thousand, and composed of English, Irish, and Scotch, without almost any admixture of foreign nationalities. But there are signs of awakening activity and enterprise, giving hope of a successful future. Mineral and other resources are being vigorously developed; and by liberal land-laws such encouragement is given to immigration as affords a reasonable prospect of a steady, though it may not be rapid, increase of population. The chief exports are wool, tin, timber, gold, jam, fruit, hops, grain, bark, stud-sheep, etc. Hobart is the capital, with a population (in 1878) of 22,500. Launceston, the only other considerable town, has 13,000.

As in the rest of Australasia, the usual religious bodies flourish in Tasmania; although it may be noted that the Presbyterian Church has not been quite so prosperous as in the other colonies. There is an Anglican and a Roman-Catholic bishop. The church-buildings throughout the country are suitable, and some of them handsome, especially St. David's Cathedral and St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Hobart, and St. Andrew's, Launceston. There is no state church. For about fifty years, however, after the settlement of the colony, the ministers of the churches of England, Scotland, and Rome, were in the position of colonial chaplains, paid by government, like other civil servants. But the State-aid Abolition Act put an end to this a quarter of a century ago; the churches receiving as compensation a certain sum in government debentures. Most of the Presbyterian ministers, and some of the Episcopalian, come from the Old Country or the neighboring colonies; but progress is being made in all the churches towards training a native ministry. According to a recent census, the nominal returns are as under:—

Episcopalians . . . . .	53,017
Roman Catholics . . . . .	22,091
Presbyterians . . . . .	9,064
Wesleyans . . . . .	7,187
Independents . . . . .	3,931
Baptists . . . . .	931
Jews . . . . .	232
Society of Friends . . . . .	82
Other sects . . . . .	2,759

At the time of the above census the ministers of all denominations numbered a hundred and twenty-nine. As is the case in Australasia generally, they are for the most part efficient pastors, and highly respected. R. S. DUFF.

TATE, Nahum, b. in Dublin, 1652; d. Aug. 12, 1715, in the precincts of the Mint at Southwark, being in hiding from his creditors; was a son of Faithful Teate, D.D., a voluminous but long-forgotten versifier; educated at Trinity College, Dublin; went to London; became poet-laureate, 1690; published various poems of no great fame or value. He is remembered by A New Version of the Psalms of David, made in conjunction with Nicholas Brady, D.D., who was born at Brandon, Ireland, 1659, and died 1726; held preferments in London, and at Richmond, Surrey; published some sermons, and a Translation of the Æneid. It is impossible to assign the precise authorship in the case of any of their renderings; but Tate is supposed to have been the better poet, and to have shown it chiefly here. Twenty psalms appeared 1695, and the entire psalter 1696. This first edition is rare; "as, from some objectionable passages, the whole edition was recalled and destroyed." It was soon after (probably by 1698) revised, and in parts rewritten. Having been by the king "allowed and permitted to be used in all such churches, chapels, and congregations as shall think fit to receive the same" (Dec. 3, 1696), it was recommended by the Bishop of London, May 23, 1698. It made its way slowly but surely in popular acceptance, not entirely driving out Sternhold and Hopkins till the present century was somewhat advanced, and being, in turn, displaced of late by the greatly increased supply and use of hymns in the Church of England. In one section, at least, of this country, it was largely used in preference to the New-England version, or Bay Psalm-Book; many editions appearing in Boston between 1750 and 1800. This extended and long-continued use may be pleaded against the unfavorable opinions of critics. James Montgomery speaks of its "neutral propriety," and found it "nearly as inanimate, though a little more refined," than the old version; and Bishop Wilberforce gave "Tate and Brady" as the definition of "a dry-salter." From the stand-point of modern taste, no one has ever succeeded in versifying the entire Psalter. Any close rendering designed to be sung must of necessity make dull reading. Of all such attempts, that of Tate and Brady is probably the least discreditably, and the most useful. It contains some fairly poetical portions, many that are still well adapted to public worship where metrical psalms are preferred, and a few that are able to hold their own simply as hymns. The Supplement to the New Version (1703) is supposed to be the work of Tate alone. It contains versions of the Te Deum, Lord's Prayer, Creed, Commandments, and other passages of Scripture or Prayer-Book. Some of these are well done, and have been largely used in the English Church; and one, "While shepherds watched," is in nearly universal use. F. M. BIRD.

TATIAN, one of the most prominent Christian writers of the second century; was a native of Assyria, but thoroughly conversant with Græco-Roman civilization. His education was that of a common sophist, combining a rich and varied store of learned lore with a more or less superficial philosophical training; and his life, which, however, is very imperfectly known, seems to have been that of a common travelling teacher of rhetoric. Finally he came to Rome, heard Justin, received a very deep and decisive impression of Christianity, and wrote his Λόγος πρὸς Ἕλληνας. In accordance with its apologetic purpose, the book is a reductio ad absurdum of Paganism, rather than a positive representation of Christianity; but its views, though somewhat crude, and deficient in historical breadth, are strong and original. The darkness of Paganism is placed in the most glaring contrast to the light of Christianity. Not only is Greek mythology treated as a maze of indecent follies, in which even the most strained allegorical interpretation has proved unable to infuse any vital interest, but Greek art is rejected as a mere deification of the flesh, and Greek philosophy is described as a bundle of contradictions, alluring its pupils into hideous vanity and avarice. The book made a great sensation, and Tatian remained several years in Rome as a Christian teacher. He left the city, probably shortly after the death of Justin, in 166, and repaired to the Orient. In Syria he entered into intimate connection with the Gnostics, adopted many of their heretical doctrines, and became one of the leaders, if not the founder, of the sect of the Encratites. See IRENEUS, I. 28 (comp. EUSEBIUS: Hist. Eccl., IV. 29); HIPPOLYTUS: Refut. hær., viii. 16; CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA: Strom., iii. 460; ORIGEN: De orat., 13; TERTULLIAN: De jejun., 15; EPIPHANIUS, 46; THEODORET I. 20. On basis of these reports of his gnosticism, modern scholars have claimed to find gnostical views also in his Apology, though without sufficient reason. His Oratio ad Græcos was first edited by Froschauer, Zurich, 1546, and afterwards often. The principal editions are those by Worth, Oxford, 1700, and Otto, in Corp. Apolog., Jena, 1851, vol. vi. Of his numerous other writings, only the titles and a few fragments have come down to us, with the exception of the Diatessaron. See DANIEL: Tatianus der Apologet., Halle, 1837, which contains a complete account of the older literature; DUNCKER: Apolog., Göttingen, 1850, pt. ii.; [DEMBOWSKI: Die Apologie Tatians, Leipzig, 1878; THEODOR ZAHN: Forschungen 1st Theil, Tatian's Diatessaron, Erlangen, 1881 (this volume contains a reconstruction of the Diatessaron from the Latin translation of Ephrem's Commentary upon it, edited by G. TATTAM, Henry, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S., Orientalist; b. in Ireland, Dec. 28, 1788; d. at Stamford Rivers, Essex, Jan. 8, 1868. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and at the universities of Göttingen and Leyden, from which he received doctorates in laws, theology, and philosophy respectively. From 1844 to 1866 he was archdeacon of Bedford, and from 1849 till his death, rector of Stamford Rivers, and also chaplain-in-ordinary to the Queen. His fame rests upon his work in Coptic, in which he was a chief authority. He discovered in the Nitrian convent, and secured for the British Museum, a splendid collection of ancient Syriac manuscripts. He published, besides a Coptic grammar (1828) and dictionary (in Latin, 1835), Coptic versions of the Minor (1836) and Major Prophets (1852, 2 vols.), and the Apostolical Constitution (1849), and other learned works.

TAULER, Johannes, b. at Strassburg about 1290; d. there June 16, 1361; one of the most prominent representatives of mediæval German mysticism, and one of the greatest preachers of his time. Of his life very little is known. He entered the Dominican order, and studied theology in Paris, but drew more mental nourishment from the writings of the Areopagite, St. Bernard, and the mysticism of St. Victor, than from the dialectical exercises of the professors. After finishing his studies, he returned to his native city, where he became acquainted with Meister Eckart, and spent the rest of his life; making short voyages to Basel (where he entered into connection with the Friends of God), to Cologne, and other cities. That he continued officiating during an interdict laid upon Strassburg by the Pope for political reasons, is a legend first put into circulation in the sixteenth century by Speckle. It may contain some kernel of historical fact, not now to be discerned with certainty; but all its main features are due to the eagerness of the Reformers to enroll the great and famous preachers among their predecessors. Still more fictitious is the tale of his conversion by Nicholas of Basel. His works consist of sermons, a few minor treatises, and some letters. The first collected edition of his sermons was printed at Leipzig in 1498, and often reprinted, English translation by Miss Winkworth, London, 1857, and New York, 1858 (edited by Dr. Hitchcock). The Nachfolgung des armen Leben Christi, Exercitia super vita et passione Christi, and Institutiones divine (also called Medula animæ), are not by Tauler. The doctrinal views of Tauler often remind the reader very strongly of those of Meister Eckart, though, generally speaking, they evince another character: the speculative element is weaker; the devotional, stronger. Tauler was of a practical turn of mind, a preacher, not a philosopher. The speculative bearing of his ideas is consequently only slightly developed, while their application to real life is emphasized with great energy. It was this practical, and, for that very reason, truly evangelical tendency of his preaching, which gave him a much greater influence on his time than any of the other celebrated mystical teachers. They were either too metaphysical, as was Meister Eckart, or too fantastic, as was Suso, to reach the great majority of the laity; while the words of Tauler came home to the heart of both high and low, spreading light everywhere, and justly procuring for him the title of doctor illuminatus. See SCHMIDT: Johannes Tauler, Hamburg, 1811; DENIFLE: Das Buch von der geistlichen Armut, etc., Strassburg, 1877, and Tauler's Belehrung, Strassburg, 1879; JÜNDT: Les Amis de Dieu, 1879; R. HOFMANN: Johannes Tauler, Berlin, 1883 (31 pp.); also Miss WINKWORTH'S Life in the translation mentioned above.

TAUSEN, Hans, b. at Birkinde in the Danish Island of Fünen, 1494; d. at Ribe in Jutland, 1561. As a monk of Antvorskov in Seeland, he was by his abbot sent to foreign countries to study. He went to Wittenberg; and on his return, in 1524, he began to preach the Reformation. The abbot shut him up in the convent dungeon; but he was released by order of the king, who made him his chaplain, and afterwards pastor of the Church of St. Nicholas in Copenhagen, 1529. Tausen was the first who preached the Reformation in Denmark; and, together with Bugenhagen, he was the principal agent in its establishment in the country, after its adoption by the Diet of Copenhagen in 1536. In 1542 he was made Bishop of Ribe. He translated the Psalms into Danish, wrote several hymns, and published a number of sermons and treatises bearing on the Reformation.

TAVERNER, Richard, a translator of the English Bible; was b. at Brisley, Norfolk, 1505; studied at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and Cardinal College, Oxford, where he graduated; studied law, became, at Cromwell's recommendation, clerk of the signet, 1537; was licensed to preach by Edward VI., 1552; appointed high sheriff of Oxfordshire, 1569; and d. July 14, 1575. For reading Tyndale's New Testament at Oxford, he was imprisoned in the college cellar. Taverner was a learned man, and published some translations (The Confession of Faith of the Germans . . . with the Apology of Melancthon, Lond., 1536). He will always be remembered for his edition of the English Bible (Lond., 1539), commonly called Taverner's Bible. It appeared both in folio and quarto, the latter edition in parts, so that all might be able to secure a portion of the Scriptures. It was a revision of Matthew's Bible. See ENGLISH BIBLE VERSIONS, p. 731, and MOMBERT: Handbook of the English Versions of the Bible, New York, 1883, pp. 191-201.

TAXATION, Ecclesiastical. In the earliest times the Christian Church was able to defray its expenses for liturgical purposes, for the care of the poor, etc., from the voluntary offerings of its members, consisting of wine, bread, oil, incense, and fruit. The Jewish custom of presenting first-fruit was very early adopted; and in the time of Tertullian (d. 215) contributions of money—monthly, annual, or occasional—are mentioned (Conc. Carthag., iii. c. 24; Tertullian: Apologet., 39). In the time of Jerome (d. 420) and Augustine (d. 430), tithes began to be introduced; and from the close of the seventh century they were quite generally established. The clergy, however, by degrees, as a distinction between clergy and laity developed, were entirely exempted from taxation; though, on the other hand, they were not at liberty to dispose, by will or otherwise, of the property accumulated from their ecclesiastical income. From the end of the fourth century such property was considered as belonging to the church.

The first traces of a real taxation of the clergy occur towards the close of the sixth century, and that at once under three different forms. First, an annual tax was paid by every diocesan church to the cathedral. It was called honor cathedre, or cathedraticum, or, as it was paid during the episcopal visitations, synodalis census, synodus, or synodaticum. It is first met with in Spain, where it was paid in money: Conc. Bracar., c. 1 (572). In the Frankish Empire, where it was paid in kind, it is mentioned in a capitulare of Charles the Bald (844); in Italy it became common under Innocent III. (d. 1216) and Honorius III. (d. 1227). Next, a fee was paid by any one appointed to a benefice, to the patriarch, or archbishop, or bishop who ordained him. In the East it is mentioned as a custom in Nor. Just., a. 123, c. 3 (546); and it was no small burden, since it was stipulated that it should not exceed one year's income. In the West a council of Rome (595) declared that voluntary gifts to the ordaining bishop and his chancery were not simony; but a council of Paris (829), as well as the letters of Ivo of Chartres (Ep. 133), complains of the magnitude of those gifts. The money, which, since the ninth century, the metropolitans paid in Rome for their pullum, was a tax of the same kind; and it became a very heavy one. Finally, it was the duty of the clergy to entertain the bishop on his tour of visitation. This duty, which occurs under various names,—procuratio, mansio parata, circuda, circatura, comestio, albergaria, etc.,—is first met with in Spain: Concil. Tolet., iii. c. 20 (589), and vii. c. 4 (646). It afterwards became customary for the clergy to rid themselves from this duty by the payment of an annual sum of money; but that custom was forbidden by Innocent IV. (d. 1254), and Concil. Lugdun., ii. c. 1 (1274).

As the constitution of the church more and more assumed the form of a feudal monarchy, the ecclesiastical system of taxation developed in the same direction. Secular rulers, such as the kings of Poland, Hungary, England, Norway, Sweden, Naples, Arragonia, and Portugal, paid an annual tribute (census) to the Pope, thereby recognizing that they held their titles and realms as fiefs of the holy see. The Peter's-pence (denarius St. Petri), which from several of those countries was paid annually to the Pope by every household, had also a feudal character, and so had the protection-money of many monasteries, the exemption-money of many episcopal sees, etc. Most taxes of this character, however, have afterwards been discontinued, though two still remain,—the subsidium charitativum and the jus deportuum. In a moment of great distress the bishop may levy a tax on the whole clergy of his diocese. This extraordinary subsidium charitativum is first mentioned in Concil. Lateran., iii. c. 6 (1197). Allied to it is the Pope's right to appropriate, under circumstances of distress and for ecclesiastical purposes, one-tenth of all ecclesiastical revenues; which right he often made free use of, as, for instance, during the crusades. The jus deportuum, or annalia, or annate, originated under Honorius

III. (d. 1227), and became firmly established under Boniface VIII. (d. 1305). It means a right which the bishop has of appropriating the first year's revenue at a new appointment to a benefice in his diocese. It occurs partly as a right established once for all times, partly as a privilege granted by the Pope for a certain number of years; for originally the Pope claimed the right for himself alone, and he still retains it as far as the higher ecclesiastical benefices are concerned.

When the decay of the Church began, after the fourteenth century, great modifications of the ruling system of taxation became necessary. Old taxes were abolished, and new ones were invented. Among the latter were the absence-money and the so-called servitia. Absence-money consisted in a fee paid to the Pope for their non-residence by such ecclesiastics as held several benefices. See JÄGER: Über Absent- und Tafel-gelder, Ingolstadt, 1825. The Servitia Camere Papæ, or servitia communia, originated from the Pope assuming the exclusive right of ordaining bishops, on account of which all ordination-fees flowed into his treasury. With the establishment of the Reformation, all special ecclesiastical taxation was swept away in the Protestant countries. In England the papal annats were originally transferred to the crown, but by Anne they were formed into a fund ("Queen Anne's Bounty") for the improvement of the smaller livings. No monograph on ecclesiastical taxation exists; but much material is found in THOMASSIN: Vetus et nova ecclesie disciplina circa beneficia, Paris, 1698, 3 vols., especially in the third volume; and in the common handbooks of ecclesiastical law. TAYLOR, Dan, founder of New Connection of General Baptists (see SMYTH); b. at Northwram, Halifax, York, Eng., Dec. 21, 1738; d. in London, Dec. 2, 1816. Like Luther, a miner's son, and at five years of age worked in the mine with his father. He was strong, fearless, and eager for learning, and gave promise of the prodigious industry of his manhood by carrying his books into the coal-mine, and converting it into a study. As with all superior lads, religion was his first thought. His sense of sin was acute; and his passionate yearning for pardon and light urged him to travel ten and even twenty miles to hear Wesley, Whitefield, and Grimshaw. But he did not rest till he understood and accepted the message of universal love in John iii. 16: that gave the trend to his character and career.

He joined the Wesleys, and became a "local preacher;" but his essentially independent and growing spirit forced him out of the Methodist ranks, and he accepted the pastorate of a few like-minded folk at Nook, Birchcliffe. Further study of the Bible led him to the Baptist idea, and so he came into contact with the General Baptists. Detecting their Unitarian drift, he confronted it, and sought to arrest it. Failing, he, together with the Barton Independent Baptists, formed, in June, 1770, the New Connection of General Baptists. Now he found his true sphere, discharging his duties as a pastor with conspicuous fidelity, first at Birchcliffe (1763-83), next at Halifax (1783-85), and finally at Church Street, Whitechapel, London (1785-1816). He meanwhile wrote copiously and ably on the theological questions of the day, and also shaped the course of the General Baptist denomination. He was its leading spirit for nearly half a century, founded its college in 1797, started and edited its magazine, 1798, presided at its annual gatherings, and impressed his sturdy, enterprising, progressive, and liberal individuality on its institutions and churches. His chief literary works are, Fundamentals of Religion in Faith and Practice, Dissertations on Singing in Public Worship, Letters on Andrew Fuller's Scheme.

TAYLOR, Isaac, English theological writer; b. at Lavenham, Suffolk, Aug. 17, 1787; d. at Stanford Rivers, Essex, June 28, 1865. His father was a line engraver, and later a dissenting minister, and author of popular children's books; but he entered the Established Church. After following for a while the profession of engraver and artist, he turned his attention to literature and inventions. He invented two very ingenious engraving-machines; one for illustrations, and another for patterns upon rollers for calico-printing. As an author he was very prolific and original. Among his religious and theological writings may be mentioned History of Transmission of Ancient Books to Modern Times, 1827; Natural History of Enthusiasm, 1829 (very popular); Natural History of Fanaticism, 1833; Spiritual Despotism, 1835; Physical Theory of Another Life, 1836 (after this work he dropped his incognito); Ancient Christianity, and the Doctrines of the Oxford Tracts for the Times, 1839-40, 8 parts, 4th ed., with supplement and indexes, 1844, 2 vols. (a reply to those who desired to restore "primitive" doctrine, and magnify the "Primitive" Church, by showing the seamy side of the early church; but it goes too far, and thus really conveys a false impression); Man Responsible for his Dispositions, Opinions, and Conduct, 1840; Logica and Jesuitism, 1849; Wesley and Methodism, 1851; The Restoration of Belief, 1855; Logic in Theology, 1859; Spirit of Hebrew Poetry, 1861; Considerations on the Pentateuch, 1863 (a reply to Bishop Colenso). Almost all his books have been reprinted in New York, and to the reprint of the Spirit of Hebrew Poetry Dr. W. Adams contributed an introduction.

TAYLOR, Jane, was b. in London, Sept. 23, 1783; and d. at Ongar, Essex, April 12, 1824. She learned her father's profession as an engraver, which was soon deserted for literature. Her life was spent mainly at Lavenham, Colchester, Ongar, and Marazion in Cornwall. Her memoir of her brother Isaac appeared 1825. She was among the best and most successful of writers for youth. Of her many publications (Display, Essays in Rhyme, Contributions of Q. Q., etc.), not the least important were the Original Poems, 1805, and Hymns for Infant Minds, 1809 or 1810 (new ed., London, 1883), written conjointly with her sister Ann (1782-1866), afterwards Mrs. Gilbert. In these it is seldom possible to fix the authorship with certainty. F. M. BIRD.

TAYLOR, Jeremy, — the Chrysostom of English theology, but in brilliancy of imagination surpassing his Greek antitype, — was born at Cambridge, Aug. 15, 1613. There he entered Caius

College, and, after seven years' study, took his degree of M.A. Archbishop Laud noticed and patronized the youth, and gave him a fellowship in All Souls', Oxford, 1636. Probably through the same influence, he obtained a royal chaplaincy about the same period; and soon afterwards he became rector of Uppingham, in the county of Rutland. Of that living he was deprived by Parliament, thus suffering a penalty for his royalism and attachment to the Church-of-England Prayer-Book. He is described as following Charles the First's army; but after its total defeat he sought refuge in Wales, where he kept school in the town of Newton Caernarthenshire. The Earl of Carbery, then living at Golden Grove in that county, appointed him domestic chaplain; and in this capacity he remained during the greater part of the Commonwealth. It was the most fruitful, probably the most pleasant, part of his life. In retirement amidst beautiful scenery, enjoying noble patronage, surrounded by the comforts of life, and sharing in refined society, he produced a series of works which are the wonder of posterity. In 1647 he published his Liberty of Prophesying; in which, suffering from intolerance, he pleaded against it, and advocated a theory of comprehension which he had not the power to put in practice. It was, in fact, an eloquent plea in behalf of deprived Episcopal clergymen, based on principles broader than were sufficient to support their case alone, but which, when the tables were turned, he was not prepared to apply to Presbyterians. The beautiful Life of Christ followed in 1650; and this was succeeded the same year by his Holy Living, completed in 1651 by his Holy Dying. Some of his Sermons came next, and in 1652 appeared his Discourse on Baptism. More Sermons were issued in 1653, and in 1654 came forth from the press his book on The Real Presence of Christ in the Sacrament. The Golden Grove, a guide of infant devotion, succeeded in 1655; and in 1656 a Collection of Polymical and Moral Discourses was given to the world. These are most remarkable works, all of them full of original illustration, multifarious learning, ingenious argument, poetical imagination, and exuberant, florid diction. The rhythm of his sentences flows like music, and captivates the taste, when his reasoning does not satisfy the judgment. His opinions were all struck in the Anglo-Catholic mould; though he practically claimed for himself "a liberty of prophesying," which led him sometimes to break bounds, to wander out of the orthodox enclosure, and to enter fields of Pelagian thought. His Unum Necessarium, or the Doctrine and Practice of Repentance, printed in 1655, especially laid him open to this charge, and involved him in very serious controversy. He was one of those thinkers who cannot endure the trammels of a system, and though faithful, on the whole, to a certain creed, feel compelled by a restlessness of speculation to deviate from it in many particulars. He was decidedly anti-Calvinistic and anti-Puritan, advocating sacramental doctrines with immense ardor, speaking extravagantly of baptismal regeneration, piling up figure on figure to illustrate its efficacy, and, though less figurative in his exposition of the Lord's Supper, insisting that the symbols of bread and wine become changed into the body and blood of Christ after a sacramental, that is, a real and spiritual manner. Generally it may be said of Jeremy Taylor that he was one of the last men from whom qualified and cautious statements could be expected. He certainly was like a cloud, "which moveth altogether, if it move at all." Upon the doctrine of justification he is very misty, deprecating inquiries respecting it as leading into useless intricacies; in short, cutting away the ground from any definite theological representation of it whatever. In argument he is often defective; in declamation, always unrivalled.

In 1658 Taylor removed to Ireland, and carried on clerical ministrations at Lisburn and Portmore. He returned to London in 1660, and promoted the restoration of Charles II. by signing the Loyal Declaration of the Nobility and Gentry in the April of that year. In 1660 also, he published his elaborate Doctor Habitandum, or the Rule of Conscience in all her General Measures, pronounced by Hallam to be "the most extensive and learned work on casuistry which has appeared in the English language." Taylor's acuteness, and command of quotations, his insight into human nature, and his wonderful agility of thought, qualified him to make a mark in this department of moral and religious literature; but the usefulness of the whole is more apparent than real, and supplies little that is of much practical value. Casuistry is more fitted to suggest excuses for what is wrong than to convey clear unmistakable rules for doing and thinking what is right. The Worthy Communicant, by Taylor, bears date 1660; and that year the author was raised to the bishopric of Down and Connor.

His Episcopal career was not successful. He found his cathedral chair full of thorns. The Episcopalians of the Commonwealth troubled the Presbyterians, and now the Presbyterians of the Restoration troubled the Episcopalians. Jeremy Taylor complained of them as "incendiaries." He said they robbed him of his people's hearts, and "threatened to murder him." The first charge probably was true: in the second we may detect the exercise of his vivid imagination. His hope was in the government of force, and he no longer advocated liberty of prophesying. It is said, that, within three months after his consecration, he deposed thirty-six Presbyterian ministers. Of the period of his life between 1660 and 1667, when he died, interesting and curious particulars may be found in Notes and Queries, Nov. 11, 1865.

Bishop Rust, who succeeded him, caught his rhetorical mantle and exclaimed, in his funeral-sermon for the illustrious divine, "This great prelate had the good-humor of a gentleman, the eloquence of an orator, the fancy of a poet, the acuteness of a schoolman, the profoundness of a philosopher, the wisdom of a chancellor, the sagacity of a prophet, the reason of an angel, and the piety of a saint. He had devotion enough for a cloister, learning enough for a university, and wit enough for a college of civitosi; and, had his parts and endowments been parcelled out among his poor clergy that he left behind him, it would, perhaps, have made one of the best dioceses in the world." JOHN STOUTON.

TAYLOR, John, an English Unitarian; wrote a number of hymns, which appeared mostly in Aspland's Selection, 1810. Some of them possess decided merit, and have been widely used in our churches.

TAYLOR, Nathaniel William, D.D., an eminent Congregationalist preacher, theological teacher, and author; b. at New Milford, Conn., June 23, 1786; d. at New Haven, March 10, 1858. He was graduated at Yale College in 1807; studied theology with President Dwight, and became pastor of the First Church in New Haven in 1811, which office he resigned in 1822, to take the chair of Dogmatic Theology in the theological department of Yale College, where he continued to teach until his death. As a preacher he was singularly impressive, combining solidity and clearness of thought with a remarkable eloquence. Unusual results followed upon his sermons, especially in connection with "revivals." From early youth deeply interested in the problems of theology, and endowed with metaphysical talents of a very high order, he worked out, on the basis of the previous New-England theology, an elaborate system, which gained numerous adherents, and powerfully affected theological thought and preaching in America beyond the circle of its professed advocates. It was popularly termed "The New-Haven Theology." Sometimes it was called "Taylorism." It was one of the most influential of the types of so-called "New-School Divinity." There were able coadjutors of Dr. Taylor, notably his colleagues, — Rev. Eleazar T. Fitch, D.D. (b. 1791; d. 1871), college preacher at Yale from 1817 to 1852, and professor of homiletics, a man of rare and versatile powers; and Rev. Chauncey A. Goodrich, D.D. (b. 1790; d. 1860), also an influential professor in the college and in the divinity school at Yale, and the principal editor of The Christian Spectator, the review in which many of the controversial essays of "the New-Haven Divines," were published. But the peculiarities of "New-Haven Divinity" as it existed in the generation among whom Dr. Taylor was a prominent leader, are mainly and justly associated with his name.

When Dr. Taylor began his investigations, New-England theology asserted, as it had done from the time of Edwards, a doctrine of natural ability as the condition of responsible agency. It rejected the imputation of Adam's sin in every form; but, outside of the Hopkinsian school, it associated with this denial a vague theory of an hereditary, sinful taint, or a sinful propensity to sin, propagated with the race, — what Dr. Taylor termed "physical depravity;" and it vindicated the introduction, or divine permission, of sin, by affirming that sin is the necessary means of the greatest good, and that the system of things is better with sin than without it.

The aim of Dr. Taylor was to relieve New-England theology of remaining difficulties on the side of human responsibility, and thus accomplish the end which it had always kept in view. The fundamental question was that of liberty and necessity. There must be, on the one hand, a firm foundation for the doctrine of decrees and universal providential government, and for the exercise of resignation, submission, and confidence on the part of men in view of all events; otherwise, the Calvinistic system is given up. There must be, on the other hand, a full power in men to avoid sin, and perform their duty: otherwise, the foundation of accountability is gone, and the commands and entreaties of the Bible are a mockery. The true solution of the problem, in Dr. Taylor's view, is in the union of the doctrine of the previous certainty of every act of the will — a certainty given by its antecedents collectively taken — with the power of a contrary choice. Freedom is exemption from something: it is exemption from the constraining operation of that law of cause and effect which brings events to pass in the material world. If the antecedents of choice produce the consequent according to that law, without qualification, there is no liberty. Yet Dr. Taylor did not hold to the liberty of indifference or of contingency which had been charged upon the Arminians, and had been denied by his New-England predecessors. He held to a connection between choice and its antecedents, of such a character as to give in every case a previous certainty that the former will be what it actually is. The ground or reason of this certainty lies in the constitution of the agent, and the motives under which he acts; that is to say, in the antecedents taken together. The infallible connection of these with the consequent, the Divine Mind perceives, though we may not dogmatize on the exact mode of his perception. The precise nature of the connection between the antecedents and consequent, Dr. Taylor did not profess to explain; but he held that the same antecedents will uniformly be followed by the same consequent. There are causes which do not necessitate their effect, but simply and solely give the certainty of it. Now, all admit that every event is previously certain. It is a true proposition, that what is to occur to-morrow will thus occur. No matter, then, what may be the ground of this certainty, as long as the events in question are not necessitated, there is no interference with moral liberty.

The leading principles of Dr. Taylor's system may now be stated: —

1. All sin is the voluntary action of the sinner, in disobedience to a known law.

2. Sin, however, is a permanent principle, or state of the will, a governing purpose, underlying all subordinate volitions and acts. Stated in theological language, it is the elective preference of the world to God, as the soul's chief good. It may be resolved into selfishness.

3. Though sin belongs to the individual, and consists in sinning, yet the fact that every man sins from the beginning of responsible agency is in consequence of the sin of Adam. It is certain that every man will sin from the moment when he is capable of moral action, and will continue to be sinful until he is regenerated; and this certainty, which is absolute, — though it is no necessity, and co-exists with power to the opposite action, — is somehow due to Adam's sin. In this sense, Adam was placed on trial for the whole human race (Revealed Theology, p. 259).

There is in men, according to Dr. Taylor, a bias or tendency — sometimes called a propensity or disposition — to sin: but this is not itself sinful; it is the cause or occasion of sin. Nor is it to be conceived of as a separate desire of the soul, having respect to sin as an object. Such a propensity as this does not exist in human nature.

It is proper to say that men are sinners by nature, since, in all the appropriate circumstances of their being, they sin from the first. The certainty of their sin as soon as they are capable of sinning is the consequence of two factors, — the constitution and condition of the soul (subjective), and the situation (objective). These together constitute nature in the statement, "We are sinners by nature."

4. Man is the proximate efficient cause of all his voluntary states and actions. No man is necessitated to choose as he does. There is ever a power to the contrary. A sinner can cease to love the world supremely, and can choose God for his portion.

5. Inseparable from the foregoing assertion of a power to the contrary choice, however, is the doctrine of a moral inability on the part of the sinner to repent, and convert himself. He can, but it is certain he will not. "Certainty with power to the contrary" is a condensed statement of the truth on both sides. Thus the sinner is both responsible and dependent — perfectly responsible, yet absolutely dependent.

6. Natural ability being a real power and not an incapable faculty, there must be something in a sinner's mind to which right motives can appeal, some point of attachment for the influences of the law and the gospel. Hence the importance of the distinction between the sensibility and will, or of the threefold classification of mental powers, which Dr. Taylor was among the first to introduce.

What is the particular feeling which may thus be addressed? According to Dr. Taylor, it is the love of happiness, or self-love.

Dr. Taylor believed, with a great company of philosophers (from Aristotle to the present time), that the involuntary love or desire of personal happiness is the subjective, psychological spring of all choices.

Benevolence is the choice of the highest good of the universe in preference to every thing that can come into competition with it. But one's own highest happiness can never thus come into competition with it. Virtuous self-love and virtuous benevolence denote one and the same complex state.

7. The author of regeneration is the Holy Spirit. The change that takes place in the soul is due to his influence so exerted as to effect that change in the sense of rendering it infallibly certain. It is a change of character. It is the production of love to God as the supreme object of choice, in the room of love to the world. Now, a sinner is naturally able to make this revolution in the ruling principle of his life. But there is a moral inability which constitutes practically an insuperable obstacle; and this is overcome only by the agency of the Spirit, who moves upon the powers of the soul, and induces, without coercing, them to comply with the requirements of the gospel.

8. Dr. Taylor's doctrine on the relation of the introduction of sin, and its continuance to the divine administration, accords with the general spirit of his theology. Theologians from Calvin to Bellamy had discussed the question, as if there were only this alternative, — the existence of sin, or the prevention of it by the power of God.

Dr. Taylor held that we are not shut up to the alternative just stated. There is a third way in which sin might have been prevented, and that is by the free act of the beings who commit it. It is not true, then, that sin is in any case better than holiness in its stead would be, or that sin, all things considered, is a good thing. But it may be true that the non-prevention of sin by the act of God is in certain cases better than its forcible prevention by his act.

Dr. Taylor took up the question in answering sceptical objections to the benevolence of the Creator. The ground that he took in reply was this, that it may be impossible for sin to be excluded by the act of God from the best possible system. The system would be better without sin, if this result were secured by the free action of the creatures comprising it, with no other alteration of its characteristics. It might not be so good if the same result were reached by divine intervention. We are too little acquainted with the relations of divine power to free agency to declare confidently to what extent the exertion of such power is beneficial when the universal system is taken into view. It is wiser and more modest to judge of what is best by what we actually see done.

9. Dr. Taylor's conception of election is conformed to his doctrine respecting the divine permission of sin. Regeneration is the act of God. He has determined to exert such a degree of influence upon a certain part of the race who are sinful by their own act, and justly condemned, as will result with infallible certainty in their conversion. He is not bound to give such influence in equal measure to all: rather does he establish a system of influence which his omniscient mind foresees to be most productive of holiness in his kingdom as a whole. It is not the act or merit of individuals that earns or procures this effectual influence, but that large expediency which has respect to the entire kingdom, and the holiness to be produced within it.

He organizes a plan, not in an arbitrary way, but in order to secure the best results that are attainable consistently with the wise and benevolent laws that underlie his whole administration.
